Mr. GREW. That was on August 15.

Senator FERGUSON. August 18, just glance at that. Did it relate to the note of August 17?

Mr. GREW. On August 18 the Minister asked me to come to see him, and it was a very long conference which lasted 2½ hours, and the whole question of Japanese relations was therein discussed.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you discuss the note of the 17th?

Mr. GREW. Nothing was said about Thailand in that conversation.

Senator FERGUSON. No. Was anything said about the note of the 17th where the British and the United States Governments were to take parallel action?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; nothing whatsoever was said about that.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know about that at the time, on the 18th?

[1655] Mr. GREW. Did I—I don't quite understand—did I know that that action—

Senator FERGUSON. That Britain and the United States had agreed, or at least there were promises, that we were to take certain parallel action.

Mr. GREW. I would have to consult the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read the last paragraph on page 556. It may refresh your memory as to what I am talking about.

Mr. GREW. Of foreign relations?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Five hundred and fifty-six?

Senator FERGUSON. Five hundred and fifty-six.

Mr. GREW. The was the statement handed by President Roosevelt to the Japanese Ambassador.

Such being the case, this Government now finds it necessary to say to the Government of Japan that if the Japanese Government takes any further steps in pursuance of a policy or program of military domination by force or threat of force of neighboring countries, the Government of the United States will be compelled to take immediately any and all steps which it may deem necessary toward safeguarding the legitimate rights and interests of the United States and American nationals [1656] and toward insuring the safety and security of the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. My question is, Did you take that matter up with anyone in the State Department?

Mr. GREW. I do not know if I did so. I have no record of having done so, but if I did I certainly would have reported that step to the Department of State, and they would have it on file. I do not recollect having done so.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now 12 o'clock. Before recessing the Chair would like, if the committee is willing, inasmuch as paragraphs have been read from Mr. Grew's letter to the President, of December 14, and the President's reply of January 21, the Chair will ask that the full text of both those letters be printed in the transcript of the record at this point.

(The letters referred to follow:)

DEAR FRANK: * * * About Japan and all her works. It seems to me to be increasingly clear that we are bound to have a showdown some day, and the principal question at issue is whether it is to our advantage to have that showdown sooner or to have it later.

The chief factors in the problem would seem, from this angle, to be:

(1) Whether and when Britain is likely to win the European war;

[1657] (2) Whether our getting into war with Japan would so handicap our help to Britain in Europe as to make the difference to Britain between victory and defeat;

(3) To what extent our own policy in the Far East must be timed with our preparedness program and with respect to the relative strength of the American and the Japanese Navies now and later.

Those are questions which, with our limited information here, I am not qualified even approximately to answer.

From the Tokyo angle we see the picture roughly as follows:

After eight years of effort to build up something permanently constructive in American-Japanese relations, I find that diplomacy has been defeated by trends and forces utterly beyond its control, and that our work has been swept away as if by a typhoon, with little or nothing remaining to show for it. Japan has become openly and unashamedly one of the predatory nations and part of a system which aims to wreck about everything that the United States stand for. Only insuperable obstacles will now prevent the Japanese from digging in permanently in China and from pushing the southward advance, with economic control as a preliminary to political domination in the areas marked down. Economic obstacles, such as may arise from American embargoes, will seriously handicap Japan in the long run, but meanwhile they tend to push the Japanese onward in a [1658] forlorn hope of making themselves economically self-sufficient.

History has shown that the pendulum in Japan is always swinging between extremist and moderate policies, but as things stand today we believe that the pendulum is more likely to swing still further toward extremes than to reverse its direction. Konoye, and especially Matsuoka, will fall in due course, but under present circumstances no Japanese leader or group of leaders could reverse the expansionist program and hope to survive.

Our own policy of unhurried but of inexorable determination in meeting every Japanese step with some step of our own has been eminently wise, and that policy has sunk deep into Japanese consciousness. But while important elements among the Japanese people deplore the course which their leaders are taking, those elements are nevertheless inarticulate and powerless and are likely to remain so. Meanwhile the Germans here are working overtime to push Japan into war with us. I have told Matsuoka point-blank that his country is heading for disaster. He has at least seen that his efforts to intimidate us have fallen flat and have had an effect precisely the reverse of that intended.

It therefore appears that sooner or later, unless we are prepared, with General Hugh Johnson, to withdraw bag and baggage from the entire sphere of "Greater East Asia including [1659] the South Seas" (which God forbid), we are bound eventually to come to a head-on clash with Japan.

A progressively firm policy on our part will entail inevitable risks—especially risks of sudden uncalculated strokes, such as the sinking of the Panay, which might inflame the American people—but, in my opinion those risks are less in degree than the far greater dangers which we should face if we were to follow a policy of laissez faire.

In other words, the risks facing us in maintaining our future security are likely to be greater than the risks of taking positive measures as the southward advance proceeds. So far as I am aware, the great majority of the American people are in a mood for vigorous action. The principal point at issue, as I see it, is not whether we must call a halt to the Japanese program, but when.

It is important constantly to keep in mind the fact that if we take measures "short of war" with no real intention to carry those measures to their final conclusion if necessary, such lack of intention will be all too obvious to the Japanese, who will proceed unhindered, and even with greater incentive, on their way. Only if they become certain that we mean to fight if called upon to do so will our preliminary measures afford some chance of proving effective and of removing the necessity for war. The old story of Sir Edward Grey in 1914.

[1660] If by such action we can bring about the eventual discrediting of Japan's present leaders, a regeneration of thought may ultimately take shape in this country, permitting the resumption of normal relations with us and leading to a readjustment of the whole Pacific problem.

In a nutshell that is about the way I regard the present and future situation. No doubt you have seen some of my telegrams which have tried to paint the picture as clearly as has been possible at this post where we have to fumble and grope for accurate information, simply because among the Japanese themselves the right hand often doesn't know what the left hand is doing. Their so-called "new structure" is in an awful mess and the bickering and controversy that go on within the Government itself are past belief. Every new totalitarian step is clothed in some righteous-sounding slogan. This, indeed, is not the Japan that we have known and loved.

* * * You are playing a masterly hand in our foreign affairs and I am profoundly thankful that the country is not to be deprived of your clear vision, determination, and splendid courage in piloting the old ship of state.

[1661]

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 21, 1941.

DEAR JOE: I have given careful consideration to your letter of December 14.

First, I want to say how helpful it is to have your over-all estimates and reflections—based as they are upon a rare combination of first-hand observation, long experience with our Japanese relations, and masterly judgment. I find myself in decided agreement with your conclusions.

I also want you to know how much I appreciate your kind words of congratulation on my re-election and your expression of confidence in my conduct of our foreign affairs.

As to your very natural request for an indication of my views as to certain aspects of our future attitude toward developments in the Far East, I believe that the fundamental proposition is that we must recognize that the hostilities in Europe, in Africa, and in Asia are all parts of a single world conflict. We must, consequently recognize that our interests are menaced both in Europe and in the Far East. We are engaged in the task of defending our way of life and our vital national interests wherever they are seriously endangered. Our strategy of self-defense must be a global strategy which takes account of every front and takes advantage [1662] of every opportunity to contribute to our total security.

You suggest as one of the chief factors in the problem of our attitude toward Japan the question whether our getting into war with Japan would so handicap our help to Britain in Europe as to make the difference to Britain between victory and defeat. In this connection it seems to me that we must consider whether, if Japan should gain possession of the region of the Netherlands East Indies and the Malay Peninsula, the chances of England's winning in her struggle with Germany would not be decreased thereby. The British Isles, the British in those isles, have been able to exist and to defend themselves not only because they have prepared strong local defenses but also because as the heart and the nerve center of the British Empire they have been able to draw upon vast resources for their sustenance and to bring into operation against their enemies economic, military, and naval pressures on a world-wide scale. They live by importing goods from all parts of the world and by utilizing large overseas financial resources. They are defended not only by measures of defense carried out locally but also by distant and widespread economic, military, and naval activities which both contribute to the maintenance of their supplies, deny certain sources of supply to their enemies, and prevent those enemies from concentrating the full force of their armed power against the heart and the nerve center of the Empire.

[1663] The British need assistance along the lines of our generally established policies at many points, assistance which in the case of the Far East is certainly well within the realm of "possibility" so far as the capacity of the United States is concerned. Their defense strategy must in the nature of things be global. Our strategy of giving them assistance toward ensuring our own security must envisage both sending of supplies to England and helping to prevent a closing of channels of communication to and from various parts of the world, so that other important sources of supply will not be denied to the British and be added to the assets of the other side.

You also suggest as chief factors in the problem the questions whether and when Britain is likely to win the European war. As I have indicated above, the conflict is world-wide, not merely a European war. I firmly believe, as I have recently declared publicly, that the British, with our help, will be victorious in this conflict. The conflict may well be long and we must bear in mind that when England is victorious she may not have left the strength that would be needed to bring about a rearrangement of such territorial changes in the western and southern Pacific as might occur during the course of the conflict if Japan is not kept within [1664] bounds. I judge from the remarks which appear at the bottom of page 4 and at the top of page 5 of your letter that you, too, attach due importance to this aspect of the problem.

I am giving you my thoughts at this length because the problems which we face are so vast and so interrelated that any attempt even to state them compels one to think in terms of five continents and seven seas. In conclusion, I must emphasize that, our problem being one of defense, we cannot lay down hard-and-fast plans. As each new development occurs we must, in the light of the circumstances then existing, decide when and where and how we can most effectively marshal and make use of our resources.

With warmest regards.

As ever,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand in recess until 2:00 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, a recess was taken until 2:00 o'clock of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2:00 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH CLARK GREW (Resumed)

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Chairman, may I interpose a moment, with Senator Ferguson's permission? I think I can clear up one question that came up during his examination.

Senator FERGUSON. There were quite a number.

Mr. GESELL. This may be helpful. The question came up with respect to the green-light dispatch. We made an inquiry over the noon recess and find that an extract and paraphrase of that green-light dispatch will be found printed as Document 182 at page 569 of Peace and War, and inasmuch as that is an extract, we have obtained from the State Department the entire text of the dispatch, and we wish to offer that in evidence, in order that the record will be complete. This would be Exhibit 26.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you explain why this instrument was not among those delivered to us before by the State Department, if it was Mr. Grew's most important instrument?

Mr. GESELL. Our inquiry into State Department documents has been confined to the year 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. Do I understand then that the counsel had made no request for anything back of 1941?

Mr. GESELL. We have not requested any of Mr. Grew's dispatches back of 1941, Senator.

[1666] Senator FERGUSON. Had the committee requested any State Department records back of 1941?

Mr. GESELL. I think there may have been a few instances where we have gone behind 1941, but very few.

Senator FERGUSON. Will Counsel state for the record the reason for that limitation?

Mr. GESELL. Senator, the effort was to stay around the period which we thought was of major concern to the committee, the events leading up to Pearl Harbor.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the fact that extracts have been referred to and Mr. Grew has been examined about it, don't you think, Counsel, that the instrument itself ought to go into the transcript of the hearing instead of being an exhibit?

Mr. GESELL. I think that would be a good idea, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Senator, I would like to have it read at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be read at at this time, but I think it ought to go into the transcript of the hearing and not simply filed as an exhibit. With the consent of the committee, that will be the order.

Senator FERGUSON. Would Counsel read it into the record so Mr. Grew will be familiar with it? I have not had time to read it.

Mr. GESELL. Perhaps, Mr. Grew could read it.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Let Mr. Grew read it.

Mr. GREW. I have a copy of it here.

[1667] Senator FERGUSON. You have a copy?

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Read it.

The CHAIRMAN. You may read it, Mr. Grew, if you wish.

Mr. GREW. Read the whole thing?

The CHAIRMAN. Read the whole document.

Mr. GREW. All right.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 26.")

Mr. GREW. This is a telegram to the Secretary of State.

827 September 7, 9 p. m.

Strictly Confidential.

Mr. KEEFE. What is the date of that again, please?

Mr. GREW. September 12, 1940.

Senator FERGUSON. Does your book give the date of it, Mr. Grew.

Mr. GREW. Does what, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Does your book state the date?

Mr. GREW. No. I used the substance of the telegram in the comment in my diary on October 1, but it was only the substance, it was not the text.

Senator FERGUSON. In your book, it is under date of October 1, 1940?

Mr. GREW. That is right, yes, sir. The telegram was sent on September 12.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

[1668] One. The observations of Mr. A. T. Steele.

Senator FERGUSON. Just one moment, Mr. Grew, if I might interrupt.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. There would not be any way of telling that the instrument that you speak about on page 334 was the one of September 12, 1940?

Mr. GREW. That is in my book?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I mean without your information.

Mr. GREW. No; you are quite right. I used that merely as comment in my diary. I considered in September was one of the most momentous periods in Japanese history and in American-Japanese relations. I discussed the general situation and then I referred to the material used in that telegram, although it was not the telegram itself.

Senator FERGUSON. Thank you.

Mr. GREW. Shall I proceed to read?

Senator FERGUSON. I wish you would.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREW (reading):

One. The observations of Mr. A. T. Steele concerning (?) in Japan conveyed in Peiping's 300, August 31, 3 p. m., recently received here by mail, have had my careful attention. In general terms I believe that Mr. Steele's observations are well founded and [1669] sound, a belief which applies equally to the important considerations advanced in the final two paragraphs of the summary of Mr. Steele's statement.

I think, in order to make this perfectly clear, that telegram would probably be helpful to the committee and could be produced undoubtedly, Mr. General Counsel.

Senator FERGUSON. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the counsel get a copy of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the telegram from Mr. Steele?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; that is a telegram from our then location in Peiping, No. 300, August 31, 3 p. m. That could be found in the files and could be produced.

The CHAIRMAN. The counsel will produce it for the record.¹

Who was Mr. Steele, if I might inquire?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Steele was a prominent correspondent of the Far East. He was on one of the Chicago papers. I am not quite sure at the present time which—I think the Chicago Daily News, but I am not quite sure. He had a high reputation in the Far East.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

Mr. GREW (reading):

His thesis that "firmness is the soundest and safest American naval policy" and that "the risks involved are much less than is commonly supposed in the United States" is however of such far-reaching gravity as to deserve carefully studied analysis and comment. In presenting the [1670] present trend of my thoughts on this general subject I have constantly in mind the fact that the shaping of our policy vis a vis Japan must depend upon the broader viewpoint of the administration in Washington and upon many factors which may not be apparent to this Embassy.

Two. The situation and circumstances which led to the series of exploratory conversations with the former Foreign Minister Arita (my 400, June 3, noon) and to the recommendations for considering steps leading toward the negotiation of a new treaty of commerce with Japan (my 562, July 11, 9 p. m.) have now obviously passed. I earnestly hope that the time will come when I shall feel justified in renewing those recommendations, but with the fall of the Yonal cabinet and the radically altered policy and outlook of the present set up in Japan, further initiative on our part in proposing conciliatory measures at the present time would appear to be futile and unwise.

Three. Whatever may be the intentions of the present Japanese Government, there can be no doubt that the army and other elements in the country see in the present world situation a "golden opportunity" to carry into effect their dreams of expansion; the German victories have gone to their heads like strong wine; until recently they have believed implicitly in the defeat of Great [1671] Britain; they have argued that the war will probably (*) (end) in a quick German victory and that it is well to consolidate Japan's position in greater East Asia while Germany is still acquiescent and before the eventual hypothetical strengthening of German naval power might rob Japan of far flung control in the Far East; they have discounted effective opposition on the part of the United States although carefully watching our attitude. The ability of the saner heads in and out of the Government to control these elements has been and is doubtful.

Four. Now, however, I sense a gradual change in the outburst of exhilaration which greeted the new Government on its inception. The Japanese Government, the army and navy and the public are beginning to see that Germany may not defeat Great Britain after all, a hypothesis which I have constantly emphasized to my Japanese contacts in the plainest language and now to add to that dawning realization, they see the United States and Great Britain steadily drawing closer together in measures of mutual defense with the American acquisition of naval bases in British possessions in the Atlantic and with our support of the British fleet by the transfer of fifty destroyers. They hear reports of our haste to build a two-ocean navy and of our considering the strengthening of our naval bases [1672] in the Pacific and even rumors of our eventual use of Singapore. These developments and rumors are having their logical effect on Japanese consciousness. On the one hand they tend to emphasize the potential danger which Japan faces from eventual positive action by the United States and Great Britain acting together (the danger of combined Anglo-American measures has long been appreciated in Japan as evidenced by efforts to avoid irritating the United States and Great Britain simultaneously) or by the United States alone. On the other hand they furnish cogent arguments for those elements in Japan who seek economic and political security by obtaining markets and source of raw materials wholly within the control of Japan. As for Germany, the Japanese are beginning to question whether even a victorious Germany would not provide a new hazard to their expansionist program both in China and in the southward advance. Meanwhile the future position and attitude of Soviet Russia is always an uncertain factor in their calculations. These various considerations are beginning to give them concern.

[1673] High pressure diplomacy, especially in the Netherlands East Indies, will continue, but the fact that the Japanese Government was able even temporarily to restrain the military forces from their plans for a headlong invasion of Indo-China indicates a degree of caution which I do not doubt was at least partially influenced by the attitude of the United States. What Mr. Steele describes as the "nibbling policy" appears likely to continue until the world situation, and especially the attitude of the United States, becomes clearer.

Five. In previous communications I have expressed the opinion that sanctions by the United States would set Japanese-American relations on a downward curve. It is true that our own newly instituted program of national preparedness now justifies measures which need not fall within the realm of outright sanctions. On the other hand we must envisage the probability that drastic embargoes on the export of such important products as petroleum, of which the United States is known to possess a superabundance, would be interpreted by the Japanese Government and people as actually (?) sanctions which [1674] might and probably would lead to some form of retaliation. The risks which Mr. Steele sees as "much less than is commonly supposed in the United States" will depend less upon the careful calculations of the Japanese Government than upon the uncalculating "do or die" temper of the army and navy in case they should attribute to the United States the responsibility for the failure of their expansionist plans. Such retaliation might take the form of counter measures by the Government but there would be even greater likelihood of some sudden stroke by the army or navy without the Government's prior knowledge or authorization. These risks constitute an imponderable factor which cannot at any given moment be weighed with assurance. It would be short, however, to deny their existence or to proceed with the formulation of policy and the adoption of measures without giving these potential risks full consideration and determining the wisdom of squarely facing these risks.

Six. In the ensuing observations I am carefully considering both of the fundamental purposes of my mission, namely the protection and advancement of American interests and the maintenance of good relations between the United States and Japan. When these two [1675] desiderata conflict, the preponderant emphasis to be placed on the one or the other is a matter of high policy which does not lie within my competency. My object is merely to place before the administration in Washington the outstanding factors in the situation as we see them from the angle of this Embassy. Having carefully set forth the inevitable hazards involved in a strong policy I now respectfully turn to the hazards involved in a laissez faire policy.

Seven. In discussing the specific question of American-Japanese relations it is impossible to view that problem in its proper perspective without considering it as part and parcel of the world problem which, briefly, presents the following aspects: (A) The United States and Great Britain are the leaders of a great group of English speaking nations around the world standing for a "way of life" which is being appallingly threatened today by a group of Germany, Italy, Soviet Russia and Japan whose avowed purpose is to impose by force of arms their will upon conquered peoples. In attempting to deal with such powers the uses of diplomacy are in general bankrupt.

[1676] Diplomacy may occasionally retard but cannot effectively stem the tide. Force or the display of force can alone prevent these powers from attaining their objectives. Japan today is one of the predatory powers; she has submerged all moral and ethical sense and has become frankly and unashamedly opportunist, seeking at every turn to profit by the weakness of others. Her policy of southward expansion is a definite threat to American interests in the Pacific and is a thrust at the British Empire in the east.

(b) American security has admittedly depended in a measure upon the existence of the British fleet which in turn has been, and could only have been, supported by the British Empire.

(c) If we conceive it to be in our interest to support the British Empire in this hour of her travail, and I most emphatically do so conceive it, we must strive by every means to preserve the status quo in the Pacific at least until the European war has been won or lost. In my opinion this cannot be done nor can our interests be further adequately and properly protected by merely registering disapproval and keeping a careful record thereof. It is clear that Japan has [1677] been deterred from taking greater liberties with American interests only out of respect for our potential power; it is equally (*) that she has trampled upon our rights to a degree in precise ratio to the strength of her conviction that the American people would not permit that power to be used. Once conviction is shaken it is possible that the uses of diplomacy may again become accepted.

(d) If then we can by firmness preserve the status quo in the Pacific until and if Britain emerges successfully from the European struggle, Japan will be faced with a situation which will make it impossible for the present opportunist philosophy to maintain the upper hand. At a moment it might then be possible to undertake a readjustment of the whole Pacific problem on a fair, frank, and equitable basis to the lasting benefit of both the United States and of Japan. Until such time as there is a complete regeneration of thought in this country, a show of force, together with a determination to employ it if need be, can alone contribute effectively to the achievement of such an outcome and to our own future security.

[1678] Eight. Passing from the general to the specific problem that now confronts us, and with the foregoing picture in mind, I applauded the timeliness of the instruction contained in the second part of Department's 331, August 28, 6 p. m. concerning the Shanghai defense sectors. The Department will have seen from my 791, September 4, 11 p. m. paragraph No. two that the Foreign Minister's complaint as to alleged threats on our part was met with the statement that what we have in mind is "a logical reciprocal adjustment of international relations". I feel that the appropriate time has come to proceed, gradually but progressively, with that adjustment. In the present situation and outlook I believe that the time has come when continued patience and restraint on the part of the United States may and probably will lead to developments which will render Japanese-American relations progressively precarious. It is my hope that if the Japanese Government and people can be led to believe that their hand is being overplayed, there will eventually ensue a reverse swing of the pendulum in which a reconstruction of good relations between the [1679] United States and Japan will be possible. The alternative seems to me to be hopeless.

Nine. The foregoing analysis, which has been drafted with care over a period of several days, has the expressed complete concurrence of the Naval, Military and Commercial Attaches and all other members of the immediate staff of this Embassy.

(End of message.)

(Signed) GREW.

(The above asterisk indicates an apparent omission.)

[1680] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, that was a very well considered instrument.

You had spent considerable time on that instrument and it was well considered?

Mr. GREW. I had.

Senator FERGUSON. And will you give us the specific reason, if you had one, for sending it?

Mr. GREW. I can't say that there was any specific reason other than my duty to express to our Government from time to time my understanding of the situation in Japan and the Far East and from time to time my representations as to what policy could be followed in Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. You wanted Washington to have the information that they might know how you felt.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, is it true that that was a change of attitude as far as you were concerned?

If you will look at page 272 of your book, I would like to have you read into the record what your attitude was on December 5, 1938, on that same question.

I think it is expressed in "meanwhile there were buzzings * * *."

Mr. GREW (reading) :

Meanwhile there were buzzings as to possible financial help to Chiang Kai-shek from American and British sources, and discussions as to possible economic measures [1681] against Japan. As to the latter, no matter how much I might personally like to see retaliation for the things that Japan is doing to us and to our interests in the Far East, I have consistently recommended against such measures unless we are prepared to see them through to their logical conclusion, and that might mean war, for sanctions are always a potential incentive to ultimate war. The British, at least some British, believe that Anglo-American economic sanctions would bring Japan to her knees in short order. I disagree with that thesis. I know Japan and the Japanese pretty well. They are a hardy race, accustomed throughout their history to catastrophe and disaster; theirs is the "do or die" spirit, more deeply ingrained than in almost any other people. They would pull in their belts another notch and continue. They can live on rice and, if necessary, fight on rice. The deprival of oil, rubber and other necessities of war might cramp their style, once their considerable supplies had given out, but it would take a long time to bring about capitulation, I think.

Foreign support to Chiang Kai-shek is another matter altogether, and this does not need to be done officially, no matter what official blessings might accompany the unofficial act.

Thus lay the land up to the end of November.

[1682] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, can you state to the committee what there was that changed you from that statement and belief in 1938 to the statement of September 12, 1940?

Mr. GREW. Well, a great deal of water had gone over the falls, Senator, between those two messages; there was 2 years between them. The Japanese Army was steadily encroaching further into the Far East and into East Asia. They were potentially threatening our vital interests. And from that point of view the situation had very much changed indeed. That, I think, was the main reason why I sent that telegram, but one must remember that my so-called green-light telegram was not something which had developed in a question of a few hours or a few days. It meant a progressive line of thinking over a period to the crux of the situation.

Senator FERGUSON. You wanted the State Department to know of your change?

Mr. GREW. Oh, very definitely.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I will ask you to look on page 359 of your book, the letter beginning "Dear Frank," on that same page. That is to the President?

Mr. GREW. 359?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is on page 359 but the following page looks like 358; the pages seem to be misnumbered there.

[1683] Senator FERGUSON. It is all right in my copy, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GREW. That is my letter to the President of December 14, 1940.

Senator FERGUSON. I ask you to read where it begins "After eight years of effort." Read that paragraph.

Mr. GREW. This is my letter to the President of December 14, 1940.

After eight years of effort to build up something permanently constructive in American-Japanese relations, I find that diplomacy has been defeated by trends and forces utterly beyond its control, and that our work has been swept away as if by a typhoon, with little or nothing remaining to show for it. Japan has become openly and unashamedly one of the predatory nations and part of a system which aims to wreck about everything that the United States stands for. Only insuperable obstacles will now prevent the Japanese from digging in permanently in China and from pushing the southward advance, with economic control as a preliminary to political domination in the areas marked down. Economic obstacles, such as may arise from American embargoes, will seriously handicap Japan in the long run, but meanwhile they tend to push the Japanese onward [1684] in a forlorn hope of making themselves economically self-sufficient.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do I understand that you felt that diplomacy had failed and that we were going from a stage of diplomacy to some other instrument to settle the differences? You say:

* * * I find that diplomacy has been defeated * * *

Mr. GREW. I said diplomacy has been defeated by trends and forces at that moment. As I recollect it it was after the fall of the Konoye Cabinet with which I had been able to work fairly closely in the hope of being able to build up our relations. When this Cabinet fell and a new Cabinet came in I saw that that work had been pretty well wrecked.

Senator FERGUSON. What Cabinet came in in December of 1940?

Mr. GREW. December 1940. I think that was one of Konoye's Cabinets. I will look. I have the complete record here.

That is Konoye's. The second Konoye Cabinet came in on July 22, 1940.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the next step if diplomacy failed? You use this expression:

Only insuperable obstacles will not prevent the Japanese from digging in permanently in China and from pushing the [1685] southward advance * * *— and so forth.

What is the next instrument?

Mr. GREW. Senator, I had in mind all the time—

Senator FERGUSON. What were you trying to convey to the State Department?

Mr. GREW. I was trying to convey to the State Department that the time had come to take strong measures.

[1686] Senator FERGUSON. Of course, this is to the President.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. And he is the one in charge of foreign relations. So you took it right to the top.

Mr. GREW. No. I was also reporting to Mr. Hull at that time, of course, along the same lines as indicated by that so-called green-light telegram.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I do find in the records your reports to Mr. Hull along this same line in December, and let us have that.

Mr. GREW. Well, the one in September covers that ground.

Senator FERGUSON. Oh, the one in September covers that?

Mr. GREW. The so-called green-light telegram covers that ground completely.

Senator FERGUSON. I see. So the one in September covered it to the State Department and this one was to the President, on the 14th of December?

Mr. GREW. That is right; that is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Thank you.

Mr. GREW. There were probably other telegrams to Mr. Hull along the same lines but I haven't the full records before me so I cannot tell you.

My thought was that by taking these measures we would [1687] eventually bring at least the thinking, the sane-minded statesmen in Japan to the realization that unless they stopped in their tracks they were going to have war with the United States and Great Britain and other countries.

Now, that is precisely what happened. When Prince Konoye came into power for the third time, his third Cabinet, with all his black background and record and, certainly, as Mr. Hull pointed out the other day, he had been responsible for one of the worst train of acts of international banditry in world history, he still was an intelligent man and he, in my opinion, as a result of the policy that we followed, the measures we had taken, he saw the handwriting on the wall.

He knew a good deal more about our country than the hot-headed militarists did; he had been to our country, knew something about our productive capacity, knew something about our national spirit. In my opinion, he realized that Japan, if she got into war with us and with other countries, other western powers, would probably in the end be defeated and would emerge as a third or a fifth rate power.

In other words, I think at that time some of those more intelligent statesmen in Japan realized that they were on the brink of an abyss and it was my belief at that time that they tried their best to reverse the engine. It was too late to do it but they tried to do it.

[1688] Therefore, this policy which I had recommended had led up to that position where these intelligent Japanese statesmen, quite apart from the hot-headed militarists and all the rest of them, realized that they ought to step back and it was my hope that they would step back and, as I said in this telegram, that this would lead to a complete remolding of our relations with Japan and a remolding of the entire situation in the Far East. That was always my hope.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, on the bottom of page 360, in the same letter, you say this:

It is important constantly to bear in mind the fact that if we take measures—and this is in quotations—

“short of war” with no real intention to carry those measures to their final conclusion if necessary, such lack of intention will be all too obvious to the Japanese, who will proceed undeterred, and even with greater incentive, on their way. Only if they become certain that we mean to fight if called upon to do so will our preliminary measures stand some chance of proving effective and of removing the necessity for war—the old story of Sir Edward Grey in 1914.

So you had in mind to convey to the President that it was your opinion and the time had come for the State Department, for our foreign relations to be such that we would [1689] indicate that we were willing to go the whole way and that would be even to the point of war.

Mr. GREW. I felt at that time entirely certain about that, Senator, for the very reason that unless we were willing to build up our forces and to build up our armaments to the point where we would be ready for anything, the Japanese would know it in a hurry and we never could get away with any bluff of any kind. I wanted our forces built up as an insurance against war.

Senator FERGUSON. And you had in mind then that we should build an army and a navy that we could implement every policy that you were telling the President that we should take?

Mr. GREW. I felt that that was an essential part of the policy, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, I will ask you whether or not when the President in his letter of January 21, 1941 said [reading]:

I find myself in decided agreement with your conclusion,

And then I turn to page 362, you are talking about that we go to the point of even going to war, I will ask you to read what he said to you on page 362, beginning with, “You suggest as one of the chief factors.”

[1690] He is talking now, as I understand it, the President, about war. Will you read that?

Mr. GREW. Which paragraph is that on 362?

Senator FERGUSON. It is the first paragraph.

Mr. GREW. “You suggest”?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW (reading):

You suggest as one of the chief factors in the problem of our attitude toward Japan the question whether our getting into war with Japan would so handicap our help to Britain in Europe as to make the difference to Britain between victory and defeat. In this connection it seems to me that we must consider whether, if Japan should gain possession of the region of the Netherlands East Indies and the Malay Peninsula, the chances of England's winning in her struggle with Germany would not be decreased thereby. The British Isles, the British in those Isles, have been able to exist and to defend themselves not only because they have prepared strong local defenses but also because as the heart and the nerve center of the British Empire they have been able to draw upon vast resources for their sustenance and to bring into operation against their enemies economic, military, and naval pressures on a world-wide scale. They live by [1691] importing goods from all parts of the world and by utilizing large overseas financial resources. They are defended not only by measures of defense carried out locally but also by distant and widespread economic, military, and naval activities which both contribute to the maintenance of their supplies, deny certain sources of supply to their enemies, and prevent those enemies from concentrating the full force of their armed power against the heart and the nerve center of the Empire.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, we could take that as meaning that notwithstanding your warning the President was conveying to you that he felt that it was necessary to go all out on this question; that he understood you, in other words.

Mr. GREW. Well, you mean that it would appear from this paragraph that the President accepted that position?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Well, I think, Senator, from the letter as a whole that would be clear.

Senator FERGUSON. That would follow.

Mr. GREW. That would be clear.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, I will ask you in the telegram that you read, the original, the "green light" telegram, whether or not there is not a clause in there about us using the Singapore base? Do you remember that?

[1692] Mr. GREW. Yes. It was, as I remember it, we might have. Let me see how that was stated about that.

Senator FERGUSON. How did you express that?

Mr. GREW. I have it right here. That is the reference, Senator, on page 3, paragraph numbered 4 of my telegram 827, September 12, 9 p. m. I had better read the whole paragraph to make the context clear.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW (reading):

Now, however, I sense a gradual change in the outburst of exhilaration which greeted the new Government on its inception. The Japanese Government, the army and navy and the public are beginning to see that Germany may not defeat Great Britain after all, a hypothesis which I have constantly emphasized to my Japanese contacts in the plainest language and now to add to that dawning realization, they see the United States and Great Britain steadily drawing closer together in measures of mutual defense with the American acquisition of naval bases in British possessions in the Atlantic and with our support of the British fleet by the transfer of fifty destroyers. They hear reports of our haste to build a two-ocean navy and of our considering the strengthening of our naval bases in the Pacific and even rumors of our eventual use of [1693] Singapore.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. There was nothing more definite than that.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, had you heard any rumors or information from the State Department—first, had you any rumors in relation to any agreement we might have, or some rights that we might have to use Singapore as a naval base?

Mr. GREW. So far as I recollect I received nothing of that kind from the State Department, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you heard rumors there?

Mr. GREW. Well, no, sir; I cannot say that I heard rumors.

Senator FERGUSON. Did your Navy or Army attaché there in Tokyo give you any information on that?

Mr. GREW. They passed on to me, so far as I know, all the important information that they received. I do not recollect that either of them passed on to me any information to that effect.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you give us any opinion as to where you may have received that information of rumors?

Mr. GREW. I did not receive that information, Senator. It is clear from the telegram that that was information which the Japanese had heard and were considering. I do not know where they got it from.

[1694] Senator FERGUSON. Had they advised you that they had such information?

Mr. GREW. Well, of course, going back to this telegram, after all these years I cannot tell you exactly how that came to me. It was very likely in the Japanese press; it may have been passed on to me by individuals. All I can say was, "They hear reports." I cannot be more definite than that. I could not clamp that down.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not know, though, but what the Army or the Navy attaché there may have given you the information also?

Mr. GREW. I could not answer that question, Senator, without looking back in the records.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the British Ambassador ever give you that information?

Mr. GREW. I do not believe so. I have no recollection of it.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever know of any agreement between the United States and Great Britain as to the defense of Singapore?

Mr. GREW. I did not.

Senator FERGUSON. Now we will go to page 556 of Foreign Relations. That is the note of August the 17th, 1941.

Mr. GREW. Five hundred and what?

[1695] Senator FERGUSON. 556 of Foreign Relations.

Mr. GREW. 556; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I am particularly interested in the last paragraph, the one I had you read this morning.

Mr. GREW. Yes, we had that this morning.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, will you tell me, if you can, when you first considered that message and what did it mean to you?

Mr. GREW. Well, I cannot tell you on what date I received the message. I probably received it on the day of its delivery. You must remember there is a day difference between Tokyo and the United States, so that anything that appeared in the print—

Senator FERGUSON. It was delivered in Tokyo—

Mr. GREW. On August 18.

Senator FERGUSON. It was delivered on Sunday and you probably got it Monday?

Mr. GREW. I probably would have gotten it Monday. Monday would have been the 19th.

Senator FERGUSON. What did that message—what did that information mean to you? That was coming from Washington to you.

Mr. GREW. Yes. It meant that we were following the policy which I had constantly advocated.

[1696] Senator FERGUSON. That was the policy that you had advocated?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the State Department give you any other information on that instrument?

Mr. GREW. Not to my knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. Did your Army or Navy attaché give you any information?

Mr. GREW. Not to my knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you consider that an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. By no means.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I want to read to you on page 2 of exhibit 16 this information, and ask you whether it was conveyed to you.

This is a document to the President of the United States dated November the 5th, 1941, and signed by—this particular one is signed by W. P. Scobey, colonel, G. S. C. secretary, and it is on a message, attached to a message by the Chief of Staff, General Marshall, to the Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Stark, and it is being delivered to the President. [Reading:]

Action of the United States in the Far East in Support of China—At the request of Admiral Stark, Captain Schuirmann gave a statement of the action taken at [1697] the State Department meeting on Saturday morning, November 1, at which a discussion was held on the Far Eastern situation. Captain Schuirmann states that the meeting was occasioned by messages from Chiang Kai-shek and General Magruder, urging the United States to warn Japan against making an attack on China through Yunnan and suggesting that the United States urge Great Britain to support more fully opposition to Japan. He pointed out that on August 17, following the President's return from the meeting at sea with Mr. Churchill, the President had issued an ultimatum to Japan that it would be necessary for the United States to take action in case of further Japanese aggression. He further stated that Mr. Hull was of the opinion that there was no use to issue any additional warnings to Japan if we can't back them up, and he desired to know if the military authorities would be prepared to support further warnings by the State Department. A second meeting was held at the State Department on Sunday, November 2, at which time it was proposed that the British should send some planes to Thailand and that Japan should be warned against movement into Siberia.

Now, was that ever called to your attention, that the Army and the Navy had considered that instrument of August the 17th as an ultimatum?

[1698] . Mr. GREW. I do not think that that was ever called to my attention, Senator, but I would like to say right here that the application of the term "ultimatum" to that document could not be well taken owing to the fact that the conversations between the United States and Japan continued for a long time thereafter and if you submit an ultimatum to a country, you do not talk any more; it is finished.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, the ultimatum was on this point, as I understood this morning, Mr. Grew.

Senator LUCAS. Whom is that from?

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

At the request of Admiral Stark, Captain Schuirmann gave a statement. * * *

He pointed out that on August 17, following the President's return from the meeting at sea with Mr. Churchill, the President had issued an ultimatum to Japan that it would be necessary for the United States to take action in case of further Japanese aggression.

In other words, if Japan made further aggression after the 17th of August 1941 that we would act and that that was an ultimatum.

Mr. GREW. The fact remains, Senator, that the Japanese did take a great deal of action after that date and no such action was taken by us and meanwhile the conversations in [1699] Washington continued right along.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to read another statement and ask you whether it was ever conveyed to you, or whether it was your understanding that you had ever conveyed this information to the State Department. On page 4 of the same instrument [reading]:

Discussing the situation Admiral Ingersoll pointed out that the fleet strength at the present time is seriously handicapped—and that is October the 5, 1941.

Now, reading again:

by the absence of certain naval units of major category which are in the repair yards, and it was felt that the present moment was not the opportune time to get brash. Explaining further the State Department conferences, Captain Schulmann stated that the State Department did not feel that it was necessary for the United States to take immediate action, even if stern warnings should be issued. In this connection, he read Mr. Hornbeck's statement. Admiral Ingersoll felt that the State Department was under the impression that Japan could be defeated in military action in a few weeks.

Now, did you ever give any information to our State Department that would lead our State Department to the notion that in case we got into war with Japan that they could be [1700] defeated in a military action in a few weeks?

Mr. GREW. I definitely did not, Senator, because I did not—

Senator FERGUSON. Did you give them the opposite, that it would be a longer war than that?

Mr. GREW. I cannot tell you whether I gave any definite estimate at that time or not; probably not. But they had plenty of reports from me as to the toughness of the Japanese Army and Navy. I can bring out passage after passage to indicate that; that they were a fanatical race, they were a do-or-die sort of people, they would probably fight to the last ditch and that they were exceedingly military. I brought that out continually right from the very beginning of my stay in Tokyo, when I wrote that the Japanese Army is built for war, prepared for war, and anxious to go to war.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, did the State Department ever convey to you that that was the attitude of the State Department of the United States?

Mr. GREW. I do not remember that they ever did.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, you would remember such a statement, don't you think?

Mr. GREW. I think I would.

Senator FERGUSON. It is so contrary to what your views were that it probably would have impressed you very keenly.

[1701] Mr. GREW. I think I would have come back very quickly on a statement of that kind.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I have read you from the exhibit here. Whose views, when they speak about the State Department, whose views would that be? Mr. Hull was the head, was he not?

Mr. GREW. I cannot tell you who expressed those views, Senator, because I was not here. I frankly do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever discuss with Mr. Hull that question, as to whether or not that was his views of October 5 or near October 5, 1941?

Mr. GREW. I do not think that I ever have.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever discuss it with Mr. Hornbeck?

Mr. GREW. I do not believe I ever did.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any correspondence with Mr. Hornbeck?

Mr. GREW. I had a certain amount of correspondence from time to time of an informal nature but I do not recollect—

Senator FERGUSON. Official correspondence?

Mr. GREW. I beg pardon?

Senator FERGUSON. Official correspondence?

Mr. GREW. No; it was unofficial correspondence; purely personal correspondence, and I do not recollect that that [1702] subject was ever touched upon in our correspondence. I doubt that it was.

Senator FERGUSON. When you were here in 1939 you had a conversation with the President and with Mr. Hull?

Mr. GREW. I did.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you state as to whether or not at that time you told the President your opinion about the Japanese as far as fighting is concerned, that they could not be bluffed, as you used the expression this morning, and as to how strong they were in a military sense?

Mr. GREW. I have no record of that conversation but it is my opinion that in all probability I did do just that.

Senator FERGUSON. And would you say that you had the same kind of a conversation with Mr. Hull?

Mr. GREW. I would say that I probably did but, also, I have no record of that conversation, so I cannot answer your question definitely, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, how would you account, you being in Japan and knowing the situation, for our State Department to get the idea that I have just read to you as Admiral Ingersoll felt, that the State Department was under the impression that Japan could be defeated in a military action in a few weeks?

Mr. GREW. That is a question, Senator, which I frankly [1703] am not competent to answer. I was not here at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, it certainly was not from anything that you gave the State Department?

Mr. GREW. It was not what?

Senator FERGUSON. From anything that you ever gave the State Department?

Mr. GREW. No; it certainly was not.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, getting back to Captain Schuirmann's idea of the note of August 17. That note—have you got it before you there?

Mr. GREW. The note itself?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Or Admiral Schuirmann's?

Senator FERGUSON. Admiral Schuirmann. Have you got that?

Mr. GREW. Which page is that on?

Senator FERGUSON. It is on page 3.

Mr. GREW. Can you find that for me, where it is?

Mr. GESELL. I think there may have been some confusion about the exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, it is marked on the outside, "Exhibit 16."

Mr. GESELL. Yes. Only the first two or three pages are a memorandum to the President. The remaining portion is a [1704] minute of a meeting which amplifies the memorandum to the President.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you understand then that the memorandum attached never went to the President?

Mr. GESELL. I have no evidence that it ever did.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, have you any evidence that it did not?

Mr. GESELL. I have no evidence either way.

Senator FERGUSON. The reason is I got that as one exhibit and it is attached and the President has acted on the instrument, as I understand it, when we come—

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. The next is November 14, 1941.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. The memorandum is dated, however, under date of November 5, 1941, and the notes of the meeting are dated November 3, 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be correct.

Mr. MURPHY. And they are separate papers apparently.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, but there isn't any showing here that it all did not go to the President because it is all on the same subject.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the counsel read the whole [1705] instrument into the record so it will be clear.

Mr. MURPHY. May I just make this one statement?

The CHAIRMAN. What is it, Congressman?

Mr. MURPHY. I just wanted to say that the statement, the memorandum that went to the President would carry the signatures of the Chief of Staff and Chief of Naval Operations, and on the body of the statement itself there is nothing incorporated in it, there isn't any reference at all to the minutes of the meeting.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, it is difficult—that is the difficulty we run into when the committee only gets photostatic copies. We cannot tell whether this is a signed one or what.

Mr. MURPHY. But there is no reference—

Senator FERGUSON. This is a mimeographed copy rather than a photostatic copy.

Mr. MURPHY. But there is no incorporation of the minutes in the message by reference, at least.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to have read into the record at this place the instrument, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Which one is that? The memorandum to the President?

Senator FERGUSON. No, the whole thing; November 5, the one from the Chief of Staff and the Chief of Naval [1706] Operations. It is addressed to the President. It is an estimate concerning the far eastern situation.

Mr. MURPHY. Thirteen pages.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is a very lengthy document. It is not in the transcript, it has not gone into the hearings as yet?

Mr. MURPHY. It has been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been offered as an exhibit, but has it been printed in the hearing?

Mr. GESELL. No; it has not, Senator. I suggest we could just arrange to have it spread upon the record at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. If we could have it spread upon the record at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. That is agreeable, and it will be put into the record here at this point and made a part of the transcript.

Serial 0130012

WAR AND NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 5, 1941.

Memorandum for the President:

Subject: Estimate concerning Far Eastern Situation.

The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff have reexamined the military situation in the Far East, particularly in the light of messages recently received from the American Ambassador to Chungking, the Magruder Mission, and the United States Naval Attaché. These despatches have indicated it to be Chiang-Kai-Shek's belief that a Japanese attack on Kunming is imminent, and that military support from outside sources, particularly by the use of United States and British air units, is the sole hope for defeat of this threat. The Secretary of State has requested advice as to the attitude which this Government should take toward a Japanese offensive against Kunming and the Burma Road.

There is little doubt that a successful Japanese offensive against the Burma Road would be a very severe blow to the Chinese Central Government. The result might even be the collapse of further effective military resistance by that Government, and thus the liquidation by Japan of the "China incident". If use of the Burma Road is lost, United States [1708] and the British Commonwealth aid to China will be seriously curtailed for some months. If resistance by the Chinese Central Government ceases, the need for Japanese troops in China will be reduced. These troops can then be employed elsewhere, after the lapse of time sufficient to permit their withdrawal.

Concentration of Japanese troops for the contemplated offensive, based in northern Indo-China, cannot be completed in less than about two months, although initial offensive operations might be undertaken before that time. The advance toward Kunming over nearly three hundred miles of rough country, with poor communications, will be extremely difficult. The maintenance of supply lines will not be easy. The Chinese, on favorable defense terrain, would have a good chance of defeating this offensive by the use of ground troops alone, provided those troops are adequate in quality and numbers.

The question that the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff have taken under consideration is whether or not the United States is justified in undertaking offensive military operations with U. S. forces against Japan, to prevent her from severing the Burma Road. They consider that such operations, however well-disguised, would lead to war.

At the present time the United States Fleet in the Pacific is inferior to the Japanese Fleet and cannot undertake an unlimited strategic offensive in the Western Pacific. In order to be able to do so, it would have to be strengthened [1709] by withdrawing all¹ naval vessels from the Atlantic except those assigned to local defense forces. An unlimited offensive by the Pacific Fleet would require tremendous merchant tonnage, which could only be withdrawn from services now considered essential. The result of withdrawals from the Atlantic of naval and merchant strength might well cause the United Kingdom to lose the Battle of the Atlantic in the near future.

The only existing² plans for war against Japan in the Far East are to conduct offensive war, in cooperation with the British and Dutch, for the defense of the Philippines and the British and Dutch East Indies. The Philippines are now being reinforced. The present combined naval, air, and ground forces will make attack on the islands a hazardous undertaking. By about the middle of December, 1941, United States air and submarine strength in the Philippines will have become a positive threat to any Japanese operations south of Formosa. The U. S. Army air forces in the Philippines will have reached [1710] the projected strength by February or March, 1942. The potency of this threat will have then increased to a point where it might well be a deciding factor in deterring Japan in operations in the areas south and west of the Philippines. By this time, additional British naval and air reinforcements to Singapore will have arrived. The general defensive strength of the entire southern area against possible Japanese operations will then have reached impressive proportions.

Until such time as the Burma Road is closed, aid can be extended to Chiang-Kai-Shek by measures which probably will not result in war with Japan. These measures are; continuation of economic pressure against Japan, supplying increasing amounts of munitions under the Lend-Lease, and continuation and acceleration of aid to the American Volunteer Group.

The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff are in accord in the following conclusions:

(a) The basic military policies and strategy agreed to in the United States-British Staff conversations remain sound. The primary objective of the two nations is the defeat of Germany. If Japan be defeated and Germany remained undefeated, decision will still have not been reached. In any case, an unlimited offensive war should not be undertaken against Japan, since such a war would greatly weaken the combined effort in the Atlantic [1711] against Germany, the most dangerous enemy.

(b) War between the United States and Japan should be avoided while building up defensive forces in the Far East, until such time as Japan attacks or directly threatens territories whose security to the United States is of very great importance. Military action against Japan should be undertaken only in one or more of the following contingencies:

(1) A direct act of war by Japanese armed forces against the territory or mandated territory of the United States, the British Commonwealth, or the Netherlands East Indies;

(2) The movement of Japanese forces into Thailand to the west of 100° East or south of 10° North; or into Portuguese Timor, New Caledonia, or the Loyalty Islands.

(c) If war with Japan can not be avoided, it should follow the strategic lines of existing war plans; i. e., military operations should be primarily defensive, with the object of holding territory, and weakening Japan's economic position.

[1712] (d) Considering world strategy, a Japanese advance against Kuning, into Thailand except as previously indicated, or an attack on Russia, would not justify intervention by the United States against Japan.

(e) All possible aid short of actual war against Japan should be extended to the Chinese Central Government.

(f) In case it is decided to undertake war against Japan, complete co-ordinated action in the diplomatic, economic, and military fields, should be undertaken in common by the United States, the British Commonwealth, and the Netherlands East Indies.

The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff recommend that the United States policy in the Far East be based on the above conclusions.

Specifically, they recommend:

That the dispatch of United States armed forces for intervention against Japan in China be disapproved.

That material aid to China be accelerated consonant with the needs of Russia, Great Britain, and our own forces.

That aid to the American Volunteer Group [1713] be continued and accelerated to the maximum practicable extent.

That no ultimatum be delivered to Japan.

Chief of Staff.

Chief of Naval Operations.

THE JOINT BOARD

Minutes of Meeting, November 3, 1941.

At the call of the Senior Member, the weekly meeting scheduled for November 5, 1941, was held today in Room 2003, Munitions Building. The meeting was called to order at 8:40 p. m.

Present:

Admiral H. R. Stark, U. S. N., Chief of Naval Operations, Presiding;
General G. C. Marshall, U. S. A., Chief of Staff;
Rear Admiral R. E. Ingersoll, U. S. N., Assistant Chief of Naval Operations;
Major General William Bryden, U. S. A., Deputy Chief of Staff;
Major General H. H. Arnold, U. S. A., Deputy Chief of Staff for Air;
Rear Admiral J. H. Towers, U. S. N., Chief of the Bureau [1714] of Aeronautics;

Brigadier General L. T. Gerow, U. S. A., Acting Assistant Chief of Staff, War Plans Division;

Captain O. M. Read, U. S. N., War Plans Division, Office of Naval Operations, in absence of Rear Admiral R. K. Turner; and Colonel W. P. Scobey, U. S. A., Secretary.

Additional Officers Present:

Major General R. C. Moore, U. S. A., Deputy Chief of Staff;
Colonel C. W. Bundy, U. S. A., War Plans Division, War Department General Staff;

Captain R. E. Schuirmann, U. S. N., Office of Naval Operations;

Commander F. P. Sherman, U. S. N., Office of Naval Operations; and Lieutenant Commander A. H. McCollum, U. S. N., Office of Naval Intelligence.

The Presiding Officer directed the minutes of the meeting of October 22, would stand approved unless there were objections. The minutes were approved.

The Secretary then announced the agenda for the meeting as follows:

Serial 693—Delivery of Aircraft to Great Britain.

Serial 732—Revision of Paragraph 109, "Joint Action [1715] of the Army and the Navy." Communications between Ship and Shore.

Serial 665-11—Allocation of Mechanical Time Fuze M43A2 to the Army and the Navy.

Serial 725—Coordination of Local Defense Measures in Bermuda and the West Indian Islands where United States Bases are being Established.—Revision requested by the British.

Discussion—Action of the United States in the Far East in support of China.

Discussion—Alternate Route via Canton Island for movement of airplanes to the Far East.

Action taken on the several subjects was as follows:

Serial 693—Delivery of Aircraft to Great Britain. Following a discussion of this subject, during which General Arnold stated that the development of airplane ferrying facilities to the British Isles was provided for in Serials 683-1 and 723, the Board approved the Joint Planning Committee report of October 23, 1941, and directed that the subject be stricken from the calendar.

Serial 732—Revision of Paragraph 109, Joint Action of the Army and the Navy. The Joint Planning Committee report was approved.

Serial 665-11—Allocation of Mechanical Time Fuze M43A2 to the Army and the Navy. The Joint Planning Committee report recommendation of October 30, 1941, was accepted and [1716] the Committee of Experts' report was approved.

Serial 725—Coordination of Local Defense Measures in Bermuda and the West Indian Islands where United States Bases are being established. The Secretary announced that the Joint Planning Committee report before the Board, recommended certain revisions in the United States-United Kingdom initial agreement, which was approved by The Joint Board on September 19, 1941; and that the revisions now requested by the British had been accepted by the United States representatives. Following a properly seconded motion, the Board voted to approve the Joint Planning Committee report of October 29, 1941.

Action of the United States in the Far East in Support of China.—At the request of Admiral Stark, Captain Schuirmann gave a statement of the action taken at the State Department meeting on Saturday morning, November 1, at which a discussion was held on the Far Eastern situation. Captain Schuirmann states that the meeting was occasioned by messages from Chiang Kai-shek and General Magruder, urging the United States to warn Japan against making an attack on China through Yunnan and suggesting that the United States urge Great Britain to support more fully opposition to Japan. He pointed out that on August 17, following the President's return from the meeting at sea with Mr. Churchill, the President had issued an ultimatum to Japan that it would be necessary for the United [1717] States to take action in case of further Japanese aggression. He further stated that Mr. Hull was of the opinion that there was no use to issue any additional warnings to Japan if we can't back them up, and he desired to know if the military authorities would be prepared to support further warnings by the State Department. A second meeting was held at the State Department on Sunday, November 2, at which time it was proposed that the British should send some planes to Thailand and that Japan should be warned against movement into Siberia.

Following Captain Schuirmann's presentation, Admiral Stark read a Navy Department estimate of the recent dispatches received from Chungking. Admiral Ingersoll, gave his personal review of the situation. A summary of this review was that:

a. The decision on the Far Eastern situation, made several months ago, is to make the major effort in the Atlantic, and if forced to fight in the Pacific, to engage in a limited offensive effort. The policy was stated in the U. S.-British Staff Conversations Report ABC-1.

b. A major war effort in the Pacific would require an enormous amount of shipping, which would have to come from the Atlantic and other essential areas.

c. A U. S. war in the Pacific would materially affect United States aid to England.

d. The requirements in tankers alone for support of a Pacific war would create a serious oil shortage in this [1718] country, and the United States fleet cannot be supported in the Pacific without auxiliary shipping and adequate supplies.

e. The shortest line of communication is flanked by Mandated Islands, and is vulnerable to Japanese attack. Two other routes are available for communications to the Far Eastern Theater: one via Australia; the other via Cape of Good Hope.

f. Assuming that the fleet could be moved to the Far East, no repair facilities are available at either Manila or Singapore; while there are docks, nevertheless the necessary machinery and facilities for making repairs are not present.

g. Manila is not as yet a secure base for the Fleet due to the lack of adequate antiaircraft protection for the anchorage.

This review pointed out that Japan is capable of launching an attack in five directions: viz, against Russia, the Philippines, into Yunnan, Thailand and against Malaya. Considering that Japan might initiate one or more of these five operations, United States' action should be: In case of Japanese attack against either the Philippines or British and Dutch positions the United States should resist the attack. In case of Japanese attack against Siberia, Thailand or China through Yunnan the United States should not declare war. The study concludes that the United States should defer offensive action in the Far East until the [1719] augmentation of United States military strength in the Philippines, particularly as to the increase in submarines and army forces, becomes available.

Discussing the situation Admiral Ingersoll pointed out that the fleet strength at the present time is seriously handicapped by the absence of certain naval units of major category which are in the repair yards, and it was felt that the present moment was not the opportune time to get brash. Explaining further the State Department conferences, Captain Schuirmann stated that the State Department did not feel that it was necessary for the United States to take immediate action, even if stern warnings should be issued. In this connection, he read Mr. Hornbeck's statement. Admiral Ingersoll felt that the State Department was under the impression that Japan could be defeated in military action in a few weeks.

General Marshall felt that the main involvement in the Far East would be Naval and that under this assumption, due consideration should be given to the fact that the Navy was now fighting a battle in the Atlantic. It was his information that the Japanese authorities had not as yet determined the action to be taken under the present situation. The information which he had received indicated that the Japanese authorities might be expected to decide upon the national policy by November 5. He then read General Gerow's analysis of the strength of the United States forces in the Far East and [1720] emphasized the danger of moving Army Air Forces away from their present station in the Philippines. It was his belief that as long as the augmented Army Air Force remained in the Philippines, Japanese action against the Philippines or towards the south would be a very hazardous operation. It was his belief that by the middle of December, the Army Forces in the Philippines would be of impressive strength, and this in itself would have a deterrent effect on Japanese operations.

Admiral Ingersoll gave summary of naval reinforcements scheduled for the Philippines. A stated number of submarine units en route to the Philippines. A stated number of submarine units en route to the Philippines were now in Guam. Other submarines scheduled for transfer to the Philippines were about to leave Hawaii. With reference to Japanese decision on National policy he felt that United States forces and shipping now being moved to the Philippines might be in danger if a decision adverse to United States interest should be made on November 5th. General Marshall emphasized the point that Japan could hardly take the risk of military operations with a powerful air and submarine force directly on the flank of their supply lines, and that when United States power is sufficiently developed in the Philippines, we would then have something to back up our statements. Until powerful United States forces had been built up in the Far East, it would take some very clever diplomacy to save the situation. It appeared that the basis of U. S. policy should be to make [1721] certain minor concessions which the Japanese could use in saving face. These concessions might be a relaxation on oil restrictions or on similar trade restrictions.

Following these discussions the Board adopted the following proposal submitted by Admiral Ingersoll and amended by suggestions made by Admiral Stark and General Marshall:

War Plans Division of the War and Navy Departments would prepare a memorandum for the President, as a reply to the State Department's proposed policy in the Far Eastern situation. The memorandum would take the following lines:

- Oppose the issuance of an ultimatum to Japan.
- Oppose U. S. military action against Japan should she move into Yunnan.
- Oppose the movement and employment of U. S. military forces in support of Chiang Kai-Shek.
- Advocate State Department action to put off hostilities with Japan as long as possible.
- Suggest agreements with Japan to tide the situation over for the next several months.
- Point out the effect and cost a U. S.-Japanese war in the Far East would have on defense aid to Great Britain and other nations being aided by the U. S.
- Emphasize the existing limitations on [1722] shipping and the inability of the U. S. to engage in a Far Eastern offensive operation without the transfer of the major portion of shipping facilities from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

On the question of gas and oil for the Philippines' Army Air Forces, General Arnold explained that the military authorities were building up reserves and were investigating reports that the Dutch East Indies were capable of supplying all United States and British requirements.

At this point, General Marshall presented a list of items of equipment considered necessary by the China Mission to enable China to maintain her war effort. He pointed out that the War Department was beset with many trials and difficulties in the allocation of Lend-Lease items as related to Great Britain, Russia, Dutch East Indies, China and other countries. In the case of Russia, a large amount of equipment allocated to that country would have to go via Archangel, Vladivostok or Basra. The shortage of shipping, the long lines of communications, and the difficult transport situation from the ports of debarkation might cause an inability to make prompt delivery of all equipment to its final destination. Under some conditions, this would mean piling up unused equipment at various localities, while at the same time other localities would suffer from shortage of equipment. The matter resolves itself into a question as to whom Lend-Lease material should be released. It was General Marshall's [1725] opinion that control of Lend-Lease distribution, and diversions incident thereto, is a strategic decision which should be made by The Joint Board. Since the matter of ocean tonnage is a critical feature in the delivery of Lend-Lease items and is related to the strategic situation, General Marshall felt that Admiral Land of the Maritime Commission should be called in to sit with The Joint Board in deciding matters of this nature. The Board agreed that Admiral Land should be asked to detail a member of his department to work with the Joint Planning Committee on reports involving the disposition of Lend-Lease materials. Navy members agreed to take the necessary steps to inform Admiral Land of this request.

Referring to the merchant shipping situation, Admiral Stark felt that merchant tonnage is so short and prospective requirements are so great that an effort should be made to get the 1942 merchant vessel construction program moved up to an A-1-a priority.

At the direction of Admiral Stark, Commander Sherman then read a report from War Plans Division, Office of Naval Operations, to the Chief of Naval Operations concerning the movement of airplanes to the Middle East for ultimate delivery to Russia. This report recommended that the Normandie be acquired to meet future requirements for transporting aircraft; that three additional sea trains also be acquired and placed in service without conversion; and that delivery of aircraft to the Middle East be effected by the use of these three sea [1724] trains plus the two sea trains U. S. S. Kitty Hawk and U. S. S. Hammondsport, already acquired and converted for Navy use. Copy of this report was furnished to the Deputy Chief of Staff for Air.

Alternate Route Via Canton Island for Movement of Airplanes.—Following a discussion of this subject the Board instructed that the following directive be given to the Joint Planning Committee:

It is directed that the Joint Planning Committee submit a report as to the action to be taken to complete the establishment of an additional landplane route between Hawaii and Australia, less vulnerable to hostile interference than is the existing route via Wake Island, and as to the defenses of additional air-dromes and landing fields acquired.

NOVEMBER 3, 1941.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:
Subject: Far Eastern Situation.

I. Discussion.

1. A conference was held at the State Department during the morning of November 1, 1941. Present were Secretary Hull, Under Secretary Welles, Mr. Hornbeck, other lesser State Department officials, and Capt. Schuirmann. U. S. N. The subject of discussion was the action which should be taken on the Magruder radiogram of October 28, 1941. Question arose as to the strength of U. S. forces in the Far East as affecting diplomatic pressure on Japan. Measures were discussed, such as sending U. S. Army Air Forces to China, which might lead to immediate involvement in war with Japan. Apparently, the statement of Chiang Kai-Shek, that an immediate Japanese attack on Kunming threatened and that this could be defeated only by the intervention of air forces, was accepted.

2. a. The War Department G-2 estimate (Tab A) does not support Chiang Kai-Shek's conclusions as to immediate initiation of a Japanese move toward Kunming. G-2 believes that: the movement if contemplated will not be initiated in less than two months; the movement will be very difficult over nearly 300 miles of roadless, broken country; the Chinese, in favorable defense terrain, can defeat this offensive by proper concentration and use of ground troops alone.

[1726] b. G-2 (Col. Bratton) agrees with the Magruder statement that with the fall of Kunming, Chinese resistance to Japan would be very seriously affected.

c. The G-2 estimate also covers the broader viewpoint of expected Japanese action.

3. An air estimate of the Far Eastern situation (Tab B) brings out the following: the most effective air aid to China can be given by units based in the Philippiners; there are, at present many shortages in ammunition and gasoline supply which will militate against a sustained effort; logistical difficulties, aside from general policy, make it undesirable to undertake operations of U. S. Army Air Force units in China.

4. The status of the Lend-Lease program for China is shown in Tab C.

5. The status of ground troops and defense reserves in the Philippine Department is shown in Tab D. The garrison has not reached the effective strength desired by General MacArthur. Deficiencies are being overcome by the dispatch of personnel and supplies from the United States and by accelerating the training and equipping of the Philippine Army. The present combined air and ground forces will make attack on the islands a hazardous undertaking. The dispatch of any considerable portion of the air garrison to China would leave Luzon open to serious risk of capture.

[1727] 6. Informal contact with officers of the local British Staff Mission indicate that the British have incomplete air forces for the defense of Singapore, would refuse to allow units of the Royal Air Force to support Chinese troops in Yunnan, and are of the firm opinion that the British Chiefs of Staff would strongly disapprove any action in China which might bring on war with Japan.

7. War Plans Division is strongly of the opinion that:

a. The policies derived in the American-British Staff conversations remain sound, viz:

(1) The primary objective is the defeat of Germany.

(2) The principal objective in the Far East is to keep Japan out of the war.

(3) Military counter-action against Japan should be considered only in case of any of the following actions by Japan:

(a) A direct act of war by Japanese armed forces against the Territory or Mandated Territory of any of the Associated Powers. It is not possible to define accurately what would constitute "a direct act of war". It is possible for a minor incident to occur which, although technically an act of war, could be resolved by diplomatic action. It is recognized [1728] that the decision as to whether such an incident is an act of war must lie with the Government concerned.

(b) The movement of the Japanese forces into any part of Thailand to the west of 100° East or to the south of 10° North.

(c) The movement of a large number of Japanese warships, or of a convoy of merchant ships escorted by Japanese warships, which from its position and course was clearly directed upon the Philippine Islands, the East coast of the Isthmus of Kra or the East coast of Malaya, or had crossed the parallel of 6° North between Malaya and the Philippines, a line from the Gulf of Davao to Waigeo Island, or the Equator east of Waigeo.

(d) The movement of Japanese forces into Portuguese Timor.

(e) The movement of Japanese forces into New Caledonia or the Loyalty Islands.

b. Germany must be defeated. If Japan be defeated and Germany remain undefeated, decision is not reached. The means to defeat Japan, (Army, Navy, and tonnage,) must be withdrawn in quantity from the effort against Germany. To defeat Germany will require the utmost total effort.

[1729] c. It is desirable that large Japanese forces be kept involved in China. However, from the larger viewpoints, prospective Chinese defeat would not warrant involvement of the United States, at this time, in war with Japan.

d. Political and economic measures should be used wherever effective to deter Japanese action.

e. Most effective aid to China, as well as to the defense of Singapore and the Netherlands East Indies, is now being built up by the reinforcement of the Philippines. The safety of Luzon as an air and submarine base should soon be reasonably assured by the arrival of air and ground reinforcements. Strong diplomatic and economic pressure may be exerted from the military viewpoint at the earliest about the middle of December, 1941, when the Philippine Air Force will have become a positive threat to Japanese operations. It would be advantageous, if practicable, to delay severe diplomatic and economic pressure until February or March, 1942, when the Philippine Air Force will have reached its projected strength, and a safe air route, through Samoa, will be in operation.

f. Material aid to China should be accelerated consonant with the studied needs of Russia and Great Britain.

g. Aid to the Volunteer Air Force in China should be continued and accelerated as far as practicable.

II. Recommendations.

Substitution of the words "War Department" for "War Plans Division" in paragraph 7 above and approval of that [1730] paragraph as a statement of the War Department's position on the Far East situation at this time.

To Generalissimo CHIANG KAI-SHEK from President ROOSEVELT:

I have for some days had before me your message of November 2 which was delivered to me through your Ambassador here on November 4; also, your earlier message which was delivered to me through Dr. T. V. Soong on October 30.

We have had for some time very much in mind the situation created by the menace of a Japanese attack against Kunming from Indochina to which you call special attention. When I received the first of your messages under reference, officers of this Government, including high officers of the Department of State, the Army and the Navy, entered immediately into consultations in order to give renewed and urgent consideration to all aspects of the problems underlying that situation. It soon became our conclusion that, while it would be a grave error to underestimate the gravity of that situation, it did not appear that preparations by Japan for a land campaign against Kunming had advanced to a point which would indicate probable immediate imminence of an attack. Given the difficult character of the terrain and the formidable resistance which your land forces would offer in Yunnan, an invasion of that province from Indochina by land forces calls for substantial preparation and extensive operations. At the same time we fully realize that it is important that your forces be adequately prepared, equipped and disposed in all branches. Under existing circumstances, taking into [1734] consideration the world situation in its political, military and economic aspects, we feel that the most effective contribution which we can make at this moment is along the line of speeding up the flow to China of our Lend-Lease materials and facilitating the building up of the American volunteer air force, both in personnel and in equipment. We are subjected at present, as you know, to demands from many quarters and in many connections. We are sending materials not only to China and Great Britain, but to the Dutch, the Soviet Union and some twenty other countries that are calling urgently for equipment for self-defense. In addition, our program for our own defense, especially the needs of our rapidly expanding Navy and Army, calls for equipment in large amount and with great promptness. Nevertheless, I shall do my utmost toward achieving expedition of increasing amounts of material for your use. Meanwhile we are exchanging views with the British Government in regard to the entire situation and the tremendous problems which are presented, with a view to effective coordinating of efforts in the most practicable ways possible.

I believe that you will share my feeling that measures such as the foregoing, together with such as the British doubtless are considering, adopted and implemented simultaneously with your intensive efforts to strengthen the defenses of Yunnan Province are sound steps toward safeguarding against [1735] such threat of an attack upon Yunnan as may be developing. Indirectly influencing that situation: American military and naval defensive forces in the Philippine Islands, which are being steadily increased, and the United States Fleet at Hawaii, lying as they do along the flank of any Japanese military movement into China from Indochina, are ever present and significant factors in the whole situation, as are the increasing British and Dutch defensive preparations in their territories to the south.

This Government has on numerous occasions pointed out to the Government of Japan various consequences inherent in pursuit of courses of aggression and conquest. We shall continue to impress this point of view upon Japan on every appropriate occasion.

In the present state of world affairs, I feel—and I am confident that you will agree with me—that there rests on the United States, in connection with every move which it considers and every decision which it makes, extraordinary obligation to give intensive thought to widespread political stresses and strains, to both long-swing and short-swing potentialities, and to the weight of various possible and probable advantages in comparison with the weight of other possible or probable disadvantages. The world conflict is now being waged in many theaters and with a great variety of weapons, both physical and moral. [1736] Resistance to the forces of conquest takes many forms. In all probability, the efforts of all of us who are engaged in that resistance, efforts of China and of the United States and of many other countries, will have to be continued and be sustained over a long period of time before our countries, one and all, will again be made secure and our people again be enabled to turn their whole thought and effort to peaceful and constructive pursuits.

I assure you that the situation and the problems which are the subject of this correspondence will continue to have my own and my country's constant attention.

[1737] Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield for just one observation?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. On page 5 of the minutes, the recommendation of the Board, after hearing these references which the gentleman read, was that they opposed the issuance of an ultimatum.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that will show from the document itself.

Senator FERGUSON. That will speak for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, in the President's message, on page 3, the President's message to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, from President Roosevelt, on page 3 of that same document [reading]:

I believe that you will share my feeling that measures such as the foregoing, together with such as the British doubtless are considering, adopted and implemented simultaneously with your intensive efforts to strengthen the defenses of Yunnan Province are sound steps toward safeguarding against such threat of an attack upon Yunnan as may be developing. Indirectly influencing that situation: American military and naval defensive forces in the Philippine Islands, which are being steadily increased, [1738] and the United States Fleet at Hawaii, lying as they do along the flank of any Japanese military movement into China from Indo-China, are ever present and significant factors in the whole situation, as are the increasing British and Dutch defensive preparations in their territories to the south.

Was that your understanding of the situation, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. Well, Senator, as I said, I was not here in this country at that time; I was not in a position to check up on all these steps that were reported as being taken. Frankly, I cannot give you an opinion on that.

Senator FERGUSON. No, but, Mr. Grew, had you an idea that the fact that our fleet was on the flank was deterring the Japanese from taking action?

Mr. GREW. I said that this morning. I do agree; I do think that, yes.

Senator FERGUSON. You think that that was true?

Mr. GREW. I think that that was true. I think it had a deterrent effect. In other words, I think if——

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, Mr. Grew, you think——

Mr. GREW. I would like to finish, please.

Senator FERGUSON. I beg your pardon. Go ahead.

Mr. GREW. I think it had a deterrent effect. More than [1739] that, I think to withdraw the fleet would have had a disastrous effect psychologically.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, Mr. Grew, if it had an effect and there was going to be war between the United States and Japan, how do you account for us allowing that fleet to be there and being attacked as it was at Pearl Harbor?

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that that is a totally unfair question.

The CHAIRMAN. The witness can take care of himself.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Grew can take care of himself, but we have been running along here with one question after another that the witness absolutely does not know anything about and I think it is a question that other authorities and other witnesses should answer directly in the time to come. I do not object to it, because the witness is undoubtedly taking care of himself. It just seems to me that we are wasting a lot of time. Maybe I am wrong.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, I am of the opinion that you are wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. If the witness has any additional opinion as to why the fleet was there than the reasons that he has already assigned for it being there and the effect of it being there he may state.

Senator FERGUSON. I understand that the Chair rules [1740] that the witness cannot answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair makes no such ruling. On the contrary, he is suggesting that the witness answer.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Mr. GREW. I am simply stating my opinion that I believe that the fleet at that time was there and I assumed that the fleet would be in perfect condition.

Senator FERGUSON. You mean by "in perfect condition" that it would be properly protected for all events?

Mr. GREW. I assumed that the fleet would fulfill its functions in case of necessity.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, did you understand, Mr. Grew, that the fleet was there and it would defend itself, or that the Army base was there to defend the fleet in Pearl Harbor and to defend Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GREW. Senator, I did not go into those very strategic details; naturally, I could not. You asked me merely what my opinion is about keeping the fleet in Pearl Harbor and I have expressed my opinion that the fact of the fleet being there, to me that had a deterrent influence on the Japanese and to have withdrawn the fleet from Pearl Harbor would have had just the reverse. It would have had a very disastrous influence. That was always my opinion and I haven't changed it.

[1741] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, I read to you last night from the Foreign Relations, I think it was May of 1940, where you expressed to one of the Japanese Ministers that it was not there as a threat to Japan. How do you account for that statement?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely it was not there as a threat to Japan because we had no idea of offense. Our whole policy was one of defense and nothing else. That was fundamental in our policy. What reason had we for offense? Our whole policy was based on defense pure and simple.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, if our whole policy was one of defense—and was that told to Japan?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. I think that time after time our basic principles were fully explained to Japan, not only by myself in conversations with Japanese officials, not only in written documents to the Japanese Government, but by high officials of the United States Government in public speeches. That was constantly being expressed.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you would say that the fleet was there as a defense, and as far as a defense was concerned it was a deterrent to Japan but as an offensive weapon it was not a deterrent to Japan because we had never expressed that it was there for that purpose.

Is that a correct understanding, Mr. Grew.

[1742] Mr. GREW. Well, sir, I merely made the statement that our whole policy was one of defense because we had no reason for offense. We did not want any more territory or anything of that kind. From that point of view, as I say, our whole policy was based on defensive position.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, is that your answer to my question?

Mr. GREW. Well, that is my opinion of the situation. Of course, as I say, I am not competent to go into military and naval strategy. There are cases, of course, where defensive measures require taking temporary offense. I do not know the strategy, that is not my business.

Senator FERGUSON. No, I am not trying to get your opinion of the Navy strategy. I am trying to get your opinion as expressed to Japan, and the reason I am questioning you in detail, it is only for one purpose, Mr. Grew, and that is to try to find out what Washington knew, what the officials—I am covering all branches—what they knew here in Washington in relation to Japan, as far as their military force was concerned, as far as our diplomatic relations were concerned, so that the committee may judge what was known by Washington and what was known by you so that you could convey back to Washington your opinion from what they knew here in Washington.

[1743] Mr. GREW. Senator, as I said in reading that letter this morning, my whole desire is to be helpful as possible to the committee and to give every bit of evidence that I am capable of giving.

Now, the story from my point of view of Japan has been, I would say, pretty thoroughly spread on the records in the four volumes which I have mentioned. Where I can piece them out I am only too glad to do so and I will do my best, but some of the questions that you are asking me I am not in a position to answer. I could not do it.

For instance, I dare say that our military or naval attachés may have made technical reports to their respective departments which I did not see; I do not know. But I have given you everything that I can give you with regard to my own position and my own observations in Tokyo during that period.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, the only way, of course, I can find out whether you can answer my questions is for me to ask them.

Mr. GREW. Right.

Senator FERGUSON. And I do not wish to convey the idea that you are not trying to answer the questions at all. I merely want to try to get answers, if we can, because you were the one man in Tokyo, in Japan, that could give to the vari- [1744] ous agencies in Washington—the Government, in other words—the information and there is only one way we can find out, as I view it, is from you, what information Washington had on the 7th, or the 7th of December, so that the committee may draw some conclusions as to what should or should not have been done; or the facts, rather, would draw the conclusions as to what should or should not be done.

Now, going to this instrument of August the 17th, do I understand that you place little significance on that instrument of August 17, 1941, which Admiral Schuirmann called an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. As I said, Senator, in my opinion it was not in the nature of an ultimatum for the very reason that we did not act on it as an ultimatum. We continued the conversations in Washington with a view to trying to reach an agreement. You do not deliver an ultimatum to a country and then continue to negotiate after that.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you here, Mr. Grew, when I asked some questions of Mr. Welles about the parallel action that was to be taken by Great Britain on this instrument?

Mr. GREW. Yes, I heard that question.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now I will ask you whether or not you had any opinion then that Japan—no, that Great Britain took parallel action on this meeting between the President and Mr. Churchill on the Augusta in the Atlantic in [1745] relation to the message that we gave notice to the Japs on the 17th of August, 1941?

Mr. GREW. I knew nothing about that whatever, Senator, and so far as I am aware no step of that kind was taken by me in Tokyo.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, the information that came to you, Mr. Grew, was merely this instrument, which does not indicate that parallel action was to be taken, does it?

Mr. GREW. Probably so.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, will you look at it and see whether or not it indicates parallel action?

Mr. GREW. Which document do you refer to now?

Senator LUCAS. Of course, Mr. Chairman, there is no evidence before this committee that there was ever any agreement that parallel action should be taken. The Senator from Michigan is assuming in every one of these questions that parallel action was agreed upon.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, the record will speak for itself as to what Mr. Welles told us.

The Chairman. The Chair does not know whether it is customary when one government sends a message to another to include in that message things that another government has sent a similar message. Evidently that did not appear in this case. [1746]

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the record is clear here from what Mr. Welles said.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if it is, it will speak for itself.

Mr. GREW. I could speak only from the point of view, less frankly, of Tokyo and I recollect neither having been instructed to take, nor having taken such parallel action on this issue.

Now, what happened in Washington I, frankly, do not know. I do not even know whether I was informed at that time. I would have to check the records to find out.

[1747] Senator FERGUSON. Well, I will ask you, Mr. Grew, whether you had any knowledge that parallel action was to be taken?

Mr. GREW. Not so far as I recollect, Senator. But, after all these years, I find myself in a very difficult position to give a categorical answer to a question of that kind without looking at the record. Sometimes my memory may be at fault.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be a rather important matter, would it not?

Counsel, would you let me have the 10 Downing Street instrument? I do not recall the exhibit number.

Mr. GESELL. Exhibit 22.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to show it to you, Mr. Grew, and have you interpret it for me.

(The document was handed to Mr. Grew.)

Mr. GREW. I take it from this document these were to be declarations by these various governments.

Senator FERGUSON. What is meant by a "draft of parallel communications to the Japanese Government"?

Mr. GREW. That would have meant definitely a note to the Japanese Government which might have been presented by the Secretary of State here to the Japanese Ambassador, or might have been presented by me to the Minister of Foreign [1748] Affairs.

Senator FERGUSON. Might we have the notes of August 17?

Mr. GESELL. They are attached to this exhibit, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you prepared to answer the question Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. May I ask what exactly was the question again?

Senator FERGUSON. I was looking through the instrument, if the Chairman please.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator FERGUSON. At the top of the page on Exhibit 22, the seal of the Prime Minister, what would that indicate as to where that instrument was drawn up, the "Seal of Prime Minister, 10 Downing Street, Whitehall"? It would be very difficult to tell what was meant by that without seeing the original instrument, would it not?

Mr. GREW. The only thing that is clear from this is that it was apparently written on the official paper of the British Prime Minister. I do not know that there is any indication further than that.

Senator FERGUSON. Now does that instrument indicate to you that it was contemplated, if it was to be carried out, that it would be carried out by parallel action of the governments mentioned?

Mr. GREW. I do not see any indication here that it would, [1749] Senator. There is no indication whatsoever of parallel action here that I can see.

Senator FERGUSON. What is meant by "draft of parallel communications to the Japanese Government"?

Mr. GREW. Well, it would mean presumably that each government would send communications along these general lines in its own language.

Senator FERGUSON. It states:

Declaration by H. M. G., His Majesty's Government—same as above, mutatis mutandis, the last phrase reading: * * * their support of them, H. M. G. would give all possible aid to such power.

"Mutatis mutandis" means using the proper language, does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. There might be some dispute about that. It might mean necessary changes having been made in the instrument.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the witness' opinion on the word?

Mr. GREW. Senator, I do not think, frankly, I am competent to answer the questions that you are asking about this, because I had nothing whatsoever to do with it.

Senator FERGUSON. As a diplomat, can you answer it? I do not know that I will get a better expert on it.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

[1750] The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield to the Congressman?

Senator FERGUSON. Does he want to be the better expert?

Mr. MURPHY. Haven't we already heard on the record from Mr. Welles, who was at the Atlantic Charter meeting, saying that another version was used and not the version that was asked the witness? Is not that already in the record?

Senator FERGUSON. I already have had the instrument of the President read by Mr. Grew. He knows what went on, and I assume he received it in Tokyo.

Is that correct?

Mr. GREW. I assume I did, but as I say, I would have to consult the record.¹

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Not at the present moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us get along.

Mr. GREW. I think we have gone over all this.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, then, as I understand it, you did not know of any parallel action to be taken, as far as the instrument is concerned on page 556 of Foreign Relations?

Mr. GREW. From my recollection, I doubt it. As I say, in order to give a categorical reply to that question I would have to look up the records and see.

Senator FERGUSON. May we have this understanding, that if you do not return it is because you find nothing in the [1751] record on that question, and if you do find something you will bring it back or have it delivered to counsel?

Mr. GREW. That will be understood, yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that understood?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, were you familiar with the voluntary Air Corps in China?

Mr. GREW. I know of its existence. You mean the American Corps that went out there?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Of course I knew of its existence at the time, but I know very little about it.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it ever discussed with you in the Japanese Government?

Mr. GREW. The Japanese Government from time to time would make representations to me about our aid to Chiang Kai-shek which, they said, prevented their coming to a peaceful conclusion of the so-called China incident. They never called it war but the China incident. In the course of those representations it is quite possible that they did mention our assistance in connection with the Air Corps, but I cannot recollect any specific statement to that effect.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you advised by our Government as to just what that Air Corps was?

[1752] Mr. GREW. Well, I presumably was.

Senator FERGUSON. You were advised?

Mr. GREW. I cannot tell you without going into the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Again might I ask you to get the records?

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. And I assume if you do not come back then you have found nothing in the records on that point.

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. So that we will understand that.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.¹

Senator FERGUSON. When did you first get an idea that Konoye, the Prime Minister, wanted to meet with the President?

Mr. GREW. The proposal was, as broached to me in a long talk with the Minister of Foreign Affairs on August 18, 1941——

Senator FERGUSON. I did not get the date.

Mr. GREW. On August 18, 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. You had no information prior to that?

Mr. GREW. I understand that the matter had been taken up by the Japanese Ambassador at Washington. I do not think that I was informed prior to that. I think that was the first information I had.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, as far as you are concerned, Mr. Grew, did you know of any outside intermediaries in the negotiations between Japan and the United States?

[1753] Mr. GREW. Outside intermediaries?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. It has been mentioned here that Mr. Walker, the Postmaster General——

Mr. GREW (interposing). I know nothing about that.

Senator FERGUSON. You have no knowledge about that whatsoever?

Mr. GREW. None whatsoever.

Senator FERGUSON. Your sole point of contact was either the State Department or the President, as you have indicated?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Now will you tell us something about this proposed meeting of Konoye, as to what significance it could have had, as you saw it? I want to know merely as you saw it and conveyed it to our State Department, to find out what knowledge they had.

Mr. GREW. Konoye himself arranged a meeting with me on September 6 in order to discuss a meeting with President Roosevelt. As I have said this afternoon, Konoye is saddled with the responsibility for some of the war acts of banditry on the part of Japan which have been recorded in international history, but, as I also said, he, I think, saw the handwriting on the wall and realized that Japan was on the brink of an abyss and wanted, if possible, to reverse the engine. That is only opinion. Anyway, on September 6 he asked me to dinner, [1754] and he was very much afraid of any possibility of the military extremists learning of that meeting.

Senator FERGUSON. How did you meet? Under what circumstances?

Mr. GREW. I will tell you, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Mr. GREW. Ordinarily a Japanese Prime Minister does not consort with diplomats. The contact is always with the Foreign Minister. Most prime ministers stay off it completely. But in this case Konoye wanted to talk the thing over directly. So we proceeded to the house of a mutual friend, and automobile tags on diplomatic and official automobiles were changed so nobody could recognize us. We had the dinner. All the servants were sent out and the dinner was served by the daughter of the house. We talked for 3 hours.

¹ See Mr. Gesell's statement in Hearings, Part 4, p. 1715.

During that time Konoye sketched out to me what he had in mind. It is a pretty long story. It is all on record.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you point out in the Foreign Relations where it is on record?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; I will.

Senator FERGUSON. So we will have the record clear.

Mr. GREW. The report of the dinner is recorded on page 604 of Foreign Relations and my analysis of the purpose of the meeting is contained in a long telegram which I sent to the [1755] Secretary of State on September 29, 1941, on page 645 of Foreign Relations. I would like to read to the committee, if I may, the last paragraph of that message from myself to the Secretary of State:

In submitting the foregoing discussion, the Ambassador does so in all deference—

I might say that all these telegrams were paraphrased by the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. So we might clear the record on that, all these messages in here are either substance or paraphrased?

Mr. GREW. Yes; and in some cases I regret to say I think the paraphrases are very awkward. I think sometimes the language is being obscured rather than clarified.

Senator FERGUSON. Do they always convey what you intended to convey? Would a person reading them get an idea as to what you were trying to convey?

Mr. GREW. I think so. I do not think there has been any distortion of the meaning, but I do not think they are as clear an exposition as contained in the original text.

Senator FERGUSON. Then it would be more difficult to convey what you intended to say?

Mr. GREW. I think my meaning is clear, in any case. These paraphrases were essential because we had to protect our code. The last paragraph reads:

In submitting the foregoing discussion, the [1756] Ambassador does so in all deference to the much broader field of view of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull and in full awareness that the Ambassador's approach to the matter is limited to the viewpoint of the American Embassy in Japan.

I preface everything I said in the position I took on this matter with that premise. In the first place, as I have told you already, I did not have access to any of the telegraphic intercepts, I did not even know that they existed, and I had no access to any of the secret documents which have appeared since, so my analysis of the situation was based entirely on my observation from the standpoint of our Embassy in Tokyo, what I could see at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, you say that the meeting was held as an absolutely secret meeting and you described how you changed the plates on the automobiles. Was it your understanding that this was to be a good faith meeting?

Mr. GREW. It was my understanding, and also after the meeting had taken place that was my understanding.

Senator FERGUSON. There was not anything that happened at the meeting that would indicate to you that it was not a good-faith meeting, was there?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; there was not anything happened at the meeting that would indicate there was any lack of faith.

[1757] Senator FERGUSON. And did you, in your opinion, properly report that to the State Department?

Mr. GREW. Well, sir, my report is all contained in that telegram.

Senator FERGUSON. A fair appraisal of that telegram would be that you did express that it was a good faith meeting, is that correct?

Mr. GREW. Yes, very definitely; and that was developed still further in my telegram of September 29.

Senator FERGUSON. Now did you get any opinions from Konoye, from what he said, that if he could get such a meeting his Cabinet may fall?

Mr. GREW. Yes, very definitely.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you advise the State Department to that effect?

Mr. GREW. That is contained in that telegram of September 29, Senator. I think I better stick to the record here.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I wish you would.

Mr. GREW. This is a very long telegram.

Senator FERGUSON. I want you to boil it down.

Mr. GREW. I think that the story as I saw it is pretty fully brought forward in this telegram, but there is no particular passage that I can pick out.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you sum it up?

[1758] Mr. GREW. What is that?

Senator FERGUSON. I want to know now about the Cabinet falling, if that is your opinion from what he said, that his Cabinet would fall if he could not get the meeting.

Mr. GREW. I, in my telegram, said this:

The logical outcome of this will be the downfall of the Konoye Cabinet and the formation of a military dictatorship which will lack either the disposition or the temperament to avoid colliding head-on with the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you were of the opinion, and conveyed it to the State Department, that if the meeting did not take place that would mean a military dictatorship in Japan?

Mr. GREW. That was my opinion.

Senator FERGUSON. And did you convey to the United States, or the State Department, what that would mean or could mean?

Mr. GREW. I do not think anything much could have been added to this statement here, Senator, "formation of a military dictatorship which will lack either the disposition or the temperament to avoid colliding head-on with the United States."

Senator FERGUSON. When you say "colliding head-on with the United States," is that another way of saying "war"?

Mr. GREW. I think that would be.

[1759] Senator FERGUSON. That is a fair interpretation?

Mr. GREW. A fair deduction.

Senator FERGUSON. A fair deduction. Then you were of the opinion, and conveyed it to the State Department, that if the meeting did not take place and the Cabinet fell, and you were of the opinion it would fall, it meant war with the United States?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I did not go as far as that. No, indeed.

Senator FERGUSON. How far did you go?

Mr. GREW. I said that risk would be present, but I think the fact that, as far as I was concerned in Tokyo, I was working for peace up to the last minute, and conversations were going on in Washington. I do not think at any time it could be said any particular step or lack of step definitely meant war. No; I would not subscribe to that.

Senator FERGUSON. How far did you go in that note as a warning to the State Department in Washington?

Mr. GREW. That is clear in the telegram.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask the Senator, has that note been made a part of the record?

Senator FERGUSON. I would like now to have the whole note read in.

The CHAIRMAN. It speaks for itself, and should be made [1760] part of the record.

Mr. GREW. It speaks for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. When it is made a part of the record it speaks for itself, in its own terms.

Mr. GREW. I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Therefore it will now be made a part of the record, part of the transcript. It is a lengthy document.

Mr. GREW. That is telegram 1529, Tokyo, September 29, 1941, noon. That is on page 645 of Foreign Relations.

(The telegram referred to follows:)

(1) In regard to the preliminary conversations taking place at Washington and Tokyo, the Ambassador points out that a review of telegraphic correspondence on this subject since last spring reveals the Japanese Government's efforts, increasing steadily and intensified lately, to arrange a meeting between Prince Konoye and President Roosevelt without further delay. While admitting his role to be chiefly that of a transmitting agent in these conversations, the Ambassador naturally wishes to aid in any constructive way, particularly by endeavoring to appraise accurately for the President and the Secretary of State the Japanese factors and conditions having direct or indirect bearing on the subject and also by trying to bring the Japanese Government to adopt measures and policies such as the United States Government deems to be [1761] essential for a mutual understanding or agreement between Japan and the United States. Since the fall of Admiral Yonai's Cabinet in July of 1940, American diplomacy in Japan has been in eclipse temporarily through force of circumstances. However, when the Konoye-Toyoda regime began last July, American diplomacy obtained a very active new lease of life. The Ambassador expresses his earnest hope therefore that so propitious a period be not permitted to slip by without a new foundation having been laid with enough stability to warrant a reasonable amount of confidence that the structure to be erected gradually and progressively thereon can and will endure.

(2) The Ambassador recalls his statements in the past that in Japan the pendulum always swings between moderate and extremist policies; that it was not then possible under the existing circumstances for any Japanese leader or group to reverse the program of expansion and expect to survive; that the permanent digging in by Japanese in China and the pushing of the Japanese advance to the south could be prevented only by insuperable obstacles. The Ambassador recalls likewise his views that the risks of taking positive measures to maintain United States security in the future were likely to be far smaller than the risks of not taking such measures; that only respect for potential power of the United States has deterred Japan from taking more liberties with American [1762] interests; and that Japan's program of forcible expansion could be brought to a halt only by a show of force and by a demonstration of American willingness to use this force if necessary. The Ambassador recalls also his statement that if Japan's leadership could be discredited eventually by such American action, there might take shape in Japan ultimately a regeneration of thought which would allow Japan to resume formal relations with the United States, leading to a readjustment of the entire problem of the Pacific.

(3) The Ambassador suggests that the United States has been following very wisely precisely this policy which, furthered by other developments in the world, has helped to discredit Japanese leadership, notably that of former Foreign Minister Matsuoka. The Ambassador cites as world developments arousing a positive reaction from the United States the conclusion by Japan of the Tripartite Alliance and Japan's recognition of the Wang Ching-wei regime at Nanking, which preceded Germany's attack on the Soviet Union. Germany's action upset the basis for the Tripartite Pact, Japan having joined the Italo-German Axis in order to obtain security against Russia and thereby to avoid the peril of being caught between the Soviet Union and the United States. At the present time Japan is attempting to correct this miscalculation by getting out of an extremely dangerous position. The Ambassador recalls his reports to the Department to the effect [1763] that Japanese foreign policies are inevitably changed by the impact of events abroad and that liberal elements in Japan might come to the top in due course as a result of the trend of events. He considers that such a time has arrived. He sees a good chance of Japan's falling into line if a program can be followed of world reconstruction as forecast by the declaration of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill. American policy—of forbearance, patient argumentation, efforts at persuasion, followed for many years, plus a manifest determination of the United States to take positive measures when called for—plus the impact of world developments upon Japan, has rendered Japan's political soil hospitable to the sowing of new seeds which, the Ambassador feels, if planted carefully and nourished, may bring about the anticipated regeneration of Japanese thought and a complete readjustment of relations between Japan and the United States.

(4) Certain quarters have advanced the thought—and no doubt it is prominently in the mind of the United States Government—that at this juncture an agreement between Japan and the United States will serve merely as a breathing spell to Japan. During such a breathing spell, Japan, having successfully untangled itself with American aid from the China conflict, will recoup and strengthen its forces in order to resume at the next favorable opportunity its [1764] expansionist program. This thought cannot be gainsaid with certainty. The same school of thought also holds that Japan will be forced to relinquish its expansionist program because of the deterioration of Japanese domestic economy and because of the threat of financial, economic and social collapse due to a progressive intensifying of economic measures by the United States, Great Britain, and the Netherlands against Japan. The Ambassador adds that should this thesis be accepted as reasonably sound, the position will confront the United States of choosing one of two methods to approach its objective, namely, either the method of progressive economic strangulation or the method of constructive conciliation, not so-called appeasement. The Ambassador sees the second method as the definite choice of the United States Government following the beginning of the Washington preliminary conversations and President Roosevelt's acceptance in principle of the Japanese Prime Minister's proposed meeting. Indeed, the Ambassador remarks, the United States has never departed from its readiness to negotiate on any issues with Japan (see the American note dated December 30, 1938), despite the fact that Japan already had embarked at that time on its expansion by force program. He feels that, from the viewpoint of farseeing statesmanship, the wisdom of the American choice seems to be beyond cavil. Should failure greet the con- [1765] structive, conciliatory method of approach now or later, there will always be available the other method, the application of progressive economic sanctions. In the opinion of the Ambassador, whether the trend of American relations with Japan is for better or for worse, the United States obviously will have to remain for a long time to come in a state of preparedness. The thought that eventual British victory in the world war will solve automatically many problems may, meanwhile, afford whatever degree of encouragement is justified.

tunity to halt Japan's program without war, [1766] or an immediate risk of war, and further whether, through failure to use the present opportunity, the United States will not face a greatly increased risk of war. The Ambassador states his firm belief in an affirmative answer to these two questions.

(6) Certain quarters hold the view that it is altogether improbable under existing circumstances that counteraction will be deliberately taken by Japan in response to any American action likely to be taken in the Pacific which would bring about war with the United States. The Ambassador states his inability to agree that war may not supervene following actions, whether irrational or deliberate, by elements either in Japan or in the United States tending so to inflame public opinion in the other country concerned as to make war unavoidable. He recalls in this regard the cases of the Maine and the Panay.

(7) The Ambassador stresses the importance of understanding Japanese psychology, fundamentally unlike that of any Western nation. Japanese reactions to any particular set of circumstances cannot be measured, nor can Japanese actions be predicted by any Western measuring rod. This fact is hardly surprising in the case of a country so recently feudalistic. The Ambassador conceives his chief duty to be an attempt to interpret accurately Japanese [1765] psychology, and he states that he has aimed to do this in his numerous reports during the last several months and years to the Department. Keeping this thought constantly before him, the Ambassador ventures at the risk of repetition to advance the considerations set forth below.

(8) Should the United States expect or await agreement by the Japanese Government, in the present preliminary conversations, to clear-cut commitments which will satisfy the United States Government both as to principle and as to concrete detail, almost certainly the conversations will drag along indefinitely and unproductively until the Konoye Cabinet and its supporting elements desiring rapprochement with the United States will come to the conclusion that the outlook for an agreement is hopeless and that the United States Government is only playing for time. If the abnormal sensitiveness of Japan and the abnormal effects of loss of face are considered, in such a situation Japanese reaction may and probably will be serious. This will result in the Konoye Government's being discredited and in a revulsion of anti-American feeling, and this may and probably will lead to unbridled acts. The eventual cost of these will not be reckoned, and their nature is likely to inflame Americans, while reprisal and counter-reprisal measures will bring about a situation in which it will be difficult to [1768] avoid war. The logical outcome of this will be the downfall of the Konoye Cabinet and the formation of a military dictatorship which will lack either the disposition or the temperament to avoid colliding head-on with the United States. There is a question that such a situation may prove to be more serious even than the failure to produce an entirely satisfactory agreement through the proposed meeting between President Roosevelt and Prince Konoye, should it take place as planned. Worded otherwise, the question remains whether it will not prove to be a less serious case for the negotiations undertaken in good faith to fail of complete success than for the United States to demonstrate its unwillingness to enter any such negotiations.

(9) The Ambassador continues by stating that he has been emphatically told on numerous occasions—and such declarations he considers must be accepted at their face value—that prior to the proposed Roosevelt-Konoye meeting and formal negotiations it is impossible for the Japanese Government to define its future assurances and commitments more specifically than hitherto stated. The Ambassador explains that one reason for this Japanese position, as given him very confidentially, is that former Foreign Minister Matsuoka, after his retirement in July, recounted in complete detail to the German Ambassador in the course of the [1769] Washington conversations up to that time. Because many supporters of Matsuoka remain in the Tokyo Foreign Office, the fear has been expressed that these men will not scruple to reveal to both the Germans and the Japanese extremists any information which would render the present Cabinet's position untenable. Although certain basic principles have been accepted provisionally by the Japanese Government, the definitions and formulae of Japan's future objectives and policy, as advanced so far during the preliminary conversations, and the statements supplementary to those definitions, are so abstract or equivocal and are open to such wide interpretation that they rather create confusion than clarify commitments which the Japanese Government is ready to undertake. The Ambassador states that at the same time he has been told the Prince Konoye is in a position in direct negotiations with President Roosevelt to offer him assurance which, because of their far-reaching character, will not fail to satisfy the United States. The truth of this statement cannot be determined by the Ambassador, who, however, points out that, in regard specifically to Japan's Axis relations, the Japanese Government, though refusing consistently to give an undertaking that it will overtly renounce its alliance membership, actually has shown a readiness to reduce Japan's alliance adherence to a dead letter by its indication of willingness to enter [1770] formally into negotiations with the United States. The Ambassador therefore does not consider unlikely the possibility of Prince Konoye's being in a position to give President Roosevelt directly a more explicit and satisfactory engagement than has already been vouchsafed in the course of the preliminary conversations.

(10) In the opinion of the Ambassador, on the basis of the above observations which he has every reason to regard as sound, American objectives will not be reached by insisting or continuing to insist during the preliminary conversations that Japan provide the sort of clear-cut, specific commitments which appear in any final, formal convention or treaty. Unless a reasonable amount of confidence is placed by the United States in the professed sincerity of intention and good faith of Prince Konoye and his supporters to mould Japan's future policy upon the basic principles they are ready to accept and then to adopt measures which gradually but loyally implement those principles, with it understood that the United States will implement its own commitments pari passu with the steps which Japan takes, the Ambassador does not believe that a new orientation can be successfully created in Japan to lead to a general improving of Japanese-American relations and to the hope that ultimate war may be avoided in the Pacific. The sole way to discredit the [1771] Japanese military machine and army is through wholesale military defeat, and the Ambassador sees no present prospect of this. The only alternative (and the only wise one in the view of the Ambassador) is an attempt to produce a regeneration of Japanese thought and outlook through constructive conciliation, along the lines of American efforts at present. The Ambassador inquires whether the better part of wisdom and of statesmanship is not to bring such efforts to a head before the force of their initial impetus is lost, leaving it impossible to overcome an opposition which the Ambassador thinks will mount inevitably and steadily in Japan.

(11) In submitting the foregoing discussion, the Ambassador does so in all deference to the much broader field of view of President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull and in full awareness that the Ambassador's approach to the matter is limited to the viewpoint of the American Embassy in Japan.

GREW.

[1772] Mr. GESELL. Senator, I just want to call attention again to the fact that these are official Government publications, and we have assumed that all of the conversations recorded in these publications are available to the committee and may be drawn upon in making any conclusions or anything of that sort.

We simply have not physically offered them as exhibits.

The CHAIRMAN. If an interpretation is to be made of the document which is part of the record, or which has been filed as an exhibit, it seems to the Chair instead of undertaking to have a verbal interpretation of a record of that sort, it ought to be allowed to speak for itself in its own terms.

Mr. GREW. I agree with you. It is all set out here.

Mr. KEEFE. May I interrupt?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield to the Congressman from Wisconsin?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. I would like to inquire whether or not the original document entitled "War and Peace" has been offered as an exhibit and is in evidence, the entire book, or is it considered that the committee is at liberty to consider anything in that book as a matter of reference, it being a so-called public document?

[1773] Mr. GESELL. Congressman Keefe, it is the latter. We have assumed the committee may take judicial notice of these three official publications, Peace and War, and the two volumes containing the actual notes of the conversations in Foreign Relations of the United States: Japan, 1931-41.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order that there may not be any mistake at any time in the future in connection with these hearings, I think it would be perfectly proper to have the documents referred to offered as exhibits so we may have them.

I would like also to have offered as an exhibit the original, what I understand to be the original, short version published by the State Department in 1942, entitled "Peace and War," of which I have a copy, consisting of some 143 pages.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. I will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us clear this matter up.

Mr. MURPHY. Is not the proper legal procedure, Mr. Chairman, to incorporate that by reference, and was not that incorporated by reference? Since they are legal documents they are part of the record by reference.

The CHAIRMAN. In effect, there is not much difference between incorporating by reference and by making them exhibits which are available to the committee. The fact that they are [1774] Government publications puts upon them the stamp of authenticity, I presume. Is there any reason why they cannot be referred to as exhibits?

[1775] Mr. GESELL. Not at all, Mr. Chairman. I think we can refer to Peace and War, United States Foreign Policy, 1931-41, as the next exhibit, Exhibit No. 27; and I might say to Congressman Keefe that it is my understanding that includes in the front portion the document the Congressman has in his hand, the initial short summary which was originally released.

Mr. KEEFE. The reason I suggest that this initial short summary be incorporated as an exhibit is because I have found in going through these four volumes after they have been edited and reedited and changes have been made in the arrangement of the material so that it becomes difficult for me to follow a lot of this material. I find that there is a lot helpful in this short volume, which can be identified promptly and quickly, and which tells in short form this story.

Mr. GESELL. We could make the short form the next exhibit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that it be made Exhibit No. 27 because it seems to have been published previously and that the full volume be made Exhibit No. 28.

Mr. GESELL. Very well.

As Exhibit 29, the two volumes, volumes I and II, Foreign Relations of the United States; Japan, 1931-41, which contains the actual documents of reported conversations held.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to now make [1776] Mr. Grew's book No. 30.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chairman sees no objection to making it an exhibit. I do not know whether that would increase the circulation or not, but the committee will be glad to have it made an exhibit.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits 27, 28, 29, and 30", respectively.)

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. I will ask you, Mr. Grew, when Mr. Dooman came to the United States? When did he come to the United States?

Mr. GREW. Mister—who?

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Dooman.

Mr. GREW. Nomura?

Senator FERGUSON. Dooman.

Mr. GREW. Dooman. Well, he was the counselor of the Embassy in Tokyo. He came out there—I don't remember precisely what date.

Senator FERGUSON. My question was, when did he return to the United States before Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GREW. I would have to check. Of course, he did not return while I was away, because he had to be chargé d'affaires.

Senator FERGUSON. Does page 139 of Foreign Relations refresh your memory on that?

[1777] Mr. MURPHY. Which volume?

Senator FERGUSON. I think No. 2.

Mr. GREW. 139 of Foreign Relations, volume II?

Senator FERGUSON. Page 138.

Mr. GREW. "Memorandum by the Counsellor of Embassy in Japan."

Senator FERGUSON. He had a conversation with Ohashi.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you remember that conversation?

On page 139, I will ask you to read beginning down about 15 lines, "It would be absurd to suppose that the American people * * *."

Mr. GREW (reading): It would be absurd to suppose that the American people while pouring munitions into Britain, would look with complacency upon the cutting of communications between Britain and the British Dominions and Colonies overseas. If, therefore, Japan or any other nation were to prejudice the safety of those communications, either by direct action or by placing herself in a position to menace those communications, she would have to expect to come into conflict with the United States. There are many indications of the Japanese moving down slowly toward Singapore and the Netherlands East Indies. The United States cannot be concerned by the various initiatives [1778] taken by the Japanese in Indo-China and elsewhere for the reason that if Japan were to occupy these strategically important British and Dutch areas, it could easily debouch into the Indian Ocean and the South Pacific and create havoc with essential British lines of communication. The United States for its part was well aware that an alternative source of supply for Japanese purchase of petroleum and certain other products of the United States is the Netherlands East Indies, and for that reason it has been reluctant to impose embargoes on the sale to Japan of commodities of which it has a surplus; but the Japanese must clearly understand that the forbearance of the United States in this respect springs from a desire not to impel Japan to create a situation which could lead only to the most serious consequences.

Senator FERGUSON. That is far enough for my purposes, unless you want to read further.

Does that refresh your memory that Dooman had been here and obtained an opinion in the United States?

Mr. GREW. I think, as I recollect, that was the opinion he received from moving around the United States, but not necessarily from official sources.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he convey this idea to you?

Mr. GREW. Well, I have no doubt of it. He returned [1779] from a leave of absence shortly before that, didn't he?

I don't know if the record shows. I think he undoubtedly told me of his general impressions.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I ask you to refer to page 137, "The Ambassador in Japan (Grew) to the Secretary of State," No. 5397. I ask you to read the second paragraph.

Mr. GREW (reading): The presentation by Mr. Dooman of his impressions of the position of the United States as gathered during his recent furlough appeared to cause Mr. Ohashi astonishment. Mr. Ohashi is, for a Japanese, extraordinary direct and sparing of words. Upon listening attentively to what Mr. Dooman described as the philosophy of the American position, Mr. Ohashi remained perfectly quiet for an appreciable space of time and then burst forth with the question, "Do you mean to say that if Japan were to attack Singapore there would be war with the United States?" Mr. Dooman replied, "The logic of the situation would inevitably raise that question." Mr. Ohashi then left that subject and adverted to the character of the reports sent to London by the British Ambassador.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, what did Dooman, in your opinion, mean by that phrase?

Mr. GREW. Well, that referred definitely, when he said, "The logic of the situation would inevitably raise that question" that meant exactly what it says. It would come under considera- [1780] tion. It doesn't mean that it would necessarily bring about war. Inevitably raise that question. Of course, it would be raised.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, your telegram, on page 143, being No. 334, will you read that? It is in relation, I take it, to the same matter. If it isn't, I wish you would explain it.

Mr. GREW. My short telegram?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, the short one.

Mr. GREW (reading):

Yesterday, I told Matsuoka that I entirely concurred in and approved of all that Dooman had said to Ohashi on February 14. As the latter had given only an oral report of the conversation to Matsuoka I read him the whole memorandum of it. I was somewhat surprised when the Minister stated his entire agreement with what Dooman had said. Today I am sending Matsuoka for his personal use a copy of the memorandum.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did you ever hear from the State Department on this particular matter after you sent this information to the State Department?

Mr. GREW. Not to my recollection.

Senator FERGUSON. So that they were fully advised as to what you had advised the Japanese?

Mr. GREW. I advised the State Department of every step [1781] taken, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you look up and see whether or not you did get an answer?

Mr. GREW. I think I can answer that.

Senator FERGUSON. You say that you did not?

Mr. GREW. Definitely that I did not, but I will have it looked up.¹

Senator FERGUSON. Now, Mr. Grew, did you send a telegram on November 3, 1941?

Mr. GREW. Yes, I did.

Senator FERGUSON. At that time—will you get that telegram?

I would like to have that telegram go into the record at this place, Mr. Chairman.

Have you it before you?

Mr. GREW. I know it pretty well by heart.

Mr. GESELL. That is an exhibit, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. You want it printed in the hearings?

Senator FERGUSON. I think it should be, Mr. Chairman. It is an important telegram, is it, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; it is a very important telegram.

Senator FERGUSON. Giving information to the Secretary of State?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. It was addressed "Strictly Confidential for Secretary and Under Secretary Only." [1782]

Senator FERGUSON. So that it was to go to the Secretary and the Under Secretary?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I want to discuss that with you.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you going to have Mr. Grew read it?

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. Read it into the record.

How long is it?

Mr. GREW. You wish me to read it?

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to ask you questions about it.

The CHAIRMAN. How long is it?

Mr. GREW. I think I can get through it in about 6 or 7 minutes.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a minute. Inasmuch as it is an exhibit and has been made in that form a part of the record, do you insist on it being read, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. No; except that I wanted to ask him some questions, and I thought we could save time by reading it.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

[1783] Mr. MURPHY. Before we go into the telegram, since the distinguished Senator from Michigan has had parts of the document on page 138 read, and since there are qualifying parts of it subsequently which are just to the opposite, I think that the whole thing might go in.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to have it all go in.

The CHAIRMAN. Let it all go in, but it will not be read here.

(Excerpt from exhibit No. 29, Foreign Relations of the United States-Japan, 1931-41, vol. II, p. 138:)

MEMORANDUM BY THE COUNSELOR OF EMBASSY IN JAPAN (DOOMAN)

[Tokyo,] February 14, 1941.

I called this afternoon by appointment on Mr. Ohashi, the Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs. He greeted me quite politely, saying that although we had several mutual friends it was, so far as he knew, the first time we had met. I replied that I had on various occasions taken notice of statements which he had made in various capacities of the past, in Manchuria, and elsewhere, but I had, unfortunately, not been able to profit by opportunities which had presented themselves to make his acquaintance. Mr. Ohashi said he understood that I had just returned from leave in the United States and that he supposed I had received a number of interesting impressions in the [1784] United States. I replied that my furlough in the United States coincided with one of the most significant and important periods in the history of our country, and that if he had time I would be glad to tell him briefly of what I had seen and heard while at home. Mr. Ohashi said that fortunately he was not busy that day and that I could stay as long as I wished.

I gave Mr. Ohashi a fairly long account of the trends in opinion with regard to the war in Europe as they developed during the election campaign. I dwelt on the remarkably swift crystallization of opinion at home with regard to the question of American aid to England, which I attributed in large part first to the disclosure on the part of the British that they were rapidly approaching the end of the resources in dollar exchange, and second to the belief that the effects on Britain's capacity to produce aircraft and other munitions of German bombing raids had been more serious than the British communiques would lead one to suppose. I said that although the large majority of the American people abhorred the idea of American involvement in war, the fact was that an equally large majority of the American people believed that there was one consideration which transcends even that of avoiding involvement in the war, and that is helping England to the limit of our capacity.

I said that all this was not without direct bearing on relations between the United States and Japan. I had found [1785] that American opinion is pretty clearly opposed to the taking of action by the United States which would make war with Japan inevitable. Nevertheless Mr. Ohashi could readily understand that the American people, being an eminently practical people, are quite aware that an adequate supply of airplanes and other munitions is not the only prerequisite to a British victory: the supply to England of foodstuffs and raw materials by the British dominions and colonies and the maintenance of British commerce with the outside world are equally essential to a British victory. It would be absurd to suppose that the American people, while pouring munitions into Britain, would look with complacency upon the cutting of communications between Britain and British dominions and colonies overseas. If, therefore, Japan or any other nation were to prejudice the safety of those communications, either by direct action or by placing herself in a position to menace those communications, she would have to expect to come into conflict with the United States. There are many indications of the Japanese moving down slowly toward Singapore and the Netherlands East Indies. The United States cannot but be concerned by the various initiatives taken by the Japanese in Indo-China and elsewhere, for the reason that if Japan were to occupy these strategically important British and Dutch areas, it could easily debouch into the Indian Ocean and the South Pacific and create havoc with essential British lines of communication. [1786] The United States for its part was well aware that an alternative source of supply for Japanese purchase of petroleum and certain other products of the United States is the Netherlands East Indies, and for that reason it has been reluctant to impose embargoes on the sale to Japan of commodities of which it has a surplus; but the Japanese must clearly understand that the forbearance of the United States in this respect springs from a desire not to impel Japan to create a situation which could lead only to the most serious consequences. I recalled the axiom in geometry that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time: However greatly Japan's security might be enhanced by occupying the Netherlands East Indies it must be realized by Japan that any such move would vitally concern the major preoccupation of the United States at this time, which is to assist England to stand against German assault.

Mr. Ohashi then took the floor and launched into an impassioned apologia of Japanese policies in recent years. He started by describing conditions in Japan during the middle 20's, the lack of employment in Japan at that time was driving young Japanese to despair; communism began to spread in amazing fashion, the estimates being that there were at one time more than 50,000 Japanese communists and there was fear of decay and disintegration of the Japanese political system. There developed at the same time a growing antagonism in China [1787] toward Japan. General Chiang Kai-shek initiated a series of military campaigns which finally resulted in the downfall of the northern group of Chinese generals, including Feng Yu-hsiang, Yen Hsi-shan, and others. General Chang Tso-lin made his historic trip to Nanking to consolidate himself with General Chiang Kai-shek, and upon his return to Mukden he raised the flag of Chinese nationalism and proclaimed that his action manifested the complete unification of China and at about this time, Mr. C. T. Wang, then Minister for Foreign Affairs, publicly declared in a speech at Nanking that China was now prepared to "drive Japan off the Continent of Asia". There had occurred elsewhere other events which also gave grounds for complete pessimism in Japan. Pressure by the United States on England had led to the abrogation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance, which England discarded after it had served British purposes; the United States in 1924 excluded Japanese from emigrating to the United States, even though the granting of a small quota of 140 would have amply served to prevent Japanese pride and honor from being injured, and when Australia followed with its White Australia Policy and other parts of the British Empire had also taken action to exclude Japanese, the Japanese had found themselves effectively prevented from expanding into areas which could use their industry and initiative. At the same time the United States and Great Britain encouraged China in every possible way to implement the policy [1788] proclaimed by Dr. C. T. Wang to drive Japan off the Asiatic Continent. He recalled travelling with Admiral Kanji Kato in 1930 from Mukden to Japan. Admiral Kato expressed himself as being extremely despondent of the future if matters were allowed to proceed as they were then proceeding, and he disclosed to Mr. Ohashi the determination of certain elements in the Japanese Army and Navy to take action toward opening up a way for Japanese expansion. This determination manifested itself finally in the Mukden Incident of September 18, 1931. Mr. Ohashi said that the League of Nations had placed upon Japan the responsibility for seeking to alter by force the status quo in the Far East. However, it was clear that it was China and not Japan which had taken the initiative in seeking to alter the status quo, and the responsibility for the deplorable conflict now taking place between China and Japan must largely be borne by those nations which encouraged China to pursue this disastrous policy. The United States and England must also be responsible in some measure for Japan's aligning itself with Germany and Italy, for the present Sino-Japanese conflict would never have occurred if the Anglo-Japanese alliance had not been abrogated. The United States and England had further driven Japan into a position of complete isolation, and it was accordingly necessary for Japan to find friends. Japan has no special friendly feelings towards Germany and Italy and certainly has no ideological association [1789] or identity with either of those two countries. Nevertheless Germany, Italy, and Japan have a close identity of interests in revolting against attempts to keep them permanently under subjection. It would be a great mistake to suppose that Japan would not honor its commitments under the alliance if the United States "were to attack Germany".

I observed that Mr. Ohashi's presentation of Japan's case had the eloquence of one suffering under a sense of grievance. We do not deny that Japan has grievances, but we object to the methods pursued by Japan to rectify those grievances. After the war in Europe is over, there is bound to be a more rational world, and in the creation of the more intelligent world economy which we must earnestly hope will be brought into being after the war, there would be ample room for entirely satisfying Japan's legitimate needs. I then quoted Mr. Churchill's remark "If we allow the past to quarrel with the present, we shall lose the future." As difficult and important as were the problems arising in China, they had not led to a war between the United States and Japan. It was certainly not the intention of the United States to seek a war with Japan, but at the same time I wished to make it clear that it would be idle and extravagant to believe that, so long as Japan remained a partner of Germany and Italy and so long as she was unable to resolve her troubles with China on a mutually satisfactory and equitable basis, a stabilization [1790] of relations between the United States and Japan could be hoped for. I believed that it was quite possible to pass over the present critical period without war, but that one essential condition to this more or less happy issue out of our difficulties must be the realization on the part of the Japanese that they cannot substantially alter the status quo in Southeast Asia, particularly, without incurring the risk of creating a very serious situation.

Mr. Ohashi asked whether he was correct in understanding me to say that war could be averted only by Japan standing still and allowing itself to be tied hand and feet by the United States and Great Britain. I replied that it was not my intention to give him specifications as to what Japan should or should not do, but I wished to express my opinion that if Japan did not exercise the same degree of restraint and forbearance as that being exercised by the United States, it was very difficult to see how a war could be averted.

Mr. Ohashi then asked me whether we had been sending to Washington such extravagant and sensational reports as those being sent by Sir Robert Craigie to London. Without waiting for a reply he said that Mr. Eden had recently called in the Japanese Ambassador at London and had talked to Mr. Shigemitsu very harshly about recent Japanese moves in Siam and Indo-China. Mr. Eden was apparently greatly excited by telegrams which he had received from Sir Robert Craigie. Mr. Ohashi said that he [1791] had just had a talk with Sir Robert Craigie and that he had reminded Sir Robert that he had repeatedly given the latter assurances that Japan had no intention whatever of moving toward Singapore and the Dutch East Indies unless Japan was "pressed" by other nations through the imposition of embargoes by the United States or by the sending of an American fleet to Singapore. I said to Mr. Ohashi that, in my opinion, the award by Japan to Siam of the provinces of Laos and Cambodia would undoubtedly lead to the most serious disorders in Indo-China, as the French are strongly opposed to any substantial cession of territory to the Siamese. I asked Mr. Ohashi what Japan would do in the event that the disorders were beyond the French control. He replied "we shall have to suppress these disorders". I then went on to say "once having occupied Indo-China, Japan would be in a position to control Siam and to undertake operations toward Burma or the Malay States. You see how this intervention in Southeast Asia is capable of having the most widespread consequences". I asked whether he should not consider, in the light of Japanese intervention in the dispute between Indo-China and Siam, whether alarm over Japanese policies in this area is not justified. Mr. Ohashi protested that Japan's interests in Southeast Asia were predominantly economic. Was it our intention to prevent Japan from entering into more satisfactory and closer economic relations with Indo-China and the Netherlands East Indies? [1792-1793] I replied that we were not concerned with arrangements calculated to be mutually profitable and which were entered into freely and not as a result of demands with menaces, open or implied. He would understand that proposals concerning trade arrangements presented under the guns of naval vessels could hardly be regarded as ordinary trade arrangements. Mr. Ohashi said that no Japanese warships were in the Indies and that the commercial negotiations now being carried on by Japan with the Netherlands Indies and Indo-China were of a normal character.

Mr. Ohashi said that he was waiting with great interest reports which Admiral Nomura would be sending in shortly of his forthcoming interviews with the President and the Secretary of State. I had then been in Mr. Ohashi's office more than an hour. I rose to go. I said that upon my return to Tokyo I asked various colleagues what sort of a man Mr. Ohashi was and that they had all replied that he was extremely frank—that some had added that he was frank to the point of unpleasantness. I went on to say that I was very glad that he had been both frank and courteous with me, and that he could count on me to maintain equal frankness and courtesy with him in our future conversations. A faint smile came to Mr. Ohashi's face and he said that he would be glad to receive me at any time.

E(UGENE) H. D(OOMAN)

[1794] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, we will discuss that telegram. I would like to have you go to No. 4 paragraph. Will you just read part of that so that you are familiar with it? You need not read it aloud.

Mr. GREW. Section 4?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, just glance at it.

Mr. GREW. Well, this is all mixed up. I have the true reading here. Possibly you have the paraphrase.

Senator FERGUSON. I have the paraphrase.

Mr. GREW. That is quite different. I hope the true reading will be made the record and not the paraphrase.

The CHAIRMAN. The exhibit is the true reading of the message.

Mr. GREW. Can you tell me how the passage begins that you wish to refer to?

Senator FERGUSON. It begins in the book, "If the fiber and temper of the Japanese people are kept in mind."

Mr. GREW. I will see if I can find that.

Yes, I have it here. Do you wish me to read that part?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. This is the original text.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Will you read the original text?

Mr. GREW (reading):

Having in mind the temper and fibre of the Japanese people, the view that the progressive imposition of [1795] drastic economic measures, while attended with some risk of war, would probably avert war, is a dangerously uncertain hypothesis upon which to base the considered policy and measures of the United States. Our own view is that if such a course is taken would not avert war. Nevertheless both views are no more than opinion, and it is therefore our belief that it would be contrary to our national interests to postulate the correctness of either opinion and to erect thereon a definite policy. To do so would be to put the cart before the horse. The primary point for decision would appear to involve the question as to whether our national needs, policies and objectives justify war with Japan in the event that diplomacy, our first line of national defense should fail, for only on the basis of such decision could the Administration follow a course divested so far as possible of elements of opinion, speculation and uncertainty. I do not doubt that such decision, which might well prove to be irrevocable, has already been fully debated and adopted, for the sands are running fast."

Senator FERGUSON. What did you mean by "the sands were running fast"?

Mr. GREW. I meant that the risk of war was steadily increasing.

Senator FERGUSON. Another part of the telegram, under section 4, 1736—I have just received the original copy:

[1796] The view therefore that war in the Far East can best be averted by continuation of trade embargoes and, as proposed by some, the imposition of a blockade is not supported by what has thus far occurred.

Were you of that opinion on the 3d of November?

Mr. GREW. What part is that? Is that a separate telegram?

Senator FERGUSON. This is No. 1736. It is marked 1736, and it is November 3, 3 p. m., at the top, section 4.

Mr. GREW. Can you tell me what paragraph it is?

Senator FERGUSON. Will you show it to him, Counsel?

It is underscored with red in my copy. I will show you my original.

Mr. GREW. All right, I have it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any significance to the underscoring in red?

Senator FERGUSON. Not unless the chairman wants to make something of it.

The CHAIRMAN. I don't know who underscored it.

Mr. GREW. I have it.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, what did you mean by that paragraph?

Mr. GREW (reading):

The view therefore that war in the Far East can thus be averted by continuation of trade embargoes [1797] and, as proposed by some, the imposition of blockade is not supported by what has thus far occurred.

It is obvious that by November 3 our trade embargoes had not served to restrain the Japanese Army from its expansion. They were going right ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. Am I correct that in 1938 you were somewhat of the opinion that embargoes would not avert war or they might cause war and then that you changed in 1940 your opinion and advised a different course, as you did in the telegram of October 12, 1940—or was that September 12, 1940?

Mr. GREW. September 12.

Senator FERGUSON. And your letter to the President of December 14, 1940, that you changed your attitude.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And now, are you changing back on November 3?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely. You see, the policy which I had advocated in September, 1940, and which was put into effect brought up precisely the situation which I had envisaged, namely, that the Japanese intelligent leaders would realize that they were on the brink of an abyss and that they had better pull back. I think they tried to do so at that time. Unfortunately, those efforts failed and a military dictatorship [1798] cabinet came in and from that moment on the chances were very, very slim of being able to bring the thing about. So, naturally, I, under those circumstances, my views as reflected here, were of that particular moment.

Senator FERGUSON. You wanted to convey that to the State Department, that your views had changed, and that is why you sent this telegram of November 3 to the Secretary of State and the Under Secretary of State, so that it would receive their attention?

Mr. GREW. Naturally, Senator, every telegram which I sent the Secretary I wanted to have receive attention.

Senator FERGUSON. Where you designated the Secretary and the Under Secretary, did that place more importance upon it?

Mr. GREW. That places more importance upon a telegram, that is true. I did want that telegram to receive special attention, without question.

Senator FERGUSON. Because it was a change in your views?

Mr. GREW. It was a definite change, undoubtedly, because of changes of circumstances.

Senator FERGUSON. From the original telegram, I would like to have you go to the last sentence.

Mr. GREW. The last sentence of the whole telegram?

Senator FERGUSON. Well, it is in the book as "Action by Japan which might render unavoidable an armed conflict with the [1799] United States"—

Mr. GREW. "It would be similarly short-sighted to base our policy on the belief that these preparations are merely in the nature of saber rattling the exclusive purpose of giving moral support to Japan's high-pressure diplomacy. Japan's resort to measures which might make war with the United States inevitable may come with dramatic and dangerous suddenness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would indicate that it is now after 4 o'clock and unless the Senator from Michigan can conclude, we will recess.

Senator FERGUSON. I cannot finish, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, we might as well recess.

The Chair is advised that Secretary Hull will return at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. So, Mr. Grew, your further punishment will be deferred for an hour or so.

Mr. GREW. I shall be glad to be here. Thank you.

(Whereupon, at 4:02 p. m., a recess was taken until 10 a. m., Wednesday, November 28, 1945.)

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson; and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[1801] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Yesterday when the examination of Secretary Hull was suspended, the Chair announced that the committee would excuse him for 2 or 3 days, to enable him to rest a little. Before we recessed yesterday afternoon, he sent word that he wanted to return this morning, but on account of the weather it is not thought advisable to bring Secretary Hull out, and therefore the committee is glad to excuse him for today, and until such time as it is convenient for him to return.

Therefore, Mr. Grew may return to the stand.

Senator Ferguson.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH CLARK GREW (Resumed)

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, I think we were on the last sentence in the November 3 message. You had just read that the the committee. I would rather you look at the original, rather than the paraphrased version.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there a correction on the original?

Mr. GREW. I see no correction.

Oh, yes. Apparently the text must have been garbled in transcribing, Senator; so there appear to be two corrections. Shall I mention those?

[1802] Senator FERGUSON. Yes, that is what I wanted to have you do. I wanted to know if you could tell us how it was when you sent it.

Mr. GREW. I think it was probably sent as it now appears corrected:

Japan's resort to measures which might make war with the United States inevitable. May come with dramatic and dangerous suddenness.

So far as I recollect that was the way the telegram was sent.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, you put in your book at page 470, you headed it "National hara-kiri not only possible but probable."

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So, when you wrote the message on November 3, you felt—that was how you were feeling, that Japan would "do or die," as you expressed it?

Mr. GREW. I thought that that danger, that risk, very definitely existed.

Senator FERGUSON. And you end your quotation in your book, your paragraph, by saying "that important telegram is on the record for all time."

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, what did you mean by that?

[1803] Mr. GREW. Well, I wanted to have my views and position perfectly clear. That is what that means.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you want to indicate that you had conveyed to our Government and the State Department that war may come with dramatic and dangerous suddenness?

Mr. GREW. Did I what, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Did you want to convey that?

Mr. GREW. Yes; very definitely.

Senator FERGUSON. You felt that you were conveying that by the message?

Mr. GREW. I felt that I was conveying that thought.

Senator FERGUSON. You felt at that particular time, when you sent the message, that war was near, did you?

Mr. GREW. I felt that there was the risk and the danger of war. As I have already said, I never gave up hope up to the last minute.

Senator FERGUSON. I realize you had the hope, but you felt the risk was great at that time.

Mr. GREW. I felt that the risk and danger of war was very great and increasing.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you hear the statement of Mr. Welles when he changed his opinion from, I think it was, 1,000 to a million?

Mr. GREW. Well—

[1804] Senator FERGUSON. Were you increasing—

The CHAIRMAN. Let the witness finish his answer.

Mr. GREW. Yes, I heard that statement of Mr. Welles. I have never tried to use percentages of risk because it was an imponderable question. I merely stated, and felt the danger of the risk of war was very great at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. In relation to the note of the 17th of August, I don't know whether I put the direct question to you, but I want to put it now; did you ever have any knowledge as to whether or not Great Britain gave any parallel notice or action similar, or along the same line as that note of August 17?¹

Mr. GREW. I have no recollection to that effect, Senator. I have asked the officers in the Department to look that up, go into the files, and they have promised to do it. I don't know whether they have yet found anything or not. I think they will find nothing.

Senator FERGUSON. The Ambassador was Mr. Craigie.

Mr. GREW. Sir Robert Craigie.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you recall any conversations with Craigie about parallel actions, or parallel notices.

Mr. GREW. I recall no definite conversation to that effect.

Senator FERGUSON. That article in the New York Times [1805] on August 13, 1941, that you read yesterday, doesn't refresh your memory?

Mr. GREW. No. Senator, as I recollect, that article stated definitely that this statement in the New York Times—

Senator FERGUSON. Would you care to see it?

Mr. GREW (continuing). Was a report of what was being said in political circles in general. I don't think that that report was ascribed to any individual.

[1806] Senator FERGUSON. Now, in relation to the Konoye government, there is one other question I wanted to ask you. I think you said yesterday, did you not, that if there was a failure of the President and Konoye to meet, you felt that the Cabinet would fall and there would be a new dictatorship Cabinet; is that correct?

Mr. GREW. I did and I so reported.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Now, did you also gather from that that the Japanese, that is, the Government, would be convinced that the United States was stalling for time and that war might be counted upon at any time; was that connected with the Konoye-President meeting?

Mr. GREW. During that particular Konoye administration I did not feel that war was likely to break out at any moment; no, sir, not at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you think it would take some time after the Konoye Government fell before that would crystallize?

Mr. GREW. You mean before war should break out?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, before war would crystallize.

Mr. GREW. That was a matter which we could only guess about. After the Tojo government came in, Mr. Togo, the Foreign Minister, said that they were going to continue the conversations and try to come to an agreement with the United [1807] States and the conversations did continue, but, frankly, I felt that the possibility of coming to an agreement between the United States and Japan, after the Tojo Government had come into power, had very much decreased.

[1808] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, did you know at any time that we had in mind that if Japan went across a certain line—let me get that line; exhibit 15, I think.

Mr. KEEFE. I think it is exhibit 17, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you have the November 5 letter? Counsel, please get me the November 5 letter of General Marshall and Admiral Stark.

Mr. GESELL. The 27th, isn't that the one you want, Senator, November 27, the joint memo of November 27?

Senator FERGUSON. I think it is probably in this one. [reading]:

After consultation with each other, United States, British, and Dutch military authorities in the Far East agreed that joint military counteraction against Japan should be undertaken only in case Japan attacks or directly threatens the territory or mandated territory of the United States, the British Commonwealth, or the Netherlands East Indies, or should the Japanese move forces into Thailand west of 100° East or south of 10° North, Portuguese Timor, New Caledonia, or the Loyalty Islands.

Mr. GREW. So far as I can recollect, Senator, I was not informed of that fact.

Senator FERGUSON. You had no knowledge along that line [1809] at all?

Mr. GREW. So far as I can recollect I had no knowledge along that line at all.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you familiar, Mr. Grew, about the time or prior to the time you wrote your telegram of November 3 of the editorials that were appearing in the New York Tribune and also the New York Times? They appeared in September; that is, as to what our Government's opinion was on the Japanese question in relation to the fact that the economic pressure would have results.

Mr. GREW. No, Senator. Those leading editorials were often sent to me by our pouch, by mail. They arrived in Japan anywhere from 3 weeks to a month later. It may have been possible that on certain occasions an editorial or the substance of an editorial may have been cabled me but, frankly, I have no recollection of such messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, you sent your telegram of the 3d and you considered that a very important message to our government.

Was there anything then existing as far as you were concerned that caused you to send that, "that our Government may not be thinking along the same lines", and that you did it as a warning?

Mr. GREW. No, sir. I recollect no such thought. My [1810] position was purely objective. I was trying to report the situation as I saw it from that point of view at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the significance, Mr. Grew, of your message that "the Cabinet has made up its mind and told the Emperor"?

Mr. GREW. What message is that?

Senator FERGUSON. I think it is in the November 3. It is in one of your messages and I am quite sure it is in the November 3 message. Do you remember the fact that they hold told the Emperor?

Mr. GREW. I would like to refresh my memory on that passage if I may.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Can you tell me in what section of the telegram that appears?

Mr. MURPHY. It is a most indefinite question.

Senator FERGUSON. It is the part that the Cabinet had made up its mind and had told the Emperor. I may be paraphrasing the language.

Mr. GREW. I do not find that passage, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall that fact, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. That I reported that the Cabinet had made a——

Senator FERGUSON. No, that the Cabinet did make up its mind and told the Emperor what it was going to do.

[1811] Mr. GREW. Well, you mean that I have reported that statement?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, in effect.

Mr. GREW. I would like to have that.

Senator FERGUSON. No, I will try and find it later for you, Mr. Grew.

Mr. GREW. I do not recollect reporting that fact.

Senator FERGUSON. I tried to keep the Foreign Relations memo after my information but I do not have it on that one.

Mr. GREW. Of course, I could not possibly have known what the Cabinet had decided, so if I stated that it must have been merely opinion.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you know whether or not you ever had that knowledge that the Cabinet had made up its mind? I am talking about the Tojo Cabinet.

Mr. GREW. Had made up its mind to go to war?

Senator FERGUSON. Well, what it was going to do?

Mr. GREW. No, sir. It was practically impossible to ascertain what went on in Cabinet meetings. There were always a great many rumors in the press, a great many rumors flying around town, but to get at the actual facts of the procedure of any Cabinet meeting was practically impossible.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, I think you gave in your [1812] testimony earlier the fact that Japan might strike without a declaration of war and you had in mind what they did in 1904 at Port Arthur.

Mr. GREW. I did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you say the last paragraph of your November message conveyed the same idea?

Mr. GREW. I think that idea is conveyed more definitely in my telegram of October 17.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, we will go to your telegram of November 17.

Mr. GREW. Of November 17, that is right.

Senator FERGUSON. November 17, and will you give the part of the telegram that you think contains that on November 17?

Mr. GREW. Will you find that for me?

Senator FERGUSON. I think you may find it on 743.

Mr. GREW. I said in that telegram:

In emphasizing need for guarding against sudden military or naval actions by Japan in areas not at present involved in the China conflict I am taking into account as a probability that the Japanese would exploit all available tactical advantages, including those of initiative and surprise.

I think that is the passage that you have in mind.

[1813] Senator FERGUSON. So you think that that more nearly conveys the idea that they may strike without a declaration of war?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely.

Senator FERGUSON. And you had in mind what they had done at Port Arthur?

Mr. GREW. I think that word "surprise" comprises that thought.

Senator FERGUSON. And you conveyed that to our Government on the 17th of November?

Mr. GREW. I did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think that that strengthened your former message of November 3?

Mr. GREW. I think it supplemented it.

Senator FERGUSON. Supplemented it. You felt that you were conveying this knowledge that you had to the Government in as direct language as you could?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, on page 485 of Foreign Relations, II, I think the statement is made that:

I said in that case I feared that everything was over and that I would soon be leaving Japan.

Mr. GREW. You said in "Foreign Relations." Isn't that in my book?

[1814] Senator FERGUSON. I think it is in your book, maybe.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, 485.

Senator FERGUSON. That was page 485 of your book [reading]:

I said that in that case I feared that everything was over and that I would soon be leaving Japan. Soon afterwards, however, the press announced that the conversations would be continued. But my friend seemed crushed.

Will you give us an explanation of that remark? That was made on December 1, 1941.

Mr. GREW. Yes. Well, if it had been true under the circumstances then obtaining that the Cabinet had decided to break off the conversations completely, I would have thought at that time that the situation was hopeless. As a matter of fact, my friend was wrong because the Cabinet decided, at least ostensibly, to carry on the conversations further.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, I notice in your book, the same page—do you have your book before you?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, I have.

Senator FERGUSON. In capital letters and quotations on the same page, at the bottom of the page, before "December 5, 1941":

"WASHINGTON HAS DELIVERED AN ULTIMATUM TO US."

[1815] Do you see that?

Mr. GREW. Yes, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. "Washington has delivered an ultimatum to us."

Mr. GREW. I think it is a little misleading, perhaps, to take that sentence out of its context. I was discussing the whole telegram here.

Senator FERGUSON. I am not taking it out of its context. I am asking if you see it. I am trying to call it to your attention.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, I have it before me.

Senator FERGUSON. And it is in capital letters?

Mr. GREW. Not in capital letters in my book.

Senator FERGUSON. The heading; I am talking about the heading. I am trying to convey to you the heading.

Mr. GREW. Oh, well, that is in quotation marks, that heading.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I said it was in quotation marks.

Mr. GREW. The headings were put in there purely arbitrarily.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREW. They were not necessarily put in there to emphasize or to supplement the text.

[1816] Senator FERGUSON. Well I am trying to get you now to look at what I am looking at.

Mr. GREW. I see it.

Senator FERGUSON. And then I will ask you some questions.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the word "ultimatum" is used in that quotation. Will you tell us why you used the word "ultimatum" in the quotation?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield to the Congressman from Pennsylvania?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Isn't it a fact that the gentleman who wrote the book is quoting the Japanese spokesman's feeling that it was an ultimatum?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Someone who was not familiar with the message of the 26th?

Senator FERGUSON. The word "East" means the Japanese. This is the Japanese speaking. Isn't that correct, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. It was not an American at all.

[1817] Mr. GREW. That is correct, that was a Japanese who was speaking and it was reflecting his point of view.

I think it is very important, in this connection, Senator, to have this whole passage put on the record.

Senator FERGUSON. I want you to read the whole passage now. Will you read it?

Mr. GREW. I will do so. [reading:]

DECEMBER 5, 1941.

Yesterday I received in his own handwriting a letter from a prominent Japanese who is closely in touch with Government circles here. This letter reads in part as follows: "The situation is very regrettable. You know how I feel and I may understand your feelings. Permit me to set forth frankly to you what is now in my mind. I have had conversations with friends and after examining their feelings I have come to the conclusion that they believe, with no knowledge of the actual contents of the American document of November 26"— and I think that that passage should be emphasized—

"that Washington has delivered an ultimatum to us. Such is the regrettable psychology of our people * * *."

That is the pertinent part of that passage, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, all right.

Now, as I understand it, without any knowledge—we [1818] are talking now about the Japanese—without any knowledge on their part they were treating the instrument, the note of November 26 of the United States to the Japanese, as an ultimatum.

Mr. GREW. Yes. I can tell you why, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I mean that is what you were conveying.

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, will you tell us why, in your opinion, the Japanese in Japan were treating it as an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. The Japanese military government were clearly putting out the impression that that document was an ultimatum. It suited the military to do so.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that at the same time that the note was delivered that the Ambassador here, the Japanese Ambassador, was treating the note to the same effect?

Mr. GREW. I assume that—

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, in Foreign Relations, 766, that the American proposal was unacceptable and was to be interpreted as tantamount to meaning the end.

Will you look at page 766?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. That is in that long conversation beginning on page 756?

Mr. GREW. The statement that you refer to is on some other page.

Senator FERGUSON. What page is it on?

Mr. GREW. I will have to look.

Senator FERGUSON. It is on page 766. [Reading:]

Mr. KURUSU said that he felt that our response to their proposal could be interpreted as tantamount to meaning the end and asked whether we were not interested in a modus vivendi.

It is on page 766, at the top. It starts, "Mr. KURUSU." It was written by Joseph W. Ballantine.

Senator FERGUSON. No, 766.

Mr. GREW. I beg your pardon. All right.

Mr. KURUSU said that he felt that our response to their proposal could be interpreted as tantamount to meaning the end, and asked whether we were not interested in a modus vivendi.

Senator FERGUSON. Now were you familiar with the fact that here they were also treating, in effect, the note of the 26th as an ultimatum? I am talking about "they" as meaning the Japanese.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. In the body of the gentleman who is the witness he refers to "certain people in Japan," but the gentleman does not pretend to say who they were.

Mr. GREW. Senator, all I can say to that is the records of most of the conversations which took place in Washington between the Japanese Ambassador and the Secretary of State were telegraphed to me in Tokyo. Sometimes they were slow in coming, sometimes they were delayed for several days, and sometimes they were so garbled in transmission that I had to ask for repeats. They were very often delayed. I do not know whether this particular record was sent me or not. I will [1821] have to check up on that.¹

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever convey to the State Department that at least some of the people in Japan were treating the note of the 26th as an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. I find, Senator, in a telegram which I sent to the Secretary of State on December 5, that I repeated the pertinent part of that conversation with that prominent Japanese which I have just mentioned.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you tell me what it is, from that telegram?

Mr. GREW. Would you like me to read the whole telegram?

Senator FERGUSON. Just that part, unless you want to read it all.

Mr. GREW. I think it would be well to read the whole thing for the record.

Secretary of State (rush)

1895, December 5, 5:00 p. m.

Strictly confidential for the Secretary and Under Secretary only.

You will no doubt be aware that the American proposal—that refers to the memorandum of November 26—is being represented here to the press and to the public as a mere restatement of "fanciful principles which ignore the realities of the situation", and that no intimation [1822] whatever has been given out that the proposal, if implemented, would provide Japan by peaceful and orderly processes with that security—political as well as economic—which she affects to seek by exercise of force. The response of most Japanese to whom we have said—presumably to whom we have talked, there must be a mistake there—

The response of most Japanese to whom we have—

Mr. MITCHELL. Shown.

Mr. GREW. I think this is the meaning:

The response of those Japanese to whom we have said that the American proposal, far from being a formulation of fanciful principles designed to preserve the old order of things, is a well-balanced, constructive, practical and forward-looking plan for creating order out of the disorders of the past, has been to express strong disappointment that the private individual is not in a position to form any intelligent opinion with regard to a matter of such supreme importance, while some have said that if the American proposal is actually such as we have described it to be, an attitude of intransigence on the part of the Japanese would be viewed with regret by the masses.

It is impossible to forecast precisely what effect [1823] publication of our proposal would have. Undoubtedly reaction to certain phases of the proposal, notably complete evacuation of China, would be strong and indeed might be so violent as to eliminate the last possibility of an agreement. However, there would seem to be even greater risks of the elimination of that possibility if the points at issue continue in Japan to be befogged by ignorance and misrepresentation. I feel sure that you will have considered the wisdom of publishing the proposal as soon as possible in consultation with the Japanese Government, but even without the latter's consent if that should not be forthcoming, publication to be accompanied by a statement substantially along the lines of the thought expressed in paragraph two of my 1874, December 1, 8:00 p. m.

A prominent Japanese in close touch with government circles wrote to me in handwriting yesterday inter alia:

"The situation is most deplorable. I may understand how you feel and you know how I feel. Allow me to write to you frankly what I have now in my mind. After speaking with friends and studying their frame of mind I come to conclude that they feel without having the knowledge of the true nature of your document of the [1824] 26th November as if we received an ultimatum from Washington. Under such unfortunate psychology of your people"—

I think that is "our" people. I think he is referring to his own people there and I think it is garbled—

"Under such unfortunate psychology of our people the only way left us, I think, that your Government will broadmindedly take our proposal as a base of discussion for the modus vivendi with a view of arriving at final settlement on the line of your proposal. From sheer desire for happy ending I have to write you." I believe—this is my statement—

this letter to be a fair criterion of public opinion here.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, Mr. Grew, do you know how many messages you sent to Washington between the 27th, which would be our 26th, and the 7th? I think the book shows two. Is that all you sent?

Mr. GREW. I think I undoubtedly sent more than that.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you look it up for the committee and see whether you sent any more than that, so that the committee might have all that you sent? ¹

Mr. GREW. There were certain telegrams which I sent to the Secretary of State subsequent to the commencement of war.

Senator FERGUSON. I am just talking about up to and including the 7th.

[1825] Mr. GREW. I will look. I will have the files examined and see.

Senator FERGUSON. Just to try and refresh your memory as to what was going on in Japan I will ask you if they have a paper known as Asahi?

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. How do you pronounce it?

Mr. GREW. Asahi.

Senator FERGUSON. Under the December 1 date line the newspaper Asahi, in a dispatch from Washington, asserted that the closing of the Japanese consulates in the United States was imminent, and from the New York Times of December 5, 1941, I am quoting:

Tokyo, Friday, December 5.—Tokyo was struck by a bombshell, in the words of the newspaper Asahi today, with the revelation of the substance of the Japanese-American negotiation by President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull.

Then—

Domei, Japanese news agency, said last night: "It is utterly impossible for Japan to accept the stipulations of the American document."

Were you familiar with those quotes?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I never saw those messages, but I might say that everything that went out over the newspaper [1826] agency Domei was carefully controlled by the Japanese Government.

Senator FERGUSON. I am assuming that in the question.

Mr. GREW. In effect the Japanese Government owns it. So anything that went out is simply what the Japanese Government wanted to have passed on to the public.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, our State Department should have been taking that kind of a message as the Government speaking rather than the people?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely. There was not any question about that.

[1827] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, the last question in the Navy report was this:

Can you remember any information received from our State Department as to the probability of the United States coming into armed conflict with the Japanese if Japan was at war with the British in the Pacific?

Here is your answer, on page 1068 of the Navy report:

I could not answer that, sir, without exploration.

Do you recall that question and that answer?

Mr. GREW. I do not happen to recall that particular question; no, sir. That hearing took place long ago.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I will read the question again to you, because I would like to have it answered.

Can you remember any information—

The CHAIRMAN. The Secretary was about to make a further answer.

Mr. GREW. No, sir. Thank you, I think not, Mr. Chairman. I will listen to the statement.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

Can you remember any information received from our State Department as to the probability of the United States coming into armed conflict with the Japanese if Japan was at war with the British in the Pacific?

Mr. GREW. I recollect no such statement.

[1828] Senator FERGUSON. Do you remember the answer that you gave there, "I could not answer that, sir, without exploration." What would that mean?

Mr. GREW. That would mean I would wish to examine the official files of the State Department to see whether anything had been sent to me on that subject. I do not think it was, but I do not like to give a categorical answer in a case of that kind without exploration.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you make such exploration so we will get the benefit of that?

Mr. GREW. I will, Senator. I want to be sure that the various points which you asked me to explore will be taken down.

Senator FERGUSON. I assume that counsel will give you that. I do not want you to have to rely on your own memory either.

Mr. GREW. Were there any confidential or secret communications from the State Department of our policy toward Japan that were not published by the State Department? Do you know of any now?

Mr. GREW. Senator, as I said the other day, there is a very large amount of material which passed between the State Department and the Embassy at Tokyo, and vice versa, during those years. If all that material had been published [1829] it would probably take a dozen or more volumes. I know of a great deal of material which was not published, but I cannot say that that material would have been pertinent to this investigation.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know of any of it that would be pertinent?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; offhand I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, if you think of some after you leave the witness stand, will you convey that information to the committee, so you may return with it so that we may all have the facts?

Mr. GREW. You wish me to think the matter over and see if I can remember anything which might be helpful to the committee?

Senator FERGUSON. After you leave the stand. You do not have to do it now.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, I will do that.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, when you destroyed—does the chairman want to put something on the record?

The CHAIRMAN. No, I do not. If I do want to put something on I will do it. I was just talking to my colleague here.

I did not mean to interrupt the Senator. Go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, do you remember when you [1830] destroyed the Code in the Embassy at Tokyo?

Mr. GREW. We, as I recollect it, Senator, destroyed some of our codes a few days before Pearl Harbor, but we kept certain codes for use up to the last moment, which were destroyed actually after we had learned that war had broken out.

Senator FERGUSON. What codes did the Embassy destroy prior to Pearl Harbor?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. Are we going to reveal the American code?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman is not able to answer that question.

Senator FERGUSON. I did not understand the Congressman.

Mr. MURPHY. The question is does the gentleman now want the Ambassador to go into the discussion of the codes that America was using in its diplomatic relations?

Senator FERGUSON. No.

Mr. MURPHY. Does he want him to name which ones we were using?

Senator FERGUSON. No.

Mr. GREW. I could not do it anyway.

Senator FERGUSON. Will the reporter read the question please?

(The question was read by the reporter.)

[1831] Mr. MURPHY. I am wondering if the gentleman wants to press that? We have codes that we are using all over the world, and I do not suppose we have changed them. I am wondering if you want to spread on the record for the world the kind of codes we were using during the war?

Mr. GREW. I could not possibly answer that question in any case. I could not recollect. As a matter of fact I had very little directly to do with the handling of the codes, and in any case, I would not know which codes were kept and which were destroyed.

Senator FERGUSON. But some were destroyed prior to December 7, prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GREW. That is my belief. I think there is some reference to that in the record. I would have to look it up.

Senator FERGUSON. There is reference to it. I am not bringing out anything new, except I wanted your knowledge on it.

Mr. GREW. I am afraid I cannot enlighten you on that. I did not know very much about it at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, do you recall any messages to you or to the Embassy that you were to destroy codes prior to the Pearl Harbor attack?

Mr. GREW. I do not recall a message having been received to that effect. I shall have to look that up, [1832] Senator.¹

Mr. GESELL. May I interpose, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GESELL. In Exhibit 18, under date of November 27, is a message to the Ambassador from Secretary Hull, which, in the last portion, while not mentioning codes specifically, appears to look toward the destruction of codes at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. May I see the instrument?

Mr. GESELL. Yes.

Senator GEORGE. What is the date of it?

Mr. GESELL. November 27, Senator.

Mr. GREW. Is that published?

Mr. GESELL. That is one of the exhibits in this case.

Mr. GREW. But not published in Foreign Relations?

Mr. GESELL. I do not think so.

[1833] Senator FERGUSON. Will you just show the instrument to Mr. Grew?

[The document was handed to Mr. Grew.]

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read it, Mr. Grew, and give us your interpretation of it?

Mr. GREW. I have read the telegram, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read it into the record?

Mr. GREW. Yes, if you wish.

¹ See Mr. Grew's testimony, p. 743 et seq., infra. See also Hearings, Part 5, p. 2066 for statement by Mr. Gesell.

WASHINGTON, November 27, 1941.

793 Confidential for the Ambassador.

In the light of the attitude of Admiral Nomura and Mr. Kurusu when they were handed on November 26th for consideration the document described in a separate telegram and of such indications as we have cumulatively had of the general attitude of the Japanese Government, it appears that the discussions up to the present time have not yet afforded any basis which gives much promise of a satisfactory comprehensive settlement. It is of course too early to adopt any definitive opinion whether the discussions will continue or will lapse, but the probability that they may lapse should not be lost sight of.

The existence of such probability makes it appear advisable that we give some advance consideration to [1834] various problems which may as a consequence arise in connection with our Foreign Service establishments in Japanese territory. As lapse of the conversations might result in withdrawal of our diplomatic and consular representation from Japan, it would seem to us that, without any intention of being alarmist or of too hastily envisaging serious contingencies, this question should be brought to your attention so that you may have it well in mind in case it should become necessary for the Department to consult you in regard to the making of arrangements for the packing of official and personal effects and the expeditious handling of other matters which would be involved in the closing of our Embassy and Consulates. It is, of course, desired that all phases of the matter be considered confidential that that discussion of it be kept to a minimum.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you receive that telegram, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; undoubtedly I must have received it.

Senator FERGUSON. Did that convey to you the idea that you were to dispose of some codes?

Mr. GREW. Not necessarily. This is the sort of telegram that any government, out of mere precaution, would send to its representatives abroad, as a purely preparatory message, to [1835] guard against possible contingencies that might arise but would not necessarily arise.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you or did you not have the codes destroyed as the result of that telegram?

Mr. GREW. That, Senator, I cannot answer definitely.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, will you look up and see whether or not you received any telegram from which you obtained the information that you were to or that you did destroy any codes?

Mr. GREW. I will.

Senator FERGUSON. And then will you get us that information?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now you had a naval attaché at the Embassy?

Mr. GREW. We did.

Senator FERGUSON. What was his name?

Mr. GREW. His name was Commander Smith-Hutton.

The CHAIRMAN. Smith what?

Mr. GREW. Smith-Hutton, S-m-i-t-h-H-u-t-t-o-n.

Senator FERGUSON. If he received a message to destroy his code it would come through your Embassy, or would it be directly to him?

Mr. GREW. It may have come either way. It might have come to me or it might have come directly to him, I don't know.

[1836] Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall any messages to the naval attaché to destroy codes?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. Prior to the attack.

Mr. GREW. I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was the Army attaché in the Embassy?

Mr. GREW. The military attaché was colonel—it has gone out of my head at the moment. We had so many different attachés from time to time, that I would like to check up on it.

Senator FERGUSON. Does counsel know, so he can help Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. It was Lt. Col. Harry I. Creswell.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall any messages—was he a lieutenant?

Mr. GREW. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Lieutenant colonel, he said.

Mr. GREW. He was lieutenant colonel at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you remember any messages to the lieutenant colonel to destroy any codes at that time?

Mr. GREW. I do not recollect it, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now going to the President's message to the Emperor, what time did you get it, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. I received the message in final form, after being decoded, at approximately 10:30 p. m. on December 7, [1837] Japanese time.

Senator FERGUSON. What time would that be in Washington and what date?

Mr. GREW. That would be 14 hours later. I understand that the message was sent from Washington at 9 p. m. on the 6th. I think the records show that.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. The records show it reached the Japanese Tokyo post office at 12 noon on the 7th. In other words, it arrived in just 15 hours. There was 14 hours difference in time, and allowing for 1 hour in transmission.

Senator FERGUSON. So it took 1 hour to transmit it?

Mr. GREW. It took approximately 1 hour to transmit it.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. The telegram was stamped "12 noon" and the telegram was delivered to me at the Embassy at 10:30 p. m. that day. It was held up all that time.

Senator FERGUSON. How do you account for that delay if somebody did not know the contents of that instrument?

Mr. GREW. If somebody did not know the nature of it?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Well, my guess would be when that message came it was probably turned over to certain authorities of the Japanese Government, who could have readily decoded it, because [1838] it was in what we called our nonconfidential code at that time, the gray code which was perfectly open to anybody, and my guess would be that the military authorities did not want this message to get to the Emperor at that time. That was always my belief.

Senator FERGUSON. It was held 15 hours by the Japanese before it was delivered to you?

Mr. GREW. It was held from noon to 10:30 that evening.

Senator FERGUSON. That night?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You had some reasons then for believing that the military authorities were holding it up so that it would not possibly reach the Emperor?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely, because, as a rule, the Japanese were expeditious in getting the telegrams through.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the explanation you want to convey?

Mr. GREW. That would be my opinion, my guess. I cannot prove it.

Senator FERGUSON. Does that indicate that they knew our code, or do you think it would come from the fact that the President here made a press release that he was sending a note to the Emperor?

Mr. GREW. I think that must have been taken in conjunction [1839] with the other. Undoubtedly the Japanese had picked up the radio messages, which I picked up myself. I picked that up in the early evening, that the President had sent the message to the Emperor, I picked that up from Station KGI in San Francisco, which went all over Japan.

So the military authorities must have known that such a message was coming and they must have been on the lookout for it.

Senator FERGUSON. So it would not be due to the fact that they were decoding the message because they did not know what was in the message, they could get it from the President's announcement here?

Mr. GREW. The President did not give the text at that time, did he?

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield to the Congressman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to say I understand that it was only a press release, that the message had been sent, and when the President sent the message he said he wanted it sent in the gray code, so it could be easily uncovered, and he did not care whether it was uncovered before the Emperor got it. That is in evidence.

Senator FERGUSON. I remember this "Dear Cordell" note. [1840] I remember the note, "Shoot this to Grew".

Mr. GREW. The President evidently did not mind if it was picked up.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. When you got the message 15 hours later and it was 10 something at night, you took it immediately, as I understand it, to Tojo.

Mr. GREW. To Togo, the Foreign Minister, not the Prime Minister, but the Foreign Minister Togo. I had made a provisional appointment as soon as I received the note over the radio that this was coming, and then as soon as I receive Mr. Hull's brief message, which was labelled "Triple Priority" and which did come to me—I do not know whether that was held up or not—saying this message was on its way, I promptly telephoned the message to the foreign Minister and made an appointment around midnight.

Senator FERGUSON. You did not go into the contents of the note?

Mr. GREW. Of the President's message?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. I did not know the contents until the document had been decoded.

Senator FERGUSON. I mean after you received it you did not discuss its contents with the Minister that you were delivering it to?

[1841] Mr. GREW. I did not. He asked to see it. I handed it to him to read, and he did read it. Then I asked that I be accorded an audience with the Emperor in order that I could present that message to him personally. The Foreign Minister quibbled on that. He said he would like to study it first. I said, "That is a very urgent matter and I now ask for an audience at the earliest possible moment." So he finally said, "I will present your request to the Emperor." That is all.

Senator FERGUSON. That was what hour?

Mr. GREW. That was about a quarter past midnight, about 12:15 a. m.

Senator FERGUSON. What time would that be in Washington?

Mr. GREW. Fourteen hours later. That, in Washington, would have been 10 a. m.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be 10 o'clock Sunday morning?

Mr. GREW. Ten o'clock Sunday morning, December 7.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, did you give your diary to the State Department when they checked your manuscript for your book?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I did not.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you have the parts that the State Department deleted from your book?

[1842] Mr. GREW. I had them at the time, yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you have them now?

Mr. GREW. A good many of them were deleted by me myself, because when I prepared the original manuscript it is always easier to prepare too much rather than too little material, and many passages were already marked "cut" before they were handed to the State Department at all. I do not have that manuscript now. I sent it to my publishers at the time, nearly 2 years ago now, and I suppose it has been destroyed.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not have anything then that would give us what was cut out or deleted by the State Department?

Mr. GREW. No, sir, I could not.

Senator BREWSTER. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, Senator Brewster.

Senator BREWSTER. In connection with the matter of the diaries, you read into the record yesterday the letter, the reply which you sent in response to my request. I can appreciate the personal aspects of the matter. I certainly would have no desire to embarrass you. On the other hand, I think you will also recognize that there perhaps has never been a matter that is of more profound national concern. While I can recognize your position, your desire to cooperate, which you have demonstrated, your own conviction that you have made [1843] available everything that should be of possible interest and concern, that statement is made in your book with the addition of the phrase that there were things which it would not be proper for you to publish at that time.

On page X you speak of this. You say "Many of the items in the original possess no permanent historic value. Others overlap. Still others cannot properly be published now." Which, I take it, is a fairly frank recognition on your part that there was material there which would be of public interest, and important, but which, owing to the exigencies of the war it would not be proper to make available at that time.

[1844] Of course I think the rule, as far as court procedure is concerned, is entirely well established, that documents or diaries which are used for refreshing one's memory, or informing one's self are available for examination.

I, at the same time, recognize all the other aspects involved, and that this is not a court proceeding, although it is perhaps more important, and it has perhaps more important aspects.

So I wondered, Mr. Grew, whether or not, you might feel justified, and properly so on your part, if you should permit our counsel, Attorney William Mitchell, in whom we all, I am sure, have confidence, as to his discretion, intelligence, and integrity, at least to make such examination as might seem warranted, to be sure that his judgment entirely coincided with yours as to the public or private character of any items that might be involved.

That is simply and solely in the interest of doing complete justice to probably one of the most important matters with which certainly Congress has ever had to deal.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the Senator yield?

Senator BREWSTER. I would like to have Mr. Grew's comment on this now.

Mr. GREW. I fully appreciate that position, Senator. In making the comment in my book that certain material "could [1845] not be published now," I had in mind at least some of the documents which have been presented to this committee, quite apart from the publications of the Department of State.

Senator BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. GREW. One telegram came up today with regard to our codes. That is the sort of thing that would not have been proper to publish at the time my book came out. I do not even know whether I had a record of that or not, but that is the sort of thing I had in mind.

Now, as I say, my diary was a private, personal document. I used it as a sort of sketchbook to get my ideas in order. It was a sort of scribbling from day to day, and many of the passages in it were incorrect, and could be misleading.

After ironing them out, and after checking up and trying to confirm the information which had come in to me, to elaborate my own thoughts on the situation at the time, that material then took shape in my official report to the Government, and all those official reports are on record, are on file and are available to the committee.

I would like, if I may once again, to read one little passage from my book, a very brief passage, on page 348. I will read this again. It is already in the record, but I will read it to you, to explain a little more clearly my [1846] attitude about this. This was written on November 1, 1940.

In the light of fast-moving developments, I scarcely dare read back in the diary nowadays because of its many inconsistencies which show it up for the patchwork sort of day-to-day scribbling it is. At least it shows our thoughts and our information, some of it reliable and some of it wholly unreliable, at any given moment—the moment of writing. It shows how often we are groping and fumbling in the dark. Less and less are we able to know what is going on behind the scenes, simply because many of our reliable contacts are no longer available and also because, even behind the scenes, the right hand often doesn't know what the left hand is doing.

That indicates my diary was not the sort of material which ought to be used as a criterion of anything. It was full of inconsistencies, full of inaccuracies, and for that reason alone, apart from its private and personal character, I would feel very reluctant to make any of it public.

Senator BREWSTER. That was not my question. My question was whether or not, in view of the tremendous public concern which is manifest in this situation, in order to obviate any possible personal question of purely personal adjustment, where both the wisdom and correctness of your official acts and that of others is necessarily under [1847] scrutiny, and where, as you have indicated, you have used this diary as a basis for refreshing your own recollection and determination as to any public questions that were involved, that the counsel for this committee, in whom everyone has confidence, should be permitted to make such an examination, in order that he might, at any rate, form his own judgment as to whether it concurs with yours.

That would at least be some measure of reassurance to the people of this country that no individual, as the chairman of the committee has said in presenting the resolution in this case, he emphasized very greatly that the public interest was so transcendent that no individual, high or low, living or dead, could possibly hope to be exempt from the proper scrutiny which this resolution was designed to give.

In view of questions which have been raised regarding possible limitations of members of the committee in any impartial consideration, I make this suggestion on that account, with the sole hope of serving the great public interest that is involved.

[1848] Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, may I make a statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Chair recognizes Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. MITCHELL. Since this hearing commenced, I have taken the position with every department of government that any papers that came into my hands, and that are entrusted to me, would be open to every member of the committee and to the full committee. I have stood on that from the start and I don't want to make any restrictions now. I think that I will have to take the position with Mr. Grew and the committee that if he, Mr. Grew, turns anything over to me to look at, I shall not withhold it from the committee members or the committee itself.

I furthermore feel an embarrassment about being put in the position of passing judgment on the materiality of Mr. Grew's material now, after one member of the committee has examined him for over 5 hours. My judgment as to what is pertinent and material and the judgment of some members of the committee might radically differ.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Mitchell, am I correct in stating it to be the law and the procedure of courts that a document of that character is available for the examination of counsel in a court proceeding?

Mr. MITCHELL. If a witness brings a memorandum into court and uses it to refresh his recollection in the courtroom [1849] it may be examined by counsel and the court, and introduced. Whether or not Mr. Grew has a right to withhold a private memorandum which he doesn't want to turn loose is a legal question that I haven't considered. I don't know what action the committee would be able to take if Mr. Grew stands on his position. You might have to bring a lawsuit against him, or a subpoena to compel him to produce it, and if he asserted his rights, then you would have a case in court for the next year or two to decide whether he had a right to withhold it or not.

That is all I can say about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does Mr. Grew wish to make any statement about that?

The question whether the committee would, under any circumstances, feel called upon to issue a subpoena to Mr. Grew to bring his diary in before the committee on the theory that he had or had not testified by refreshing his own recollection from it as to all the pertinent facts in regard to this inquiry, that is a matter which I don't think the committee could pass on here under snap judgment and might have to consider before any action would be taken.

In the meantime, the Chair feels that Mr. Grew's examination should not be suspended or held up, while the committee might enter into a discussion on that subject.

[1850] So, Senator Ferguson, you may proceed. Is that all you wanted, Senator Brewster? Is there anything further on that, Senator Brewster?

Senator BREWSTER. Well, I quite appreciate, of course, what the Chairman says and I certainly have no desire to embarrass Mr. Grew or compel him here publicly to discuss further the various aspects of this situation. I am quite willing to let the matter rest here at the present time.

I should like to consider it further myself and I am sure that probably the members of the committee would like to consider also all aspects involved.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson has this time.

Senator FERGUSON. I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. I wonder if there was any document, of any nature, exchanged between Mr. Grew and the State Department, from the State Department to Mr. Grew, or from Mr. Grew to the State Department, official document that is not available. It is my understanding that everyone of them are available.

Mr. MITCHELL. I might add to that that they are all available and we have gone over scores and scores of them and exercised a judgment as to what was material or not.

We have also had laid out all the exchanges which we don't think are material, and if any member of the committee [1851] wants to exercise his independent judgment on that, we will have all of the documents exchanged between them made available at once. There are hundreds of them. Relating to visas and passports, and all sorts of things. But everyone of them has been laid out so that any member of the committee who wants to see them, any official exchange between Mr. Grew and the State Department that we haven't thought worth while to produce, it is available.

As Mr. Gesell said yesterday, we only went back to January 1, 1941. Now, if you want us to go back of that, way back into 1940, why, that can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, I—

Mr. GREW. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to make my own attitude about this whole matter abundantly clear. I have tried to do so heretofore. It is as was expressed in my letter to Mr. Mitchell with regard to Mr. Brewster's request, in which I said I wished to do everything in my power to support and further the important work of this committee. I felt all of the pertinent facts should be brought out and laid before the American people. I believed that nothing of a pertinent nature should be concealed. And I think—I hope—I have shown, in my testimony, that [1852] I am not trying to conceal anything. I am trying to give every possible piece of information which will be helpful to this committee.

I also said in my letter that I had gone through the last several months in my diary before Pearl Harbor very carefully to see if I could find anything that might be pertinent to this hearing and, frankly, I found nothing.

That is my position, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, you do feel, however, that your position does place in you the determination as to what is material or not material to this inquiry?

Mr. GREW. Senator, as I have said constantly, after all, the controlling factor in all of these matters is the official correspondence. The official correspondence, everything that passed between the Department of State and myself is on the record here on file, and, as Mr. Mitchell said, available to the committee.

Now, the material on which those official reports were based, I don't think would be helpful to the committee.

Senator FERGUSON. But it does place in you, in you solely, that determination, the attitude that you take; isn't that true?

Mr. GREW. That is a question of interpretation, possibly [1853] legal interpretation, and I don't believe I would want to try to answer; the question as to whether any man has a right to retain his personal and private documents, that is a legal matter I couldn't answer.

Senator FERGUSON. I have just a few more questions.

Was it your custom to make over-all reports to the Secretary of State or the President, for instance, when you returned in 1939 to the United States to make a report to the President?

Mr. GREW. Well, of course, Senator, whenever I came back on leave of absence from my post, I saw the President and had a talk with him and saw the Secretary of State and had a talk with him, and naturally in those talks I painted the picture as I saw it at that time. I did not, I am afraid, keep records of those talks. When I came back I was in Washington only a short time and kept no records of those talks.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not the Secretary of State kept records of those talks?

Mr. GREW. That I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. Would counsel inquire if he did? ¹

Mr. Grew, it was customary then to make over-all reports when you finally returned after the war had started? I think you returned—in what year?

[1854] Mr. GREW. I returned on August 25, 1942.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you report to Mr. Hull at that time?

Mr. GREW. Yes, I did.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you report in writing?

Mr. GREW. Everything had been written pretty well up to date.

Senator FERGUSON. That isn't quite my question.

Mr. GREW. No; I don't recollect having submitted at that time any report in writing.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you think about that? That could be an important report.

Mr. GREW. I can answer that question now. I did not submit, I did not file any report, any written report.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you make any report, did you have a report? You say you didn't file it. What do you mean by that?

Mr. GREW. Well, I—what was the question, what did I mean by a report?

Senator FERGUSON. You said that you didn't file it, and that brought to my mind "what did you mean by you didn't file it." Did you have one, and not give it to him, or what do you mean by that?

Mr. GREW. I had notes, of course, which I had taken [1855] down which appeared in my diary, and I used those notes, of course, in any talks with the Secretary.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you have those notes now?

Mr. GREW. I have not.

Senator FERGUSON. Where are those notes?

Mr. GREW. They have been destroyed long ago.

Senator FERGUSON. They have been destroyed?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You made a report then in 1942 to the Secretary from notes that you had?

Mr. GREW. Notes to refresh my memory.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; to refresh your recollection.

Mr. GREW. But all of that material, as a matter of fact, is all here, in these books, all of it; the whole story is complete.

Senator FERGUSON. You had at that time original notes that you used to refresh your memory to report to the Secretary?

Mr. GREW. Yes; I had taken notes down from time to time.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you suggest that you wanted to make such a final report in writing?

Mr. GREW. Of course I did not.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be an important report, [1856] would it not?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; not necessarily, because all of the records, everything that I had to report up to the last minute, was contained in the official communications in the Department of State.

Senator FERGUSON. Then there is no way the committee could get what was in those particular notes that you had to refresh your memory; those have been destroyed?

Mr. GREW. They have been destroyed.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you speak to Mr. Hull about giving him a memorandum rather than just an oral statement?

Mr. GREW. I talked it over with him and I discussed some of the notes that I had taken and the whole thing was completely on the record. That was the whole story.

[1857] Senator FERGUSON. Then it was not his desire to have you report in writing or not report in writing, he didn't express himself either way?

Mr. GREW. After I had expressed my views about the situation no request was made for a written report because all the facts were already on file in the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, before asking any questions of Ambassador Grew I would ask the privilege of making a short statement in order to make certain requests of counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, go ahead.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, there is in evidence before the committee as part of exhibit 18 a document which contains a draft of a message from the President of the United States to the British Prime Minister dated November 24, 1941. This draft message was prepared by Mr. Hull. It contains a description of the so-called modus vivendi proposal for Japan.

The draft message is accompanied by a memorandum for the President signed by Mr. Hull which states:

If you approve of this draft telegram I shall arrange to have it forwarded.

The same document contains the notation, "O. K., see addition. F. D. R."

[1858] And it also contains an addition to the draft message of Mr. Hull suggested by the President.

It appears that that draft telegram prepared by Mr. Hull describing the modus vivendi proposal as approved by the President and with the President's additional paragraph added was actually sent to the British Prime Minister.

We also have in evidence a message from Ambassador Winant to the Secretary of State dated November 26, 1941, which bears the title "Most secret. For the President from the former Naval Person." This message from Mr. Churchill acknowledges the President's message about Japan, presumably his description of the modus vivendi proposals, and raises the question whether Chiang Kai-shek was not "having a very thin diet".

It appears from the evidence that the modus vivendi proposal was thereafter discarded by the Secretary of State and the so-called 10-point note of November 26 was handed to the Japanese Government.

It seems entirely probable to me that the President of the United States having described at some length the modus vivendi proposal to the British Prime Minister in a personal message and having received Mr. Churchill's views thereon, would also have described the American note of November 26 which was actually handed to the Japanese representatives and to the British Prime Minister.

[1859] Moreover it seems equally probable that the President of the United States would acknowledge the British Prime Minister's message as contained in the telegram of Ambassador Winant to the State Department of November 26.

No such acknowledgement of the British Prime Minister's message of November 26 by the President has been introduced before us. Nor do we have in evidence any message from the President to the British Prime Minister describing the American note of November 26 in the same manner in which we describe the modus vivendi proposal in an earlier message.

Again on November 30 we have in evidence before us a communication to the Secretary of State from Ambassador Winant containing a message from the British Prime Minister to the President of the United States outlining what Mr. Churchill described as "an important method remaining unused to avert war between Japan and our two countries."

It seems to me most probably that the President forwarded some reply to Mr. Churchill's message of November 30.

It now clearly appears from the evidence before us that the British Prime Minister and the President of the United States communicated messages directly to each other.

It is also obvious that we have no complete file of such communications before us.

We have no evidence or statement from counsel that the [1860] messages from Mr. Churchill to Mr. Roosevelt and the messages from Mr. Roosevelt to Mr. Churchill which have been introduced in evidence constitute the only communications between those two parties in this critical period of American-Japanese relationships.

Consequently I feel obliged to make the following requests of counsel:

1. Will counsel produce from the files of the State Department all communications from Mr. Winant, Ambassador to Great Britain, to the State Department, and from the State Department to Mr. Winant, for the period from November 24, 1941, and including December 7, 1941, together with a certificate from the custodian of such files in the State Department that the communications presented to the committee constitute all the communications from the State Department to Mr. Winant or from Mr. Winant to the State Department for the period specified.

I observe that the British Prime Minister in communicating with the President described himself as the "former naval person." This description and the Prime Minister's previous affiliation with the Admiralty suggests the probability that the President may have communicated with the British Prime Minister through the medium of the communications system of the Navy Department or the War Department, and that [1861] the British Prime Minister may have also communicated with the President through the medium of the British Admiralty and the Navy Department.

Consequently, I feel obliged to make the following request of counsel in order that we may be certain of all the facts:

Will counsel produce from the files of the War or Navy Department all communications from the President of the United States to the British Prime Minister, or to any intermediary of the British Prime Minister, such as the British Admiralty for the period from November 24, 1941, to and including December 7, 1941, together with a certificate from the custodian of such files, if any exists, and I do not know or say they do exist, in the War and Navy Departments, that the files presented to the committee contain all of the communications from the President to Mr. Churchill, or from Mr. Churchill to the President transmitted via the War or Navy Departments communications system, as the case may be, for the period from November 24 up to and including December 7, 1941.

If either Department informs counsel that there are no such files in existence in such Department, will counsel produce for the committee a certificate to that effect from the custodian of the files in either the War or Navy Department?

[1862] Now, will counsel also produce all records and copies of communications to and from Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill for the period from November 24, 1941, to December 7, 1941, which exists among the papers in the custody of the Roosevelt Estate, together with a certificate from the custodian of such papers that they constitute all such papers relating to the period specified in his or her custody on possession.

We are now examining important officials of the State Department dealing with the critical phase of the Japanese-American negotiations in the year 1941. We have affirmative evidence before us of direct communications from the British Prime Minister to the President and from the President to the British Prime Minister.

The communications which we have before us indicate, to me at least, the likelihood of their being other communications not only in reply to certain of the communications which we now have before us but on the same general topics covered by such communications.

Now, knowing this situation, I do not see how this committee or counsel can completely and adequately discharge their respective obligations without presenting the complete file from whatever source, War, Navy, or State Department, or the personal files of Mr. Roosevelt, of all communications between him and the British Prime Minister for the period of [1863] November 24 to December 7, 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. Will the Congressman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Mitchell, could you give us information on the request that was made for all the admiralty messages, as to whether or not we have, as a committee, received all the admiralty messages that I requested many weeks ago?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks counsel should answer first the request propounded by the Congressman from Wisconsin.

Senator FERGUSON. I thought this might answer that one question about the admiralty.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is included.

Mr. CONGRESSMAN. Would you mind letting us have a copy of that memorandum?

Mr. KEEFE. I will be very happy to. Pass it over to him, Mr. Murphy.

Mr. MITCHELL. So we will be able to work on it.

Mr. KEEFE. Just hand it over.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you.

I might say, without going into detail, that many of these things have been under examination and investigation to [1864] determine what there is. We would have to go over this memorandum carefully and see what we have done and see what more you would like to have us do. For instance, the White House records, we weren't going to rely on any certificate from Miss Tully. She was listed as a witness, and she would explain everything asked for. I mention that as one of the things involved. But you may be assured, Mr. Congressman, that we will do our very best, after we have studied this memorandum, to report to you what we have done and what we can do.¹

[1865] Now, as far as Senator Ferguson's request is concerned—his request put in, I think, 2 or 3 weeks ago—my memory is that he asked for all communications that passed between the British

Admiralty and the Navy Department during the years 1940 and 1941.

We submitted——

Senator FERGUSON. That related to the Far East.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, no. The request did not say what it related to. It said all of them, on the theory, I think that—I was not to be the judge as to whether they were material or not—probably he wanted about all of them.

We made that request to the Navy Department. Their report, first orally to me, was that during those years while the battle of the Atlantic was going on and we were involved in the escorting and naval work on the Atlantic, thousands of messages passed between the Admiralty and the Navy Department.

They also told me that the communications to and from the Admiralty to the Navy Department were not all kept in one file. They were put in different files, according to the subject to which they related. That to comply with the member's request would require the investigation of files including over 375,000 papers and they said it would take 11 men I have forgotten how long, some extraordinary time to do it.

[1866] Realizing what that meant I asked the Navy if they would please at least start with December 7, 1941, and work backwards for a month or two and dig out everything they could and I reported that orally to the Senator, I think, at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Mitchell, have you got all those that they have already dug out?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, we have all those that they dug out but it is only for a limited time and I would say this: If the Senator would only be willing to tell the Navy what subject matter he is interested in they may be able to locate it in one of these 375,000 papers much easier than it is with the information we have.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could I inquire? If counsel will give me what he already has I will be glad to point it out. I have not received them and I haven't any word that they received them. I haven't seen any except what you have placed here on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL. Neither have I. One of my assistants reports that material of that kind came in 2 or 3 days ago and I haven't honestly, had a chance to look at it.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, then you do not want to criticize the member of the committee for not giving you the information when he has not even seen it.

[1867] Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I suggested that if you would be willing to state what subject matter these messages relate to, which you are interested in, it would greatly facilitate the work of the Navy and they might go much farther back than they have done.

Senator FERGUSON. Could I see now what you have?

Mr. MITCHELL. You can see it as soon as we recess. I haven't it in the room.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I have in mind. Then I will give you definite information as to what I desire.

Mr. MITCHELL. That will help.

Senator FERGUSON. That will clear the matter up.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, do I understand now that the Navy at the present time is investigating 375,000 messages?

Mr. MITCHELL. No. When I found that problem confronting them I said we won't do it. We will start with December 7, 1941, and work backwards a month or two or three and get out some of this material and when you give it to us I will show it to the Senator and see if that is the sort of thing he wants. So it was finally impossible to do it as originally requested, but I am not criticizing the Senator. I am just answering his question and stating what the situation is.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, may I say to the [1868] distinguished counsel that the request which I have made is very specific. It does not cover 375,000 telegrams. It is very specific as to the type and character of information requested and very limited as to time.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the way we like to have them. This covers November 24 to December 7 and it is not an impossible proposition.

Mr. KEEFE. In making that request I had in mind the fact that there must have been innumerable communications between the Admiralty and our Navy and War Departments and I am only asking, for my purposes, for the specific information contained in that written request.

Senator LUCAS. May I ask if the Congressman from Wisconsin will yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman, will you yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KEEFE. I am very happy to yield. I have not taken much time, but I will yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Senator LUCAS. I am not going to take much time, only to congratulate you in what you have done here in asking counsel for express information which they can get, which they can go into in a hurry and obtain the information.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Proceed with your examination of Mr. Grew.

[1869] Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Now, Mr. Grew, I have listened carefully to your testimony and the rather extended cross-examination and my purpose in asking the few questions that I shall ask is to try and clarify some questions that have arisen in my mind and to get them into some sort of chronological order if possible.

Now, as I understand the situation, you reported to the State Department as our Ambassador in Japan beginning shortly after your arrival there, giving your impressions from time to time of the state of mind of the Japanese people and your observations and you made them rather full and complete; and during the period of time from 1932 on there developed, as I gathered from your testimony, a gradual disintegration, just gradual disintegration, with little spurts up and then spurts down diplomatically in the relationship between the United States and Japan.

I gathered from your testimony that there were in Japan some elements that were inclined to be bellicose and warminded and obsessed with their powers of greatness and expansion and aggression and that there were other groups that were fighting for peace. Is that correct?

Mr. GREW. That is correct, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. And you reported to the State Department from time to time what you observed with reference to the activities of these various groups? [1870]

The CHAIRMAN. You had better make your answers orally so that they get into the record, instead of nodding your head, Mr. Ambassador. The stenographer does not get your nod.

Mr. GREW. That is correct, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. And you observed the development of this Japanese war-minded spirit and the determination to expand as it developed in the years from 1934, 1935, 1936, on up to the final outbreak of war?

Mr. GREW. I did, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. And you tried to impress upon the State Department in those messages your conception as to the Japanese state of mind as it existed over those years, did you not?

Mr. GREW. That, obviously, was my duty, Mr. Congressman, and I tried to carry it out continuously during those years.

Mr. KEEFE. And in line with that attitude on your part, I was greatly interested in the report which you made to the Secretary of State on February 26, 1941, which transmitted to the Secretary of State a memorandum by the counsellor of the Embassy in Japan, Mr. Dooman, which had your full and complete approval. That is correct?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

[1871] Mr. KEEFE. The message of transmittal appears on page 137 of volume 2 of Foreign Relations of the United States, and then follows on pages 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, and 143 the report of Mr. Dooman's conversations with Mr. Ohashi. You recall that, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. I do, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. And then follows a memoranda from you to the Secretary of State advising of the conversation which you had on February 26 Tokyo time, with Matsuoka in which you told him that you concurred entirely in the statement that Mr. Dooman had made to Ohashi on February 14. Do you recall that?

Mr. GREW. I do recall that. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. Now, in this report of the Counsellor of the Embassy, dated February 14, 1941, he goes into great detail in setting forth the conversations which he had with Mr. Ohashi who was the Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs of Japan, and you are very familiar with that report?

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Dooman, it appears from the report, had been on furlough to the United States in the fall of 1940 and had, as he said, and I quote from it [reading]:

Mr. Ohashi said he understood that I had just returned from leave in the United States and that he supposed I had received a number of interesting impressions in the United States. I replied that my furlough in the United States coincided with one of the most significant and important periods in the history of our country, and that if he had time I would be glad to tell him briefly of what I had seen and heard while at home. Mr. Ohashi said that fortunately he was not busy that day and that I could stay as long as I wished.

And then follows the statement to Mr. Ohashi by Mr. Dooman of his observations gleaned from his trips around the country during the fall of 1940 which, by the way, was an election year and he refers to it in this statement and it finally ended up by his general statement to Mr. Ohashi that in the event that Japan continued the course that it was following it would inevitably be considered that it might lead to a diplomatic rupture and then Mr. Ohashi took the floor, do you recall?

The report says on page 140 of volume 2 of Foreign Relations:

Mr. Ohashi then took the floor and launched into an impassioned apologia of Japanese policies in recent years. He started by describing conditions in Japan during the middle twenty's.

and going on for two or three pages here setting forth the [1873] Japanese attitude.

Now, does that statement of Mr. Ohashi—I will not take the time to read it into the record because it is now in evidence—in your judgment, Mr. Grew, fairly express the Japanese attitude as you understood it?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Congressman, I haven't read this record of that conversation for a long time and while my recollection is that it was a fair presentation, I do not want to answer that question categorically without studying it. I believe it was, as I recollect it, a fair presentation of the Japanese position.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, in view of your transmitting it to the State Department and your approval of the whole message I assume that it could safely be said that except for any omissions that might properly have been included it is a fair statement of at least the position of Mr. Ohashi as reflecting what the Japanese attitude was during the years from 1920 on down.

Mr. GREW. It is a fair statement.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. Now, it appears that the Lease-Lend Act was approved by the President on March 11, 1941, and that on June 6, 1941, an act was approved for taking over foreign ships lying idle in United States ports. Do you recall that?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. That was in connection with the [1874] freezing of Japanese assets.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, the freezing of Japanese assets did not come until July 25, 1941.

Mr. GREW. That is right.

Mr. KEEFE. That came later.

Mr. GREW. Well, I do not remember the exact dates.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I have a memorandum. I have a paper showing these chronological dates.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. The freezing of Japanese assets took place on July 25, 1941. Now, when did the Konoye Cabinet fall? I just want to get that correctly.

Mr. GREW. As I recollect it, it fell on October 16. I can look that up very quickly if you wish.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, my recollection is I think you are correct.

Mr. GREW. I think it is October 16.

Mr. KEEFE. It was along about coincident with the proposal to reopen the Burma Road on the 17th of October, wasn't it?

Mr. GREW. That is right.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, on August 1, 1941, President Roosevelt banned the export of aviation fuel to Japan. Do you recall that?

[1875] Mr. GREW. I did not hear your statement, Congressman. Mr. Roosevelt passed what, the aviation what?

Mr. KEEFE. Read it, please.

(Whereupon the reporter read the question as follows: "Now, on August 1, 1941, President Roosevelt banned the export of aviation fuel to Japan. Do you recall that?")

Mr. GREW. Oh, yes, I recollect it perfectly.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, these were intended to be sort of economic sanctions or pressures applied to Japan in hopes that they would be effective in implementing the diplomatic conversations that were going on, isn't that true?

Mr. GREW. They were. Those steps were taken with the thought that it would lead Japan to such a position that the more intelligent and liberal-minded statesmen might possibly come into a position where they would control.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. That is a fact, yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. Well, it was intended to implement our general diplomatic attitude?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

Mr. KEEFE. That is true, is it not?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, as a matter of fact the imposition of [1876] these trade embargoes and the other economic sanctions that were imposed against Japan did not in any sense deter the war lords of Japan in their purposes and policies, did it?

Mr. GREW. They did not in the long run, in the end, no.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, can you point to any specific indication of any action on the part of Japan that indicated a change in their continued policy made and brought about as a result of the application of these economic sanctions?

Mr. GREW. Yes, Mr. Congressman, I think I touched on that yesterday. I think that is contained, the story is contained, in my telegram of September 29, 1941, in which I said that this economic situation in which Japan found herself had, in my opinion, brought about among the more intelligent statesmen in Japan the thought that they were approaching the brink of an abyss and it was my belief that at that time they tried to reverse the engine.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I understood your testimony, pardon me, Mr. Grew, in that regard, but my question does not relate definitely to that. There were intelligent people in Japan who could see the brink of the precipice, as you have indicated it so well, and that they were about to fall off into the abyss as you have stated, or as you stated it in September; but as a matter of fact those war lords who were running the show were not stopped at all. It may have had some effect on [1877] the other crowd, but not on the war lords. Isn't that true, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. That is, in general, true, but I would like to point out in that telegram of September 25, which is already on the record—

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman might suggest that the hour of 12 having arrived, and obviously you cannot conclude before recessing, that we will take a recess until 2:00 o'clock and you will have time to refresh your recollection.

Mr. KEEFE. Very well.

(Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, a recess was taken until 2 p. m. of the same day.)

[1878]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Before proceeding further the Chair wishes to state that inquiry has been made of him concerning the question of having a session on Saturday. The Chair is advised that the Congressman from Wisconsin, Mr. Keefe, will be unable to be here on Saturday, Congressman Murphy of Pennsylvania will be unable to be here Saturday, and that probably two or three other members of the committee will find it impossible to be here on this particular coming Saturday.

So that the committee has felt it wise not to attempt to held a session on Saturday of this week. That has no relationship to any program for Saturday meetings hereafter and in view of the importance of the hearing and the large number of witnesses, the Chair hopes that we will be able, after this week, to hold sessions on Saturday. For this coming Saturday there will be no session of the committee.

Now, Mr. Keefe, you may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH CLARK GREW (Resumed)

Mr. GREW. Mr. Chairman, before the questions—

Mr. KEEFE. Just a moment, please, Mr. Grew.

May I say to the Chairman that I want to thank him for his conclusion not to hold a meeting Saturday, so far as I am concerned, and having mentioned my name may I state, for [1879] the purpose of the record, that my interest in not being here Saturday was not prompted by the Army-Navy football game at Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair understands that, Congressman Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. I am compelled, because of illness in my family, as the chairman knows, to get away from here for at least one day.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman is glad to confirm that and his announcement that there will be no session Saturday had no relation whatever to the Army-Navy game.

Mr. KEEFE. May I say, observing the smiles on the faces of some of those in the room, they, perhaps, are likewise afflicted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to say that several days ago Congressman Keefe advised him that on account of the illness of his wife he felt compelled to be away this coming Saturday, and the Chair is able to appreciate fully how the Congressman feels about it.

So this recess for this approaching Saturday has, for the benefit of anybody who may smile—over which the Chair has no control—no relationship whatever to the Army-Navy football game.

All right, Mr. Keefe, go ahead.

[1880] Mr. GREW. Mr. Chairman, may I correct one misstatement of this morning for the record?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Is it agreeable to you, Mr. Keefe?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. I would like to correct one inaccuracy in my testimony of this morning and also bring forward two documents which were requested by Senator Ferguson and which I found in the meantime.

This morning Senator Ferguson asked me if I had on returning from Japan in August 1943 submitted a report to Mr. Hull.

Well, 3 years have gone by since that time and, frankly, I had forgotten the fact that I did submit to Mr. Hull a series of dispatches, quite a number of reports, covering the whole story of the last days before Pearl Harbor, the events as they occurred in Japan, all of which is on the record, completely on the record and has been brought out, I think, before this committee, and also a general statement with regard to the period of our internment in Japan from December 1941 until June 1942.

Those reports which were turned in to the State Department are all available but, as far as I am aware, all the pertinent information in them has been already brought before this committee.

[1881] Senator FERGUSON. Might I, Mr. Chairman, inquire from counsel if we have a copy of the information that Ambassador Grew is now talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is talking about some reports he made to Mr. Hull. They haven't been distributed. We haven't seen them. We will get them.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand those were reports made to Secretary Hull after the Ambassador returned from Japan in August 1942, after he was exchanged?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. Along with certain other Americans held by the Japanese Government for certain Japanese held by the Government of the United States.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Such reports as you now refer to were made upon your return in August 1942?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will counsel get for the committee that information?

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean get the report?

Senator FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.¹

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead, Mr. Keefe.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I think Mr. Grew had another statement [1882] to make.

Mr. GREW. The second point, Mr. Chairman, is this: I was asked, with relation to my so-called green-light telegram, which I think was in December 1940, which referred to an article by Mr. A. T. Steele, far-eastern correspondent of the Chicago Daily News, I was asked to obtain that.

I find in the State Department files a long telegram from Mr. Smythe, who was our chargé d'affaires in Peiping at that time, in which he gives a complete summary of that article.

He says in this telegram :

Mr. A. T. Steele, Far Eastern Correspondent for the Chicago Daily News, returned last week from home leave in the United States spending some days in Japan and Manchuria before coming here. As Mr. Steele is an experienced and able observer, the Embassy asked him to prepare a statement of his impressions, and a summary thereof is respectfully submitted below as of interest to the Department.

As it is a very long telegram shall I pass it on to the general counsel?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I think that would be appropriate.

[1883] The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. GREW. The other document that I was asked about, I was asked whether I had ever been informed in Tokyo on the conversation between the President and the Japanese Ambassador on August 17, 1941.

Well, practically, as far as I knew, a report of all those conversations was telegraphed to me in Tokyo. I did not recollect this particular conversation but I have here the record in the shape of a telegram from the Secretary of State to myself dated August 18, in which it sets forth the record of the conversation between the President and the Japanese Ambassador on August 17.

Shall I also turn that over to the counsel?

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, might I see that through counsel?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I am sure that counsel will be glad to pass it on to the Senator.

Is that all now, Mr. Grew?

Mr. GREW. That is all I have now.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, sir.

Mr. GREW. I am still making an examination, I am still exploring for certain other documents which Senator Ferguson asked me to try to find and if we find them we shall promptly produce them.

[1884] The CHAIRMAN. All right, Congressman Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. When we concluded at the noon hour, Mr. Grew, I had asked you to state specifically a fact that would indicate that the imposition of economic sanctions upon Japan had restrained Japan in her warlike attitude and you stated, as I recall, that you wanted to make reference to a certain telegram.

Now, I repeat that question to you this afternoon.

Mr. GREW. The answer to that question, Mr. Congressman, I think is contained in two telegrams, the report of my conversation with Prince Konoye on September 6, 1941, the then Prime Minister of Japan—

Mr. KEEFE. Well, will you refer to that telegram?

Mr. GREW. That is on the record, sir. It has been already referred to, I think, several times. Do you wish me to produce it?

Mr. KEEFE. Well, what is there in that telegram that indicates specifically any action on the part of Japan that was retarded as a result of our imposing economic sanctions?

Refer to the telegram, if you please, and point out what there is in it that specifically indicates that the Japanese were ever retarded as a result of the imposition of economic sanctions.

Mr. GREW. All right, sir.

[1885] I think there is nothing in that telegram which would precisely answer your question but I think you will find material in the telegram which I sent to the Secretary of State on September 29, 1941, which would.

Mr. KEEFE. All right. Now, will you point out in that telegram of September 29, 1941, specifically the incidents that you refer to?

Mr. GREW. I would like to get the original text if I may, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. All right.

Mr. GREW. September 29. It may be in my bag there.

I think to answer your question, Mr. Congressman, I would have to read a considerable passage from this telegram. Shall I do so? It is a very long telegram of September 29, of which I have before me only the paraphrase. I have not the true text. I shall be glad to read those passages.

Mr. GESELL. That is at page 645 of volume II.

Mr. KEEFE. I have it before me.

Mr. GESELL. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Where do you propose to read?

Mr. GREW. I would like to read from the second paragraph.

Mr. KEEFE. Very well.

Mr. GREW. The second and third paragraph, I think, will [1886] cover it.

The CHAIRMAN. What page?

Mr. GREW (reading):

The Ambassador recalls his statements—

The CHAIRMAN. What page is it?

Mr. MITCHELL. 645 and 646.

The CHAIRMAN. 645 and 646, all right.

Mr. GREW (reading):

The Ambassador recalls his statements in the past that in Japan the pendulum always swings between moderate and extremist policies; that it was not then possible under the existing circumstances for any Japanese leader or group to reverse the program of expansion and expect to survive; that the permanent digging in by Japanese in China and the pushing of the Japanese advances to the south could be prevented only by insuperable obstacles. The Ambassador recalls likewise his views that the risks of taking positive measures to maintain United States security in the future were likely to be far smaller than the risks of not taking such measures; that only respect for potential power of the United States has deterred Japan from taking more liberties with American interests; and that Japan's program of forcible expansion could be brought to a halt only by a show of force [1887] and by a demonstration of American willingness to use this force if necessary. The Ambassador recalls also his statement that if Japan's leadership could be discredited eventually by such American action, there might take shape in Japan ultimately a regeneration of thought which would allow Japan to resume formal relations with the United States, leading to a readjustment of the entire problem of the Pacific.

The Ambassador suggests that the United States has been following very wisely precisely this policy, which furthered by other developments in the world, has helped to discredit Japanese leadership, notably that of former Foreign Minister Matsuoka. The Ambassador cites as world developments arousing a positive reaction from the United States the conclusion by Japan of the Tripartite Alliance and Japan's recognition of the Wang Ching-Wei regime at Nanking, which preceded Germany's attack on the Soviet Union. Germany's action upset the basis for the Tripartite Pact, Japan having joined the Italo-German Axis in order to obtain security against Russia and thereby to avoid the peril of being caught between the Soviet Union and the United States.

At the present time Japan is attempting to correct this miscalculation by getting out of an extremely dangerous position. The [1888] Ambassador recalls his reports to the Department to the effect that Japanese foreign policies are inevitably changed by the impact of events abroad and that liberal elements in Japan might come to the top in due course as a result of the trend of events. He considers that such a time has arrived. He sees a good chance of Japan's falling into line if a program can be followed of world reconstruction as forecast by the declaration of President Roosevelt and Prime Minister Churchill. American policy—of forbearance, patient argumentation, efforts at persuasion, followed for many years, plus a manifest determination of the United States to take positive measures when called for—plus the impact of world developments upon Japan, has rendered Japan's political soil hospitable to the sowing of new seeds which, the Ambassador feels, if planted carefully and nourished, may bring about the anticipated regeneration of Japanese thought and a complete readjustment of relations between Japan and the United States.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, Mr. Grew, I appreciate your courtesy in reading these two paragraphs from your message to the State Department of September 29, 1941. I must confess, however, that the reading does not in any sense answer the question which I asked you. [1889] I would like to have you point out, if you can, either from this message or from any fact within your knowledge any specific fact which demonstrates that Japan was deterred in its militaristic policy of expansion and aggression by the imposition of economic sanctions.

Here you are talking about going forward with military and naval force. I am referring and limiting my questions alone to the application of economic sanctions.

Mr. GREW. The point which I am trying to bring out, Mr. Congressman, is this, that the imposition of economic sanctions on Japan had placed Japan in an exceedingly dangerous position economically, socially, and in every other way. The result of this policy that we had followed had, in my opinion, brought certain leaders in Japan—I do not refer to the militarists; I refer to certain leaders—

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, Mr. Grew, if I may interrupt right there.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. We are interested in the impact upon those who were formulating and carrying out the policy of Japan, not isolated leaders that were intimate with you, that were intimate in talking with you in terms of peace, but the people that were actually formulating and carrying out the policies.

Mr. GREW. I am talking about the very person who was [1890] formulating and carrying out the policy, namely, the Prime Minister at that time.

Mr. KEEFE. Very well.

Mr. GREW. Prince Konoye. He was the man. My talk with him, which is recorded on September 6, and the conversation which this telegram aims to analyze; that he, in spite of all his appalling record, which was set forth by Mr. Hull the other day, which, as I said, was one of the worst trains of events of international banditry in all history, he was responsible for many of the things which had been done by Japan through these years; at the same time he was intelligent enough, I think, to see the handwriting on the wall and to realize that Japan had got herself into an exceedingly dangerous position and that there were only two ways out: One way out was by war and the other way out was an arrangement and agreement with the United States.

Now, he had been in our country, he knew something about our productive capacity, he knew something about our national spirit, of which the militarists did not know, to which they paid no attention, and I think he realized at that time, I gathered from evidence which appeared from time to time, that he realized that Japan, if she should go to war with the United States and Great Britain, might readily be defeated and emerge from that war as a third- or a fifth-class power.

[1891] I think he realized the country was on the brink of an abyss and I think that with all his appalling record he honestly tried to reverse the engine.

Now, that is my precise answer to what effect our economic policy had on Japanese leaders and when I say the Prime Minister himself, I know that he was backed and supported by a considerable element among what I call the liberal leaders of Japan.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, can you point to one single objective of the Japanese war lords or militarists who were in control that they receded from or refrained from carrying out as a result of the imposition of economic sanctions?

Mr. GREW. I might read one more passage to answer that question, Mr. Congressman. I go back to—

Mr. KEEFE. Well, do you have any present recollection yourself?

Mr. GREW. Yes, I have and I can state it but I can state it more precisely by reading one passage from my report here of my conversation with the Prime Minister on September 6.

Now, nobody can possibly say how much weight we should attach to the following statement which I am about to read. It is one of those things that can never be proved; whether it was genuine or whether it was not genuine, whether Prince [1892] Konoye in trying to see President Roosevelt had wished to pull the wool over our eyes and cause a delay so that it would give Japan more time to arm and prepare, nobody can answer that question. The Japanese militarists seemed to be, so far as I could understand at that time, completely self-confident of their power; I do not think they needed more time and I think they realized that time would play in our hands.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, Ambassador Grew, pardon me. I do not want to interject myself into your answer but perhaps I am not making myself clear.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; you are. My answer will answer your question.

Mr. KEEFE. For the purpose of getting a clear answer may I state this at this time:

During the summer of 1941 and in the fall and especially in September Japan steadily continued her march to the south and her infiltration into Indo-China.

Mr. GREW. That is absolutely true.

Mr. KEEFE. Which caused you and the State Department and the President great concern.

Mr. GREW. Certainly.

Mr. KEEFE. So that the imposition of economic sanctions did not stop Japan from going on down into Indo-China.

[1893] Mr. GREW. It did not. It had not up to that point. The question arose at that time whether at the point that I am now speaking about it was going to be possible to stop that expansion.

Mr. KEEFE. May I also call your attention to the fact, so that you will have this in mind in answering my question, that we are now furnished with information that starting in January 1941 there was called into session in Tokyo representatives of the fleet to discuss a plan that had been devised in January, I believe, 1941 for an attack on Pearl Harbor.

Mr. GREW. Perfectly true.

Mr. KEEFE. And that as a result of those conversations which continued during the summer, in September 1941 they had reached a full and complete agreement, very secret in their top naval circles setting out the exact plan and setting the date as of December 7, 1941. Those were the war lords in action, as we now know them to be.

[1894] Mr. GREW. That is absolutely true, Mr. Congressman, and in addition to that, I would say every country presumably has its war plans prepared long in advance to put into force, if necessary, with regard to any potential enemy. A country will have its so-called orange plan, its blue plan, its yellow plan, whatever it may be.

I have seen it in the old days in Europe. But the mere fact that this plan had been elaborated on paper in January 1941 does not necessarily mean that events might possibly have brought about a situation where that plan would, in fact, have to be put into effect.

Mr. KEEFE. Obviously, events did not occur that prevented placing that plan into effect, because it was put into effect on December 7.

Mr. GREW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, I would like to have you also bear in mind the fact that you yourself have testified repeatedly here as to the infiltration and continued infiltration into Indochina, as to its concern on you and the State Department, and the assembling of this large fleet, which was being assembled, and which later sailed down apparently to land forces on the Kra Peninsula, and into Thailand.

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. They continued right straight on with their [1895] aggressive war in China, and with the infiltration into Indochina and down to the south, one step at a time.

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, what I have asked you to do is to point out, if you will, to me, any particular act that was stopped or retarded as the result of the imposition of these economic sanctions.

Mr. GREW. I cannot point out any specific act that actually did stop that procedure, but I can point out, as is perfectly clear on the record, that we in Tokyo at that time felt if the Prime Minister and the President of the United States could meet face to face, it might be possible to put a stop to that movement.

Mr. KEEFE. It was all guesswork?

Mr. GREW. We could not tell, but that is my answer to your question.

Mr. KEEFE. That was an expression of a pious hope that that would take place, was it not?

Mr. GREW. That was an expression of a pious hope, and also, as I have said repeatedly, and I would like to repeat now once again, that in that telegram of analysis of this situation, I said, in the last paragraph of my telegram of September 29:

In submitting the foregoing discussion, the Ambassador [1896] does so in all deference to the much broader field of view of President Roosevelt and

Secretary Hull and in full awareness that the Ambassador's approach to the matter is limited to the viewpoint of the American Embassy in Japan.

That was a premise to all my reports.

To answer your question about the war lords I would merely read one paragraph of the report of my talk with the Prime Minister at that time. That is the telegram of September 6, 1941.

Mr. GESELL. Page 603, I think, is the one you quoted.

Mr. GREW. Page 605 of Foreign Relations.

The report which the Prime Minister has received—

Mr. KEEFE. (interposing). Could I have the page again?

Mr. GREW. That is page 605 of Foreign Relations, volume II.

Mr. KEEFE. I have it.

Mr. GREW. This is my report of the talk, of my conversations with the Prime Minister on September 6, 1941. Paragraph No. 4 says:

The report which the Prime Minister has received from the Japanese Ambassador concerning the latter's conversations with the President and the Secretary, have led the Prime Minister to think that the Administration in Washington entertains serious doubts as to the strength of the present [1897] cabinet, and that the Administration is not certain that in the event that the Cabinet should adopt a peaceful program it could successfully resist the attacks of opposing elements.

Prince Konoe told me that from the inception of the informal talks in Washington he had received the strongest concurrence from the responsible Chiefs of both the Army and the Navy. Only today he had conferred with the Minister of War who had promised to send a full general to accompany the Prime Minister to the meeting with the President; the Minister of the Navy had agreed that a full admiral should accompany the Prime Minister.

Prince Konoe added in confidence that he expected that the representative of the Navy would probably be Admiral Yoshida, a former minister of the Navy. In addition, the Premier would be accompanied by the Vice Chiefs of Staff of the Army and the Navy and other ranking officers of the armed services who are in entire accord with his aims. He admitted that there are certain elements within the armed forces who do not approve his policies, but he voiced the conviction that since he had the full support of the responsible Chiefs of the Army and Navy, it would be possible for him to put down and control any opposition which might develop among those elements.

[1898] Mr. KEEFE. Well, were you suggesting to our State Department and the President that it was your opinion that there should be a meeting between the President and Prince Konoe?

Mr. GREW. That appears in this record, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. You warmly recommended that, did you not?

Mr. GREW. From our point of view in Tokyo at that time.

Mr. KEEFE. You felt Prince Konoe was a man inclined to peace, and that some good would come out of such conference?

Mr. GREW. I think all of us in the Embassy at that time—when I say "all of us" I mean the senior officers, the military attaché, naval attaché, commercial attaché, and all of the senior members of the Embassy believed it was a good gamble; that Konoe had come to a position where he realized the dangerous situation in which his country had got itself, and he was trying to find a way out.

Now, whether he controlled the military elements or not is a question we can never answer. It is not susceptible to proof. We cannot do it.

Mr. KEEFE. As a matter of fact, that meeting was never held?

Mr. GREW. That meeting was never held.

Mr. KEEFE. The proposal was rejected here at Washington, was it not?

[1899] Mr. GREW. Well, the proposal was never acted on. Although you will find that in August—let me see if I can put my hand on it. This is in Foreign Relations, page 572. The record shows that on August 28, 1941, when Admiral Nomura, the Japanese Ambassador, had delivered to the President a letter from Prince Kōnoye, the record shows:

At the conclusion of the reading of the communication, the President said to the Ambassador that he could say to his government that he considered this note a step forward and that he was very hopeful. He then added that he would be keenly interested in having three or four days with Prince Kōnoe and again he mentioned Juneau.

He mentioned Juneau as the place of meeting.

Mr. KEEFE. Do you know why the meeting was never held?

Mr. GREW. No, sir. I think Mr. Hull has made that amply clear in his statement. Mr. Hull felt that it would be futile to go ahead with the meeting unless the basis had been laid in advance in the Washington conversations.

Mr. KEEFE. The futility of it appeared, according to Mr. Hull's statement, right while these negotiations were going on and Japan continued its unrepressed march of aggression.

Mr. GREW. That is perfectly true.

[1900] Mr. KEEFE. Right on and on, day by day.

Mr. GREW. That is perfectly true.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Hull and the President continually suggested if they were in earnest and if they were honest about the peace they would put a stop to some of those things.

Isn't that the situation? But the war lords would not do it; isn't that correct?

Mr. GREW. It is more of a story than that, Mr. Congressman. It is a pretty complicated story. No one who has not lived in Japan and understands the way things work there could possibly understand it. I have tried to explain one phase of it.

Mr. KEEFE. You are making it pretty tough for me, Mr. Grew, when you say nobody that did not live there can possibly understand it. I am going to be in a hopeless situation, then, if that is the case.

Mr. GREW. The facts are these: At that time in Japan there were two camps. There were the militarist war leaders who were all out for expansion, and were carrying out the plans, as you have just said, day after day, week after week, steadily.

One the other hand, there were certain liberal-minded statesmen who realized the position their country had got into, realized the danger of war, and wanted to avert it, if [1901] they possibly could.

Now, anything that appeared on the records had to go through the Foreign Office, which was always discredited by the military people. The Foreign Office was full of young officers of extremist tendencies, many of them playing in with the Germans, and anything that went on the record, went through the Foreign Office, was promptly put through the hands of the extremists, and the Germans were constantly pressing, pressing to prevent any possibility of an understanding with the United States. That was the reason for their fear of formulas.

That was the reason why I said in this telegram that they never would be able to bring about a satisfactory understanding in the conversations in Washington for the mere fact that they were so spread on the record. They had good reason to fear, because they were constantly trying to assassinate Prince Konoye, and they very nearly did assassinate him just at this time when four thugs jumped aboard his car with daggers and tried to get at him, but failed. The former Prime Minister was also attacked. His throat was cut and he was out of the picture for many months thereafter. All these statesmen who were not playing in with the military were constantly under attack by the militarists. That is, I think, a fundamental reason why they were afraid of formulas.

[1902] Now Prince Konoye said to me, "If I can meet the President face to face I will give him assurances, commitments which we will honorably carry out. We cannot carry them out overnight, but we will carry them out in as short a time as possible."

That is all on the record here, every bit of it. He said, "A settlement of this kind will so electrify the Japanese people, showing them that they can have what they want politically, economically, and socially, they can have security without any more fighting," and they were tired out with the China war, they were subject to the greatest economic sacrifices. Konoye said, "It will be accepted by the great mass of the Japanese people, with the greatest satisfaction," and he said, "I can guarantee that this will be carried out."

He said, "It can be carried out. It may take 6 months or more, it will take some time, but we will take our troops out of China, we will take our troops out of Indochina. Of course we have got to leave certain garrisons here and there for the purpose of our own security."

I said at once when this statement was made, "What do you mean by that?" He said, "I mean just the sort of thing like you yourselves are doing, the British are doing. You have garrisons in Peiping, in Tientsin, Shanghai, and so have the British, and so have many other countries." He said, "That is what we have in mind for the purposes of security."

[1903] There is the story. Nobody in the world can prove that even if Konoye had met the President and even if he had been able to give satisfactory commitments that he could have implemented them after he came back. That was definitely in the control of the military. Nobody could answer that question, and it cannot be answered today. It is not susceptible to proof.

Mr. KEEFE. At least the President and Mr. Hull doubted his ability to implement any such suggestions with the military.

Mr. GREW. Very definitely.

Mr. KEEFE. Because they declined the invitation for the conference.

Mr. GREW. Very definitely.

Mr. KEEFE. That is true, is it not?

Mr. GREW. Absolutely.

Mr. KEEFE. All right. That is in answer to my question, unless you have something further.

Mr. GREW. I just want to say once more everything I have said today represents the point of view of one spot, our Embassy in Tokyo.

and we were deprived of a great deal of the information which was available to the President and Mr. Hull. We had none of the secret intercepts or telegrams, we had none of the documents that have come into the State Department from time to time, documents of a secret nature, so of course [1904] the President and Mr. Hull saw the picture with a great deal more information than we had available to us.

Mr. KEEFE. Am I to understand then, Mr. Grew, that from the information available to you at the Embassy in Tokyo, being denied the information contained in the intercepts and all of the other information available here at Washington, you were recommending that this meeting with Prince Konoye be held and that it would be productive of some good?

Mr. GREW. Well, sir, to get the record straight on that—and it is all on the record—I better read you exactly what was said here. This is the telegram of September 29:

In the opinion of the Ambassador, on the basis of the above observations which he has every reason to regard as sound—

That was my analysis of the whole situation at that time—

American objectives will not be reached by insisting or continuing to insist during the preliminary conversations that Japan provide the sort of clear-cut, specific commitments which appear in any final, formal convention or treaty. Unless a reasonable amount of confidence is placed by the United States in the professed sincerity of intention and good faith of Prince Konoye and his supporters to mould Japan's future policy upon the basic principles they are ready to accept and then to adopt measures which [1905] gradually but loyally implement those principles, with it understood that the United States will implement its own commitment pari passu with the steps which Japan takes, the Ambassador does not believe that a new orientation can be successfully created in Japan to lead to a general improving of Japanese-American relations and to the hope that ultimate war may be avoided in the Pacific.

I want to make clear the fact that I felt that, as far as our economic measures went, we had great leverage there and we were certainly not going to relax those measures, our freezing measures, the abrogation of our treaty with Japan, the embargoes, and so forth, unless and until we found Japan was going to loyally implement whatever undertakings they might tell us they would undertake. That was our opinion in the Embassy at that time.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, now, on November 3, in your message which is in evidence, you made this statement in paragraph 5, and I am reading it:

Please realize that in discussing the foregoing grave and momentous subject I am out of touch with the Administration's thoughts and intentions thereon and it is far from my intention to imply that an undeliberated policy is being followed in Washington. [1906] It is equally far from my intentions for a single moment to advocate so-called "appeasement" on the part of the United States or that our Government should in the slightest degree recede from the fundamental principles which it laid down as a basis for adjustment and conduct of international relations, including our relations with Japan. My purpose is only to insure against my country getting into war with Japan through any possible misconception of the capacity of Japan to rush headlong into a suicidal conflict with the United States. National sanity would dictate against such an event, but Japanese sanity cannot be measured by our own standards of logic.

We need not be over-concerned by the present bellicose tone and substance of the Japanese press which has attacked the United States in recurrent waves of intensity during the past several years, but it would be shortsighted to underestimate Japan's obvious preparations for a program to be implemented if her alternative program for peace should fail. It would be similarly shortsighted to base our policy on the belief that these preparations are merely in the nature of saber rattling with the exclusive purpose [1907] of giving moral support to Japan's high-pressure diplomacy. Japan's resort to measures which might make war with the United States inevitable may come with dramatic and dangerous suddenness.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. In that same message, Mr. Grew, you obviously must have had some knowledge of some statements that were being made in speeches here in the United States about the ability of the United States to knock the Jap Navy over in 24 hours, and all that sort of things. Those things had come to your attention, had they not?

Mr. GREW. Some of them had, undoubtedly.

Mr. KEEFE. Were you prompted, in sending this message of November 3, to warn the State Department and perhaps the American people that perhaps the Japanese were of a character that had the capacity to strike suddenly and carry on war?

Mr. GREW. Definitely.

Mr. KEEFE. And that these statements that were being made by them, and by speakers going around the country, as to the impotence of Japan and its Navy were far from the truth?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely.

Mr. KEEFE. That was your information then?

Mr. GREW. That was my information then. But where you say "Japanese" that is a pretty relative term. There are [1908] different kinds of Japanese.

Mr. KEEFE. Now I do not want to be captious or capricious about it. I am referring to those things which would govern.

Mr. GREW. Yes; I agree with that 100 percent, with every word said in that telegram.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Of course, the situation, when that telegram was sent, was very different from the situation which obtained under the previous Cabinet in September.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. That was in November, under the Tojo regime.

Mr. KEEFE. When did the Konoye Cabinet form?

Mr. GREW. October 13, 1941.

Mr. KEEFE. Shortly before you sent this telegram of November 3 that I read from.

Mr. GREW. I took about 2 weeks to size up the new situation. I was not quite sure what Tojo's policy was going to be. I had been assured he was going to try to keep on the conversations, going to do his best to come to an agreement with us, and all the rest of it. Frankly, I had my fingers crossed. I was waiting to size it up, and after I had sized it up I sent the telegram of November 3.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, as a matter of fact, the very fact that the Konoye Cabinet fell was an indication to you, was it not, [1909] Mr. Grew, that the militarists were continuing in full and complete control?

Mr. GREW. At that time, absolutely, Mr. Congressman. But the point which was brought out in these telegrams, is unless this meeting of the President took place, the Konoye Cabinet would fall definitely.

Mr. KEEFE. The meeting did not take place and the Konoye Cabinet did fall?

Mr. GREW. It did.

Mr. KEEFE. And who came in charge of the situation?

Mr. GREW. General Tojo.

Mr. KEEFE. He was a militarist of the first order, wasn't he?

Mr. GREW. He was.

Mr. KEEFE. And a bandit of the first order?

Mr. GREW. I would say so.

[1910] Mr. KEEFE. He was in charge of running the show, wasn't he, from then on?

Mr. GREW. Completely, he certainly was.

Mr. KEEFE. And he was not deterred by any economic sanctions, was he, after he came into control?

Mr. GREW. Not for a moment.

Mr. KEEFE. No; and nobody was deterred before he came into control, so far as their actions disclosed?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. All right. Now, then, I want to get into another subject. The statement was made by you and by Secretary Hull that the presence of the American Fleet at Pearl Harbor acted as a deterrent and had a deterrent effect. That was the language you used, "had a deterrent effect."

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Will you point out to me, for the purpose of this record, one single act in the program of the war lords of Japan which was deterred by the presence of the fleet at Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Congressman, that is a very difficult question to answer. I do not think I could do it. I felt out there to withdraw the fleet from Pearl Harbor would be a complete confession of weakness, and the Japanese might [1911] well have struck long before they did strike if we had done so. That is something we can never prove.

Mr. KEEFE. You did not know, of course, when you came to that conclusion that due to the knowledge of the intercepts that we had, all of the information that was in the possession of the State Department here?

Mr. GREW. I did not know that.

Mr. KEEFE. No. And of course we did not know either here, or in Washington, or in Japan, except by rumors that they had entered into an agreement to strike Pearl Harbor on December 7, as indicated by your message of January 27, 1941.

Mr. GREW. That is perfectly true.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, Mr. Grew, your answer to my question is, as I interpret it, that you were of the opinion that to withdraw the fleet would have been an indication of weakness on our part that might have stimulated the Japs to strike quicker than they did.

Mr. GREW. Quite possible.

Mr. KEEFE. Do I so understand it?

Mr. GREW. That would be my interpretation.

Mr. KEEFE. That was not an answer to my question. My question was: What act of the Japanese war lords, or the War Government of Japan, was deterred by the fact that we had the fleet in Pearl Harbor?

[1912] Mr. GREW. I could not point to any specific act, Mr. Congressman. As a matter of fact, this whole procedure passed over a considerable period of time. The movement of the Japanese expansionists into China and eventually into Indo-China did not take place overnight. It was going on gradually. It stopped for a while and then moved ahead for a while.

Now, it is quite possible if we had withdrawn the fleet from Pearl Harbor that expansionist movement might have gone a great deal faster than it did go. I cannot tell you that. I do not know. But I think that is a fair supposition.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I must interpret the fact, Mr. Grew, in the light of all the evidence that has been presented here, and we now have before us the evidence taken from the Jap files. Their story has been presented here by Admiral Inglis. So we not only have the story as it existed here in America, and at Tokyo, but we have the situation as it existed as shown by the Jap files.

Now, as a matter of fact, the fleet went out there early in 1940, pursuant to regular plans for orderly maneuvers, as testified to by Admiral Richardson, merely for the purpose of maneuvers; its regular base being at San Diego, and San Pedro, up at Long Beach.

[1913] Now, when they concluded their maneuvers, the fleet went into Pearl Harbor, and Admiral Richardson thought they ought to be brought back to their bases, and he received information and instruction to issue a press release, which was certainly contrary to his expressed opinion as he gave it to us here, to issue a press release to the effect that the fleet was being retained for a time at his request, and being a Navy man he followed such instructions and issued such a press release, for the benefit of the Japs, I assume, and the fleet remained there thereafter.

Now, you are not able, as the Ambassador being on the ground in Tokyo, to give to this committee one single specific instance of a case where the Japs were deterred from taking any action as the result of that fleet being there, except the general statement that perhaps they might have infiltrated into Indochina and down south a little faster than they did, if the fleet had been out there. Is that the way I understand you?

Mr. GREW. Congressman, it is utterly impossible, and it would be utterly impossible for anybody to give one specific instance, because that is not the way armies work. They do not buck ahead all of a sudden, and you cannot put your finger on it and say that was a specific instance, or one specific step that might not be taken if we did not have [1914] the fleet there. Those things move slowly over a period of time. Nobody could give you one specific instance.

Mr. KEEFE. Then it would be likewise quite impossible, would it not, for anyone to say that the presence of the fleet in Pearl Harbor actually deterred the Japs at all? If you cannot give any instances of where it did deter them, it will be quite impossible to say that they were deterred; isn't that true?

Mr. GREW. I do not believe anybody could answer that question. You cannot possibly tell whether the presence of the fleet in Pearl Harbor did or did not slow up the Japanese advance, whether they might have struck earlier than they did, whether we were much less ready than we were. The position I am taking is, from our point of view in Tokyo, we had the feeling that the presence of the fleet in Pearl Harbor was a healthy thing, psychologically, and to withdraw it would be a confession of weakness which would be immediately taken up by the Japanese.

Mr. KEEFE. I understand that thoroughly. I am not attempting to be critical of your position in that regard, or anybody else's. I am simply trying to get the facts of this situation so I thoroughly understand them.

Now, as a matter of fact, did you know the condition that the fleet was in back in 1940 and 1941?

[1915] Mr. GREW. I knew nothing whatsoever about the condition of the fleet.

Mr. KEEFE. You assumed that the fleet was ready for action, did you not?

Mr. GREW. I did.

Mr. KEEFE. Had you known that the fleet was not prepared for action, would you still have been of the opinion that it would be a deterrent?

Mr. GREW. I am afraid that is a hypothetical question which I find very difficult to answer, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. If you cannot answer, Mr. Grew, I will not press you for an answer. Unless you feel that you can answer it, I shall not press it.

Mr. GREW. I think I would prefer to pass that question.

Mr. KEEFE. Very well.

Now, in answer to some questions by counsel, I believe, in answer to some questions by my colleague, Mr. Gearhart, there was quite an altercation as to the meaning of the word "ultimatum." Both you and Mr. Hull were very positive in your statements that the Jap message of November 20 constituted an ultimatum. Do you recall giving that testimony?

Mr. GREW. I do not think I testified to that effect, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. Did you hear Mr. Hull so testify?

[1916] Mr. GREW. I did, yes.

Mr. KEEFE. It is in his statement, isn't it?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. And it is the basis of his statement that the November 20 message constituted an ultimatum. Did you so conceive it to be an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. Well, as for my personal views, Mr. Congressman, I have never felt that any communication from one government to another was an ultimatum if negotiations continued after that notice was served.

Mr. KEEFE. Then, Mr. Grew, you must be in complete lack of agreement with Secretary Hull, because the facts clearly evidence that subsequent to the delivery of the Jap note to the Secretary of State, the note of the 20th of November, negotiations continued right on, conference after conference was held. You are aware of that, are you?

Mr. GREW. I am.

Mr. KEEFE. Conferences were held not only with the Japanese but they were held with the British. They were held with the Dutch. They were held with the Chinese, especially with relation to the proposed modus vivendi proposal that the Japs had asked for.

Now, then, in view of those facts, and in view of your interpretation of what an ultimatum is, are you prepared to [1917] say yourself that the message of November 20, was, in fact, an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. I have not said so, but I will say this, Mr. Congressman, that I think if there is any difference of opinion between Mr. Hull and myself on that point, it is a pretty technical point; it is a point as to what is meant by the term "ultimatum." It would be very difficult for people to differ as to the actual meaning of that particular word.

Mr. KEEFE. Have you read the note of the 20th of November?

Mr. GREW. Yes, certainly.

Mr. KEEFE. Did you find any language in it which indicates that negotiations were to be broken off?

Mr. GREW. I do not think it depends on the language in it so much as whether further negotiations continue after the delivery of that note.

Mr. KEEFE. Then the facts are clear, Mr. Grew, that negotiations did continue. You know that, do you not?

Mr. GREW. That is a fact.

Mr. KEEFE. They continued after the delivery of the note?

Mr. GREW. That is a fact.

Mr. KEEFE. And it resulted in our offering a counter- [1918] proposal on November 26.

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. You are sure of that, are you not?

Mr. GREW. That is right.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, the statement has been made here that over in Tokyo a friend of yours, high in the Government circles, wrote you a letter in which he said that the people of Japan without knowledge as to what was in the November 26 message, considered it to be an ultimatum, and you construe that to be the policy of the controlled press operating under the directions of the war lords to not give the Japanese people the truth; is that correct?

Mr. GREW. Very definitely.

Mr. KEEFE. To make them believe that we terminated diplomatic relations?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Do I so understand your testimony?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, the record discloses—and I now refer to exhibit 27, which I am advised is the first of the publication Peace and War.

Mr. GREW. That is right.

Mr. KEEFE. Published in 1942.

On page 137 of that short report there appears, beginning [1919] on page 135, and continuing over to page 138, a memorandum entitled "United States Memorandum of November 26," and I find this expression, a statement as to the handling of this November 26 message to the Japanese Ambassador in this language, and I quote from the top of page 136:

On November 26, 1941, the Secretary of State handed to the Japanese Ambassador and Mr. Kurusu a proposed basis for agreement between the United States and Japan.

This was the culmination of these negotiations that had been going on between the 20th and 26th.

In a statement accompanying the proposal, it was said that the United States earnestly desired to afford every opportunity for the continuation of discussions with the Japanese Government; that the Japanese proposals of November 20 conflicted, in some respects, with the fundamental principles to which each government had declared it was committed—and so forth.

Then appears this on page 137:

After the Japanese representatives had read the document, Mr. Kurusu said that when this proposal of the United States was reported to the Japanese Government that Government would be likely to "throw up its hands"; that this response to the Japanese proposal could be interpreted as tantamount to the end of the negotiations. The Japanese [1920] representatives then asked whether they could see the President.

Now, there was an expression of opinion of the Japanese envoy, expressed at the time the note was handed to him on November 26, and before it had even been transmitted to Japan, indicating that, after reading it, on the day that it was delivered to them, they considered it to be an ultimatum.

Do you so interpret that language?

Mr. GREW. Definitely not, Mr. Congressman. Do I interpret the language of the Japanese envoys as themselves having believed it to be an ultimatum?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. That would appear to be clear from the record.

Mr. KEEFE. All right. That is what I asked. As evidence of the fact that subsequent to November 20 there were continuing negotiations between the State Department and the Japanese envoy, I refer to page 134 of exhibit 27, after the Japs had handed their proposal of the 20th to Mr. Hull, and this appears:

During a conversation on that same day with the Japanese Ambassador, and Mr. Kurusu, Secretary Hull said that Japan could at any moment put an end to the existing situation by deciding upon an "all-out" peaceful course; that at any moment [1921] Japan could bring to an end what Japan chose to call "encirclement."

The Secretary said the people of the United States believed that the purposes underlying our aid to China were the same as those underlying our aid to Great Britain and that there was a partnership between Hitler and Japan aimed at enabling Hitler to take charge of one-half of the world and Japan the other half.

The existence of the Tripartite Pact and the continual harping of Japan's leaders upon slogans of the Nazi type, the Secretary said, served to strengthen this belief; what was needed was the manifestation by Japan of a clear purpose to pursue peaceful courses. He said that our people desired to avoid a repetition in East Asia of what Hitler was doing in Europe; that our people opposed the idea of a "new order" under military control.

[1922] In this conversation the Japanese representatives reiterated that their Government was really desirous of peace and that Japan had "never pledged itself to a policy of expansion." Secretary Hull remarked that the Chinese "might have an answer to that point."

With which I, parenthetically, agreed.

Then:

During a conversation on November 22nd the Secretary of State informed the Japanese Ambassador and Mr. Kurusu that he had called in representatives of certain other governments concerned in the Far East and that there had been a discussion of the question whether there could be some relaxation of freezing; there was a general feeling that the matter could be settled if the Japanese could give some evidence of peaceful intentions. The Secretary said that if the United States and other countries should see Japan pursuing a peaceful course there would be no question about Japan's obtaining all of the materials she desired.

Were you advised as Ambassador to Japan of these conversations relating to this proposed modus vivendi?

Mr. GREW. I couldn't answer that question, Mr. Congressman, without looking up the record. As I said before, I was advised [1923] of some of the conversations. In certain cases the records were telegraphed out to me. I do not know that I was advised of the records of all the conversations.

Mr. KEEFE. What records would you have to go to?

Mr. GREW. Those are on file in the Department of State available to counsel.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, of course, then these documents that we have in evidence here, War and Peace, Foreign Relations, and your book, don't contain all the messages?

Mr. GREW. That I cannot tell you.

Mr. KEEFE. Can you turn and find any evidence in your book of any messages in reference to this modus vivendi proposition?

Mr. GREW. I don't recollect that there is anything there. I don't think there is.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, do you have any present recollection now, Mr. Grew, that you were informed and knew about the negotiations?

Mr. GREW. I have no present recollection of that particular point.

Mr. KEEFE. Were you advised that before any settlement of the relationships between the United States and Japan could be accomplished that it was necessary to call in consultation other powers that were interested—Great Britain, the Dutch, and the Chinese?

[1924] Mr. GREW. Was I advised, you say, that it would be necessary to call them in?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I certainly was not advised to that effect. I may have been advised after the meeting took place. I can't answer that question because, as I say, there were a great many such messages sent out to me, and I would have to check up the record to see whether that particular point was telegraphed to me or not.

Mr. KEEFE. I believe you stated that you had no knowledge of the so-called A-B-C-D agreement.

Mr. GREW. I had no knowledge of any such agreement.

Mr. KEEFE. Have you been advised recently that there was such an agreement?

Mr. GREW. No, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Do you know anything about such an agreement?

Mr. GREW. I do not, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. I call your attention to the fact that General Marshall testified with respect to that agreement when he was a witness before the Army board of inquiry, and I read this just to attempt to refresh your recollection, if it will.

The question was:

Who constituted the military authorities representing the United States in entering into this agreement?

[1925] And the agreement referred to is the one already read into the record by the Senator from Michigan, Mr. Ferguson.

The answer is:

The agreement was reached in the so-called American-British-Dutch staff conversations held at Singapore in April of 1941. United States Army officers participated on my instructions and with the approval of the Secretary of State.

The participants were: Captain Purnell, U. S. Navy, Chief of Staff of the U. S. Asiatic Fleet; Colonel A. C. McBride, U. S. Army, Assistant Chief of Staff of the Military Forces in the Philippines; Captain A. M. R. Allen, U. S. Navy, the U. S. Naval Observer in Singapore; Lieutenant Colonel H. G. Brink, U. S. Army, U. S. Military Observer at Singapore.

Does General Marshall's testimony bring back any recollection to you of the fact that there was such an agreement entered into?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; it does not, and I do not think that any report of that meeting which you just referred to came to me in Tokyo, so far as I can now recollect.

Mr. KEEFE. All right. Now, I want to ask a couple of other questions in relation to your book and your diary.

Oh, before I get to that:

[1926] Where is Mr. Dooman at the present time, who was formerly the counselor of the Embassy at Tokyo?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Dooman lives in Washington but he is away for a few days. I think he will be back shortly but I don't know when.

Mr. KEEFE. What is his full name?

Mr. GREW. Eugene F. Dooman, D-o-o-m-a-n.

Mr. KEEFE. Did he return with you at the time you were exchanged and came back, which I believe was in July or August of 1942?

Mr. GREW. Yes, we came back together.

Mr. KEEFE. Is he presently occupying any position in the State Department?

Mr. GREW. No, sir. He recently retired from the foreign service and the State Department. He has now no official position.

Mr. KEEFE. He is in the same position that you are?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; exactly.

Mr. KEEFE. Did he work with you when you became Under Secretary of State?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Dooman, as I recollect it—when he came back, I think he was assigned to work in the Department of State, shortly after we came back. I would have to check up on that. But I had nothing to do with that because I was out [1927] in the field speaking for the first year or year and a half.

Mr. KEEFE. Well now, reference was made this morning to this report which you made setting forth the conversations had between Mr. Dooman and Mr. Ohashi on February 14, 1941. In transmitting that report you used this language:

The presentation by Mr. Dooman of his impressions of the position of the United States as gathered during his recent furlough appeared to cause Mr. Ohashi astonishment. Mr. Ohashi is, for a Japanese, extraordinarily direct and sparing of words. Upon listening attentively to what Mr. Dooman described as the philosophy of the American position Mr. Ohashi remained perfectly quiet for an appreciable space of time and then burst forth with the question, "Do you mean to say that if Japan were to attack Singapore there would be a war with the United States." Mr. Dooman replied, "The logic of the situation would inevitably raise that question." Mr. Ohashi then left that subject and adverted to the character of reports sent to London by the British Ambassador. Circumstantial evidence that Mr. Ohashi was accented by the interview was given by Sir John Latham, the Australian Minister, who called on Mr. Ohashi a few minutes after Mr. Dooman left. Sir John without being aware that Mr. [1928] Dooman had just called on Mr. Ohashi, told me that he found Mr. Ohashi greatly agitated and distraught.

I propose to say to Mr. Matsuoka, with whom I have an appointment this morning, that the statements made by Mr. Dooman to Mr. Ohashi were made with my prior knowledge and have my full approval.

Now, this incident has been known quite widely in diplomatic circles as the Dooman Incident, has it not?

Mr. GREW. Well, I hadn't heard that term applied to it, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. It caused some astonishment in diplomatic circles in Tokyo, did it not, when it came out?

Mr. GREW. I don't think it ever came out in public in Tokyo, so far as I recollect. Those things very seldom did come out. Is there any indication there that it did? I don't think so. Sir John Latham, the Australian Minister, appears to have known of it.

Mr. KEEFE. Then you agreed at that time, when you sent this message, that it was the considered policy of the United States that if the Japs attacked Singapore we would go to war?

Mr. GREW. It is not a categorical statement to that effect.

Mr. KEEFE. I know it is not, but what did you mean?

Mr. GREW. I think that was pretty good doctrine to spread [1929] to the Japanese at that time. I always held, during that period, that only a display of force and the establishing of the conviction among the Japanese that we intended to use it, if necessary, would have any effect out there.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Grew, if you will pardon me, I am not attempting to place any false interpretation upon the language. I could let it stand for itself. The words speak for themselves as to just what was said. I am not in disagreement with you. I hope you do not get that impression. The statement says the logic of the situation would inevitably raise the question as to whether or not we would go to war.

Now, do I understand you to say that the purpose of Mr. Dooman making this statement to Mr. Ohashi, of which you had prior knowledge and approval, was part of the program to attempt to deter the Japs from the course they had set out on?

Mr. GREW. Congressman, no one is omniscient at any one time, of course, but we in Tokyo had during those years watched the impression created among the Japanese people as to the attitude of the United States and the American people.

Whenever a speech by some prominent isolationist was made in America that speech was generally emblazoned in headlines in the Japanese press and very few other speeches were ever allowed to be published.

Whenever there was a strike in the United States, that [1930] strike was emphasized in the Japanese press in order to convey to the Japanese people that the American people were isolationists and pacifists and secondly that we were completely disunited and would never be able to fight a total war.

Therefore I felt that on Mr. Dooman's coming back from Washington it was pretty sound doctrine for him to speak as he did speak. There was no precise threat there. There was no categorical statement that we would or would not do this. It was simply the general tone and substance of his talk which I approved.

Mr. KEEFE. Thank you, Mr. Grew, for that statement.

The fact is that Mr. Dooman was back here in the United States during the campaign of 1940, wasn't he?

Mr. GREW. I believe so.

Mr. KEEFE. That is when he was here; it says so in the statement.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, were the speeches being printed in Japan that were being made during this campaign, do you know?

Mr. GREW. I can't recollect any particular speech at any time in particular, but in general that was the type of thing which was being published in the Japanese press because, apparently, the militarists wanted to give the Japanese people the idea that we were timid, that we could easily be intimidated, [1931] and that if they showed enough force and power we would step back.

Mr. KEEFE. As I recall that campaign, there were a great many speeches made by people who never have been termed "isolationists," who were leading the people of America to believe that we weren't going to war.

I recall Mr. Willkie making those speeches and I recall the President making a speech in which he indicated that we weren't going to war.

Were those speeches published in Japan?

Mr. GREW. I can't answer that question, Mr. Congressman. I can't recollect what speeches were and what speeches were not published.

Mr. KEEFE. I wonder, Mr. Ambassador, whether or not the purpose of Mr. Dooman having the conversation with Mr. Ohashi was not to try to give him the impression that a lot of this stuff that they had heard during this campaign did not represent the real and true spirit of the people of America?

Mr. GREW. I think one of the purposes of Mr. Dooman's talk was to create the impression that the American people were not completely isolationist and pacifist as many of the Japanese had been led to believe.

Mr. KEEFE. Well now, when you came back finally from Japan you brought with you a diary consisting, as I understand [1932] it, of some 13 volumes; is that right?

Mr. GREW. I believe that is correct, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. And that is the diary which has been the subject of some discussion between you and the committee and Senator Brewster?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, Mr. Grew, after you came back with this diary of 13 volumes, will you state whether or not you submitted it to Collier's weekly for publication; for publication by Collier's weekly first?

Mr. GREW. I did not submit the entire diary to Collier's weekly. I did submit parts of it having in mind the possibility of a series of articles but I later found that I could not write that series of articles and the whole thing was dropped.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, as a matter of fact—and you can answer this or not, as you wish, Mr. Grew—isn't it a fact that you did submit your diary to Collier's weekly for the purpose of having it edited into a series of articles and that when it was submitted it was found that there had been passages cut out of the diary and Collier's weekly was not interested in publishing the diary with those deleted portions taken out?

Mr. GREW. I don't recollect that. The whole diary was not submitted.

[1933] Mr. KEEFE. What part was submitted?

Mr. GREW. I can't recollect. Certain parts were submitted to one representative of Collier's weekly to look over and see whether a series of articles would be worth while.

Mr. KEEFE. Who was that man?

Mr. GREW. I can't recollect his name now. He is now dead. I think he died last year. But I can't remember his name.

Mr. KEEFE. Was he not the Washington representative of Collier's weekly, the man to whom you submitted the diary?

Mr. GREW. I don't think so.

The CHAIRMAN. I was trying to think of his name. I think I knew him.

Mr. GREW. I remember that he came down to meet me when we got off the Japanese ship to see if he could sign me up for a series of articles. I wasn't willing to sign up at that time but as he had taken that trouble I realized that if I was going to write anything for the magazines that Collier's weekly had a reasonable priority. We looked over the ground and I finally decided that I did not want to write those articles at that time and the whole thing was dropped.

Mr. KEEFE. Where were those conversations held, here in Washington?

Mr. GREW. Well—the talks about the diary?

[1934] Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. I think so.

Mr. KEEFE. What volumes of your diary did you submit to him?

Mr. GREW. I couldn't possibly tell you, Mr. Congressman. I wouldn't remember.

Mr. KEEFE. Do you wish to say that Collier's weekly categorically did or did not refuse to publish an article because of the deletions which appeared in your diary?

Mr. GREW. I don't recollect any such decision now.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, would you say that that decision was not reached or that you just do not remember?

Mr. GREW. I haven't thought of that incident. It is at least 3 years ago now. As far as I can recollect the matter, Collier's never abandoned the idea completely. I think I just didn't go ahead with it. I don't recollect that Collier's definitely declined to publish. No, I don't recollect that.

Mr. KEEFE. Will you answer this question, please:

Was it your intention to personally write the diary or did Collier's suggest that you go over it with an editorial writer that would shape up the material?

Mr. GREW. I think the idea was that certain parts could be taken out and possibly an editorial writer might go over [1935] them and write up something for me.

Mr. KEEFE. Did you discuss the matter with any editorial writer of Collier's weekly?

Mr. GREW. Only in a very general way. We never got down to details.

Mr. KEEFE. What editorial writer of Collier's did you discuss the matter with?

Mr. GREW. That was that gentleman whose name escapes me. I can't recollect it. I believe he died last year. I can't remember his name.

Mr. KEEFE. What specific reason do you now ascribe for failing to go on and having Collier's publish the diary?

Mr. GREW. Well, I can't remember exactly the reasons. In the first place, I was exceedingly busy. I was making speeches all over the country. And I dare say that at that time I possibly was thinking of a book, in which case it would have been better not to do a series of articles. I think that was the idea, that I was proposing to bring out this book and therefore that I did not wish to go ahead with the articles.

Mr. KEEFE. How many volumes of your diary did you turn over to Collier's to inspect?

Mr. GREW. I don't remember whether I turned over the actual volumes or not. I had copies of various parts of the [1936] diary which I think I showed them. Whether I showed them the volumes or not I don't know.

[1937] Mr. KEEFE. You just do not recall?

Mr. GREW. No, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, then, after you decided, or it was decided, whatever the fact may be, that you were not going to have Collier's publish this series of articles, to whom did you next submit your material for publication?

Mr. GREW. To whom did I next submit my material for publication?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GREW. I then decided to go ahead with the book and I decided to put it in the hands of Messrs. Simon and Schuster of New York and Mr. Quincy Howe, one of their foremost editors whom I knew personally, went over the diary with me and helped me pick—

Mr. KEEFE. Now, you submitted your complete diary to Mr. Quincy Howe, did you not?

Mr. GREW. At one time he had it, yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. And he went through it for the purpose of editing this book, did he not?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. And he prepared the material that went into this book, Ten Years in Japan?

Mr. GREW. No, he did not prepare it.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, he put it together?

[1938] Mr. GREW. Well, he made suggestions as to passages that might be used and it was up to me to decide whether they should be used or not. In the last analysis I had this considerable amount of material and I decided what I wanted published and what was published.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, you supervised it, Mr. Grew, I think.

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. He actually drew up a manuscript, did he not?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. That is, under your supervision?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. And before publication could be had of that manuscript it had to be taken down to the State Department and cleared there, did it not?

Mr. GREW. As I said the other day, Mr. Congressman, in wartime everything which is published by an officer of the Government is supposed to be considered by a publication committee which then existed in the Department of State.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. Well, I understand that, of course. It is a simple question. It was submitted, regardless of reason, to the State Department?

Mr. GREW. That is a fact.

Mr. KEEFE. And the reason was that we were at war and [1939] they had a right to see what was being published.

Mr. GREW. That is a fact.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, then, when this original manuscript was prepared by Mr. Howe as the editor in charge of this, working for you and for Simon & Schuster, it was submitted to the State Department and there were suggestions for deletions from this manuscript, were there not?

Mr. GREW. There were.

Mr. KEEFE. And a new manuscript was prepared with the deletions?

Mr. GREW. I do not remember whether a new manuscript was prepared or whether the original manuscript was simply clipped. I dare say that the original manuscript was clipped of the passages which I determined to cut out and that manuscript was sent back to the publishers.

Mr. KEEFE. Do you remember what the deletions were about?

Mr. GREW. Well, as I said the other day, they were about a variety of things. Some of the deletions were taken out at my own initiative because I had prepared more material than could be comprised in the kind of book that my publishers wished to bring out. Therefore, that material had to be materially cut down.

In fact, when the original manuscripts were prepared there were a good many passages in there marked "cut", to be [1940] considered as to whether there was room for them or not and, if so, whether they would fit in with the type of book I was going to publish. A good many of those passages I cut out myself.

It was suggested by the committee, and I remember no demand on their part at all, but suggested that certain passages might well be omitted because they might embarrass or possibly even injure or endanger individuals during wartime, that they might be misinterpreted by foreign governments, passages of all kinds of natures which were cut out for one reason or another, but mostly of that kind.

Mr. KEEFE. Do you remember, Mr. Grew, that after the second revision of this manuscript had been prepared that the story of the death march on Bataan was published in this country?

Mr. GREW. Well, I do not recollect the precise chronology of that. I remember very well that the story on the death march in Bataan was published in this country.

Mr. KEEFE. And didn't the publication of that story precipitate the necessity for further revision of your manuscript and wasn't it revised after that story was published?

Mr. GREW. Not to my recollection whatsoever. I do not think that that had anything whatsoever to do with it.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, do you want to state categorically that [1941] it did not have anything to do with it?

Mr. GREW. No.

Mr. KEEFE. Or that you just do not remember?

Mr. GREW. I frankly do not remember.

Mr. KEEFE. All right.

Mr. GREW. I do not believe it had anything to do with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you finish your answer?

Mr. KEEFE. I thought he said he had finished. Had you finished?

Mr. GREW. I finished, sir, yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes. Well, in order to prepare this book under those circumstances it was necessary at least for Mr. Quincy Howe to have the benefit of reading your entire diary, was it not?

Mr. GREW. He had the benefit of reading the diary; yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. And he is a reputable man, is he not?

Mr. GREW. He is a completely reputable man.

Mr. KEEFE. And you would believe him, would you not?

Mr. GREW. I certainly would, otherwise I certainly would not have intrusted the diary to him.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, do you know how many other people in the office of Simon & Schuster had access to your diary besides Mr. Quincy Howe?

[1942] Mr. GREW. I doubt very much if anybody did.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, he was up in New York, wasn't he?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Howe was in New York; yes.

Mr. KEEFE. And the diary was with him?

Mr. GREW. That is right.

Mr. KEEFE. And you were here in Washington and out on the road making speeches?

Mr. GREW. That is perfectly correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, you cannot say how many people could have had access to this diary then, can you?

Mr. GREW. Well, I cannot tell you categorically but I know that Mr. Quincy Howe is a man of such reputability that he would not have for a moment left the diary in a position where other people could have access to it.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, would you have any objections to Mr. Howe testifying here as a witness as to the material that was cut out of this manuscript?

Mr. GREW. Well, that comes right down, I think, to the question originally brought up as to whether I am not within my rights in claiming that the diary itself was of a personal and private nature; that I have produced in my book the pertinent material which I think would be helpful to this committee; that I have looked through the diary for the months preceding Pearl Harbor and have found nothing further that I [1943] think would be pertinent to this committee.

The question arises on that basis if I am not justified in regarding the rest of the diary as a personal and private document. I feel very strongly on that point myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair might suggest that regardless of Mr. Grew's attitude or his willingness or unwillingness for Mr. Quincy Howe to testify about this personal diary, it may be a matter, after all, for the committee to determine whether it would call Mr. Howe to testify about that.

Mr. GREW. Undoubtedly it would be, Mr. Chairman, yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin if he feels that Mr. Quincy Howe would shed any light on the Pearl Harbor investigation and whether we should call him as a witness?

Mr. KEEFE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I object to those kinds of interjections. I am acting in good faith.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that the committee will not get into a discussion over Mr. Quincy Howe at this stage of the proceeding, so go ahead, Congressman, with your inquiry.

Mr. KEEFE. I am not asking foolish questions. I am trying to ascertain some facts and pertinent facts, pertinent to this inquiry.

[1944] The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. KEEFE. Who is Mr. Stanley Hornbeck?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Stanley Hornbeck from 1928 to 1937 was Chief of the Division of Far Eastern Affairs in the Department of State and in 1937 he was appointed political adviser in the Department of State. He was later, some time in the past year, made Ambassador to the Netherlands and so far as I know he is now at The Hague.

Mr. KEEFE. I would like to ask the counsel at this time, is it expected to call Mr. Hornbeck as a witness here?

Mr. MITCHELL. He is not so far on our list of witnesses and nobody has asked to have him placed on it.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I am making that request very definitely now, that I would like to have Mr. Hornbeck as a witness. He was in charge of the Far Eastern Branch in the Department of State all through these critical times, as I understand it.

Mr. GREW. Well, he was Chief of the Far Eastern Division, which handles far eastern affairs, only up to 1937 and after that he was political adviser, although he was still closely in touch with far eastern affairs.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GESELL. It may be of some help to the Congressman. We have been trying to find out what Mr. Hornbeck's schedule [1945] is. He is in Holland at the present time. We were hoping if he was planning to come to this country during the time the committee would be in session that we could consider his availability then.

Senator BREWSTER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it should be said in that connection that the committee have been assured that anyone anywhere in the world who could help in this situation would be available, so that I do not think it is material as to whether he is in Holland or not.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no doubt that if Mr. Hornbeck's testimony is desired here that he will be available even if he has to be brought back from Holland.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I conceive, Mr. Chairman, if you will pardon me, that Mr. Hornbeck is a very important witness in connection with the very things that we are going over and I think Mr. Grew will agree with that, that he ought to have plenty of information.

Mr. GREW. I agree completely.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, as a matter of fact did you discuss Mr. Hornbeck at all in your diary?

Senator LUCAS. Probably some Senators, too.

Mr. KEEFE. That may be an unfair question. I will [1948] withdraw it.

Mr. GREW. All right. As a matter of fact, I have no recollection on that point, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I will try to refresh your recollection at the proper time, which is not now. It will be at the proper time, on many of these things, I assure you.

Now, here is one last question that I want to interrogate you on.

I have in my mind some place out of this mass of material that is hurled at you—it is hard to put your hands on it immediately—that at a time prior to the outbreak of war in Europe in 1939 there was a memorandum submitted to the State Department with reference to a proposal made at that time by Japan for a meeting of the great powers, quite a long memorandum. I wonder whether you have knowledge of that proposal of the Japanese.

Mr. GREW. Can you tell me, Mr. Congressman, whether that proposal was made by Baron Hiramuna as Prime Minister?

Mr. KEEFE. Well, it is a proposal that I am advised does not appear in any of these documents but that is presently in the archives of the State Department. It was a proposal which embodied a proposal by the Japs for a conference of the great powers to be held in an effort to try to avert the outbreak of war in Europe. Do you recall that?

[1947] Mr. GREW. I am inclined to believe that that may have been a proposal which was made by Baron Hiramuna, then Prime Minister of Japan, to Mr. Dooman when I was at home in the United States on leave of absence in 1939 and he was chargé d'affaires. That is my impression. I think he could answer that question better than I could.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, might—

The CHAIRMAN. When was it?

Mr. KEEFE. In 1939.

Senator FERGUSON. Might I suggest that I brought that question up yesterday and asked you about it? I had the date of May or some time in 1939 and you were going to look that up. I think it is the same thing that the Congressman is talking about. That is the same point, is it?

Well, what he is asking refreshes my memory that it is the same point. You have in the book here a memorandum but not covering the particular point covered in the memorandum that I had in mind. It was a specific proposal some time in the spring of 1939 or summer, it was around in May.

Mr. GREW. Is there any indication in the record that that proposal was made to me? Because I am inclined to think it was a proposal which was made to Mr.——

Senator FERGUSON. It may not have been made to you but coming through the Embassy you would have notice of it if [1948] Dooman knew about it.

Mr. GREW. I think that took place when I was absent. I am not sure of it.

Senator FERGUSON. I am sure you were in Tokyo in May because the book indicates on page 1 of volume II, it indicates that you were in Tokyo in May 1939.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, it was in 1939.

Mr. GREW. Well, I will look into that also, Senator. It is possible it is being looked into now, but if it is a fact that this was a proposal made to Mr. Dooman while chargé d'affaires I might prefer to have him elaborate the point than to try to do it myself, if it is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, Mr. Counselor, on that point, is it proposed to have Mr. Dooman called as a witness?

Mr. GESELL. He is not on the list of witnesses.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I would like to have him put on the list because he is a very important witness.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair would like to remind the Senators that when the committee was discussing the addition of other witnesses to those that were listed it was generally understood that any member of the committee could suggest to counsel and to the committee any additional witnesses on any subject and that in some way the committee would consider [1949] what the witness would testify to in order to determine whether his testimony was material.

Now, that might be regarded as a technical point, but it was discussed in the committee in executive session. I think we might keep that in mind.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I have that in mind, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. But may I say this: I would not for one moment ask to have someone called here who I did not feel from the search and examination of the records that I have made up to date could not throw relevant and pertinent light upon this inquiry.

We have already talked about Mr. Dooman and the message is in the record here, one of the messages.

Now, referring to the Senator from Michigan, he is referring to a very important communication that was sent to the State Department, I believe, during the time that you were on furlough, Mr. Grew, and while Mr. Dooman was in charge of the Embassy in Japan.

Mr. GREW. That is probably so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not suggesting anything to the contrary of that.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Brewster.

[1950] Senator BREWSTER. Perhaps this is the appropriate time to point out that there are many questions of procedure, the calling of witnesses, the order of witnesses, which must be determined from time to time.

I fully agree with the chairman that those questions should be the subject of committee consideration and I think it would be well if it were in a somewhat less public forum than this, but as I must remind the chairman, we have not been called together for the consideration of any questions of this character for some time and the result has been that the only way we can make suggestions is when the committee is in public convention assembled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not mean to suggest any objection in making these suggestions in public as to witnesses, but we have a long list of witnesses who were arranged for by counsel through consultation with the committee and the Chair simply had in mind until we have made a little more progress in exhausting the list which has already been prepared and submitted to the committee, that we have ample time to consider what other witnesses would be called later; but, of course, the Chair has no objection whatever to putting Mr. Dooman's name on the list and having him called at some appropriate time when he is here.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the state- [1951] ment. There are two things right now which it seems to me invite consideration. One is the suggestion which has been made to change the order of witnesses insofar as Mr. Hamilton is concerned; and, second, in view of the announcement regarding General Marshall I think that there should be immediate consideration of whether or not, if he is to testify—

The CHAIRMAN. That is a—

Senator BREWSTER. May I finish?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. I wanted to say something. General Marshall is under consideration at the present time.

Senator BREWSTER. Fine.

The CHAIRMAN. We have got to consult with him as to when he proposes to leave Washington.

Senator BREWSTER. I suggest this because I think that is obviously an important matter. If General Marshall is to leave shortly, I think we ought to suspend everything on the order of the hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. That is being considered and General Marshall is being consulted about it. All right, Mr. Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no further questions to ask at this time of Mr. Grew, but I would like to suggest this to counsel: I would like to have him produce and obtain, if possible, the message or memoranda prepared by Mr. Hornbeck on December 1, 1941. I understand that it [1925] is addressed to the Army and Navy and has reference to the condition of the Army and Navy at that time. Will you kindly see if that message can be obtained? ¹

Mr. MITCHELL. We have made a note of it.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I make one request?

The CHAIRMAN. Wait until we get this one disposed of. Counsel has made a note of it and that document will be sought. Congressman Murphy?

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to make a request of the Navy to prepare a statement as to when we established the port and base of Pearl Harbor and whether or not we continued Pearl Harbor as our most important base in the Pacific after December 7, 1941, until the present time for our fleet.²

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Gesell will take note of that.

Mr. GESELL. Yes.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, is Captain Kramer on the witness list?

The CHAIRMAN. At two different times.

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Chairman, before we adjourn I would like to introduce into the record a series of five documents which were distributed to the committee 2 weeks ago, between the dates of April and December 1941, reporting conversations in South America held by Japanese representatives with representatives of the Governments of ¹ See Hearings, Part 5, p. 2085 et seq.; see also Exhibits Nos. 95, 96 and 97.

² See Hearings, Part 6, pp. 2665-2666.

Peru, [1953] Brazil, Dominican Republic, Chile, and so forth, concerning the attitude of those Governments in the event Japan were to declare war against the United States and I think this series, which is all related, might be designated—

The CHAIRMAN. The committee and spectators will please be in order. We have not yet recessed.

Mr. GESELL. I think this exhibit might be designated 31 for the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Those articles or exhibits will be filed under documentation No. 31.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 31".)

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, has there been a change in the calling of witnesses for the near future?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not aware of any change.

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been one change indicated by our memorandums to the members of the committee indicating that we had felt under the circumstances it more appropriate to call General Miles, Admiral Wilkinson, Admiral Turner, and General Gerow prior to calling certain witnesses scheduled prior to those officers, who were in subordinate positions, our thought being to call [1954] the heads of the various units, War Plans and Intelligence, and then following them with the witnesses that have been scheduled before.

We had also hoped that in view of the very detailed State Department inquiry which we have had over the last few days that we could dispense with calling Mr. Hamilton at this time. Mr. Hamilton was originally scheduled when it was thought that Mr. Hull would not be able to give as much time as he has to the committee and before Mr. Grew and Mr. Welles were added to the list of witnesses and we feel that those responsible officials have been in the best position to cover the matters of interest to the committee.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could I inquire then what the new order will be so that we might prepare?

Mr. GESELL. As indicated in the memo handed to the committee at the end of last week, General Miles and Admiral Wilkinson will be the next two witnesses, followed by Admiral Turner and General Gerow.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that if there is to be a change in the order, recognizing the consecutive character of the presentation of the State Department and the diplomatic corps, that it should be considered by the committee. I think it is a matter of considerable importance, the appropriate order in which witnesses are to be called.

[1955] The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remind members of the committee that when the list of witnesses was originally submitted by counsel it was stated that it did not represent the order in which they would appear and, also, counsel stated that they would attempt to give the committee and the press and the public 2 or 3 days' notice of witnesses that would appear on any given day. That course has up to now, I think, been followed and the notice that we got at the end of last week with respect to General Miles, Admiral Wilkinson, and the others, as I understood it, was in compliance with that understanding.

Mr. GESELL. We have had this problem. I am sure the members of the committee recognize this. We have had this problem in scheduling witnesses: We have had to bring responsible officers in from active theaters and we are anxious not to keep them in Washington any longer than necessary, so that they can return to their posts.

Senator BREWSTER. You are not applying that to General Miles, are you?

Mr. GESELL. No, I am not applying that to General Miles, although I do not believe he is stationed here.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further questions that counsel wish to ask Mr. Grew?

Senator FERGUSON. I have a question that I spoke to him [1956] about the——

The CHAIRMAN. I was speaking to the counsel first.

Mr. GESELL. No, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Any other questions desired by members of the committee?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BREWSTER. I have one or two I would like to ask.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is now after 4 o'clock. The Chair had hoped that we might finish with Mr. Grew today, but it is entirely up to the committee whether it wants to adjourn now or continue.

Senator FERGUSON. I just have one question that I was not able to find the citation for this morning and I have it now.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if we could finish——

Senator BREWSTER. I have two or three questions. I do not know that they will take any extended time.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the wish of the committee about proceeding?

Senator FERGUSON. I move to proceed.

Senator BREWSTER. What is the position of Mr. Grew as to returning in the morning?

Mr. GREW. I am entirely at the disposal of the committee, Senator. I will be glad to come back. [1957]

Senator BREWSTER. Well, I suggest this, that in view of the very extended examination of Mr. Grew that he might like to think the thing over a little himself and I am sure perhaps some of the rest of us would and perhaps get our questions in a form that would reduce rather than increase the time. I personally prefer to adjourn.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could I just suggest one thing?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to call attention to the memorandum that was given to us on November 24 as following the State Department, the next series. That did not indicate, as I understand it, that Mr. Hamilton was not to be called. Could I show that to counsel and ask if that is the memorandum?

Mr. GESELL. That is the memorandum. I think I made clear that our point with respect to Mr. Hamilton was one that we were advancing to the committee at this time.

Senator FERGUSON. Oh, at this particular moment?

Mr. GESELL. That is right.

Senator BREWSTER. Well, then there have been no previous suggestions to the committee on that.

Mr. GESELL. That is right.

[1958] The CHAIRMAN. Well, suppose we recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. You be back at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, Mr. Grew.

Mr. GREW. I will be here with pleasure at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN. I hope the committee can conclude with you tomorrow.

(Whereupon, at 4:10 p. m., Wednesday, November 28, 1945, an adjournment was taken until 10 a. m., Thursday, November 29, 1945.)

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The Joint Committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[1960] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Before proceeding, the Chair wishes to announce that the committee has been officially advised that General Marshall will be able to testify before the committee prior to his departure for China. As soon as his schedule in this respect is definite he will advise the committee in ample time to arrange for his testimony before he leaves the country.

I might say, in that connection, that General Marshall is just as anxious to testify before the committee as the committee is to have him testify.

When we recessed I believe that Senator Ferguson announced that he wanted to ask some questions.

Senator FERGUSON. I believe that Senator Brewster was ahead of me.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. GREW. Mr. Chairman, may I—

Senator FERGUSON. I can go ahead if you want me to.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Grew has something to say.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH CLARK GREW (Resumed)

Mr. GREW. Might I clear up two or three points, Mr. Chairman, concerning information which was asked of me?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREW. One question raised was as to whether I had been informed of the consideration in Washington of a modus vivendi with the Japanese at the end of November. I could not recollect whether I was informed of that in the mass of [1961] correspondence and events that occurred at that time, but I now have found a telegram from the Secretary of State to me in which he tells me the whole story. I can submit that to counsel or read it, as you wish.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead and read it.

Mr. GREW. All right.

Mr. KEEFE. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. Does it relate to the question which I asked Mr. Grew yesterday?

Mr. GREW. I think you asked the question, Mr. Congressman.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. It is about the modus vivendi.

Mr. KEEFE. Is that telegram published?

Mr. GREW. I do not think it has yet been published.

Mr. KEEFE. It is not included in your diary?

Mr. GREW. No, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. And it is not included in any of these publications of the State Department?

Mr. GREW. I haven't checked it but I do not think it is.

Mr. KEEFE. And where did you get the telegram?

Mr. GREW. From the files of the Department of State.

Mr. KEEFE. You went to the Department of State after [1962] your testimony?

Mr. GREW. No; I did not go myself but several requests have been made to see if certain things took place during that period, whether I had been informed of this or that. This is one of the points raised and I instituted a search to see if I was informed of the modus vivendi plan and I have only this morning, just now, just 5 minutes ago, received this telegram.

Mr. KEEFE. Very well.

Mr. GREW (reading):

WASHINGTON, November 28, 1941.

Ambassador Tokyo, Japan, 796. Strictly confidential for the Ambassador and the Counsellor only.

This is from Mr. Hull.

Following the Japanese proposals of November 20, the Department gave consideration to a number of alternate proposals and counter-suggestions or combinations thereof which suggested themselves to the Department for possible presentation to the Japanese Government. At one time the Department considered the question of presenting to the Japanese Government simultaneously with the proposal which was actually given them on November 26, an alternate plan for a temporary modus [1963] vivendi. The draft under consideration at that time called for a temporary modus vivendi to be in effect for a period of three months during which time conversations would continue toward the working out of a comprehensive peaceful settlement covering the entire Pacific area. At the end of the period of the term of the modus vivendi both Governments would confer at the request of either to determine whether the extension of the modus vivendi was justified by the prospects of reaching a settlement of the sort sought.

The draft modus vivendi which we were considering contained mutual pledges of peaceful interest, a reciprocal undertaking not to make armed advancement in northeastern Asia and the northern Pacific area, southeast Asia and the southern Pacific area, an undertaking by Japan to withdraw its forces from southern French Indo-China, to limit those in northern Indo-China to the number there on July 26, 1941, which number should not be subject to replacement and Japan should not in any case send additional naval, military or air forces to Indo-China. This Government would undertake to modify its freezing orders to the extent to permit exports from the United States to Japan of bunkers and ship supplies, food products and pharmaceuticals with certain qualifi- [1964] cations, raw cotton up to $600,000 monthly, a small amount of petroleum within categories now permitted general export on a monthly basis for civilian needs, the proportionate amount to be exported from this country to be determined after consultation with the British and Dutch Governments. The United States would permit imports in general provided that raw silk constitutes at least two thirds in value of such imports. The proceeds of such imports would be available for the purchase of the designated exports from the United States and for the payment of interest and principle of Japanese obligations within the United States. This Government would undertake to approach the British, Dutch and Australian Governments on the question of their taking similar economic measures.

At a certain point in our consideration of the draft modus vivendi the representatives in Washington of the British, Dutch, Australian and Chinese Governments were consulted.

After careful consideration of all factors in the situation within the United States and in the general world situation, including the reaction and replies of the Governments mentioned above, it was decided that we should drop the draft modus vivendi which we had had [1965] under consideration. That draft modus vivendi was not handed to the Japanese, and the fact that this Government had considered a modus vivendi was not mentioned to them.

"The Department has informed you in separate telegrams—

Mr. KEEFE. Pardon me just one minute. Will you read that last sentence again?

Mr. GREW (reading):

That draft modus vivendi was not handed to the Japanese, and the fact that this Government had considered a modus vivendi was not mentioned to them.

The Department has informed you in separate telegrams of the documents handed the Japanese Ambassador on November 28 and of the conversation which took place on that date.

Signed "Hull."

Mr. KEEFE. What is the date of that telegram?

Mr. GREW. That telegram is dated November 28, 1941, 7 p. m., Washington. I will turn that over to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does that conclude your statement?

Mr. GREW. I have one more point, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Proceed.

[1966] Mr. GREW. I was also asked whether I had been instructed to burn our codes prior to the outbreak of war.

I have been given a telegram which was sent to me in Tokyo on December 5, 1941 but which appears to have gone via Peiping via naval radio. I do not think I ever received this telegram in Tokyo before the break. I do not think I received it at all.

It is a fairly long message, of many pages. Do you wish me to read it or shall I merely turn it over to general counsel?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair suggests that it be submitted to counsel and that it be put in the record, too.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, that was my question that I had asked. I wonder whether he could read the part relating to the destruction of codes.

Mr. GREW. I think there are two paragraphs which are very pertinent, which I could read.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Put the whole telegram in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. We will have the whole telegram inserted but you may read the paragraphs in question.

Mr. GREW. All right, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Just read the two paragraphs which relate to this.

Mr. GREW (reading):

[1967] Strictly Confidential.

1. The following instructions are applicable to all offices in Japan, Japanese occupied areas in China, Hong Kong, Indo-China, and Thailand, and are intended to enable officers, in the event of sudden emergency and in case communications with the Department are delayed or severed, to take appropriate action concerning Government property, alien employees, archives, leases, the evacuation of the American members of the staff, et cetera.

Now, the paragraph which applies to our codes would appear to be as follows [reading]:

7. It is of the utmost importance that all confidential files, seals, codes, ciphers, true readings, protectograph dies, et cetera, should be destroyed. Fee stamps should be destroyed by burning in the presence of at least two competent witnesses whose affidavits should be obtained.

I think that is all in this telegram, so far as I know, that applies to codes but, as I say, I do not think that I ever received this message.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it will be made part of the record.

(The telegram referred to follows:)

[1967-A]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 5, 1941. 10pm

Not for distribution.

American Embassy, Tokyo (Japan) via Peiping by naval radio.

Info: Amembasy Chungking

American Consul Hongkong

Strictly confidential.

1. The following instructions are applicable to all offices in Japan, Japanese occupied areas in China, Hong Kong, Indo China, and Thailand, and are intended to enable officers, in the event of sudden emergency and in case communications with the Department are delayed or severed, to take appropriate action concerning Government property, alien employees, archives, leases, and the evacuation of the American members of the staff, et cetera.

2. The Department will endeavor to telegraph travel orders covering the transportation of all officers and American employees. ~~of the Legation.~~ In the event of a sudden emergency and if regular travel orders have not been received, travel expenses (including expenses for travel by air) and per diem and shipment of effects, if possible, all in accordance with [1967-B] the Travel Regulations, are hereby authorized in the discretion of the Chief of Mission or principal consular officer for all officers and American employees of the Department of State and for their wives and minor children. In the absence of regular travel orders (involving charges against the appropriation for "Transportation, Foreign Service") expenses incurred under the authority of this paragraph should be charged to Authorization No. 11-1942; while separate drafts should be drawn and separate accounts rendered.

3. The services of all alien personnel (except as noted in paragraph 4 below) should be terminated effective at the expiration of thirty days' leave less any leave previously taken in the calendar year, leave to commence on the day after the effective date of the closing of the ~~Legation.~~ The office, or, if their services are needed thereafter to commence within two weeks after closing. The effective dates of leave and termination of services of each alien employee should be reported. Officers are reminded that no salary payments may be made in advance. Department will endeavor to arrange for payment after officers' departure.

4. At those posts where the office and/or residence are owned by this Government, it is suggested that officers endeavor to arrange for the retention of one or more trustworthy alien employees as custodians of the premises. Their salaries as custodians would be at the same rate they were receiving in [1867-C] other capacities at the time the office was closed. The Department will try to arrange to pay their salaries and to provide funds for the maintenance of the buildings by such means as may become possible. If custodians are retained they should be instructed to confine their activities strictly to guardianship of the property of this Government and they should refrain from any activities, however informal, which could possibly be interpreted as going beyond their custodial functions.

5. At posts where offices are leased, the Department leaves to the discretion of the Chief of Mission or principal consular officer whether to retain the premises, leaving the property of this Government therein, or to store the property in commercial warehouses and terminate the lease. Depending on the time at their disposal and the availability of warehouses, officers should endeavor to make the most economical arrangements that are not incompatible with the security of the property concerned. If the premises must be retained, efforts should at least be made to reduce the amount of rental. Officers will know best whether, when premises are retained, property left therein may be entrusted to landlords, or whether custodians should be retained as outlined in the foregoing paragraph.

6. The property mentioned in the above paragraphs includes furniture, equipment, and nonconfidential archives. Such archives should be sealed, however,

[1967-D] 7. ~~All~~ It is of the utmost importance that all confidential files, seals, ~~confidential~~ codes, ciphers, true readings, protograph dies, et cetera, should be destroyed. Fee stamps should be destroyed by burning in the presence of at least two competent witnesses whose affidavits should be obtained.

8. All passports of any character, valid or invalid, extra visa pages, certificates of naturalization and certificates of registration and identity, blank or filled in, should be thoroughly mutilated and then burnt. With the exception of passports the first page of which should be retained for delivery to Department, a complete list should be made of all documents destroyed with identifying data when possible. In no circumstances should you attempt to bring with you any of the above documents or supplies except the first pages of passports.

9. The Department would have no objection to the storage of the personal effects of officers and American employees in Government-owned buildings or in leased buildings that are retained. ~~of the personal effects of officers and employees.~~ If such facilities not available, Department will pay local storage charges.

10. If possible, forms 285 and 298 should be submitted after closing the office. The Department should be informed by telegraph of the effective date of closing.

[1967-E] 11. All offices concerned ~~are~~ required to inform the Department immediately (rather than at the time of closing) by telegraph of any foreign interests represented by them which have not been the subject of any specific instruction from or report to the Department since January 1, 1941. The disposition of foreign interests in the event of closing of offices will be dealt with later in a separate telegraphic instruction.

12. Each office at the time of closing and in connection with authorizations to draw drafts and make payments to individuals against deposits made with Department shall immediately inform it of all cases of noncompliance by citing instruction numbers and dates, amounts and beneficiaries.

13. The sending of this instruction is in the nature of a precautionary measure and the authority granted in the foregoing paragraphs is intended to enable the officers concerned to deal with a sudden emergency. The concerned officers should quietly formulate plans to deal with an emergency if and when it arises. It is highly desirable that discussion be kept to a minimum and that publicity be avoided.

Tokyo instruct officers in Japanese territory.

Peiping instruct officers in Japanese-occupied areas in China including Manchuria.

Sent to Tokyo via Peiping. Repeated to Chungking and Hong Kong. Hong Kong repeat to Bangkok and Saigon. Saigon instruct Hanoi.

HULL.

[1968] The CHAIRMAN. All right. Is that all?

Mr. GREW. That is all, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, Senator, go ahead.

Senator BREWSTER. You were also, Mr. Grew, going to look to see whether you had been at any time consulted or informed in advance regarding the retention of the fleet at Pearl Harbor, any time before the May 7 date.

Mr. GREW. Yes, Senator. That is now being looked for but it has not yet been found, and the belief is expressed that I never was informed of that movement.

Senator BREWSTER. So unless we do receive——

Mr. GREW. So unless you hear to the contrary you may assume that I was not informed.¹

Senator BREWSTER. Now, I venture to ask this question because of its possible bearing on the situation and you are speaking perhaps with more authority than anybody else regarding this Japanese psychology and I venture it because it was a hypothesis advanced by Arthur Krock in the New York Times which, of course, vouches for its respectability.

He advanced the theory that the Japanese may have desired to have the fleet retained at Hawaii for their own purpose and thought that the American mentality of officialdom would be more likely to retain it there if the Japanese made some strong representations about its removal.

[1969] I do not know whether you noted that suggestion but I would be interested in your comment as as whether or not that was a possible hypothesis.

Mr. GREW. I think that is a perfectly possible hypothesis, Senator. I do not believe anybody could answer the question with any assurance. I was aware of the sometimes devious workings of the processes of Japanese mentality. They were perfectly capable of doing that sort of thing, but you will recollect that I said, so far as I could remember, no official representations had ever been made to me that the fleet should be withdrawn.

The only notation that I have come across was my talk with Arita, Foreign Minister, on a certain date, but it was labeled "informal and off the record." In other words, we occasionally got together, generally at the house of some mutual friends to avoid any publicity which was always splashed in the press and those conversations were distinctly off the record and informal.

Senator BREWSTER. It was at that time that he did indicate that they were somewhat irked by the presence of the fleet there?

Mr. GREW. Yes. That record I think has been read already.

Senator BREWSTER. Yes, I recall it. So you would think [1970] that was a possible hypothesis as to their state of mind?

Mr. GREW. I think that was a possible hypothesis. I do not think I would want to go further than that.

[1971] Senator BREWSTER. Now the modus vivendi which you have testified about this morning, you had indicated previously that you thought it was rather doubtful if they would have agreed to any modus vivendi along the lines that were being discussed at the time, in November.

You recall, in that connection, the inquiry of Kurusu on that morning whether or not they would consider—his exact language is on page 766—

Mr. Kurusu said that he felt that our response to their proposal could be interpreted as tantamount to meaning the end, and asked whether we were not interested in a modus vivendi.

You still feel, in spite of that, that he was not serious in that suggestion?

Mr. GREW. I am inclined to feel, Senator, that the conclusion of a modus vivendi at that time would probably not have prevented the attack; but there again that is a supposition.

Senator BREWSTER. It was at approximately that time that the Germans were turned back from Stalingrad, in what was the beginning of their retreat and ultimate rout, was it not, early in December?

Mr. GREW. I think it was approximately at that time.

Senator BREWSTER. You have indicated in your early report—I am not sure whether you have this incorporated, but [1972] on page 702 of your report you comment on the effect on the Japanese of the varying fortunes of war in Europe. The exact quotation is:

For example, in Japan the pro-Axis element gained power following last year's German victory in Western Europe; then Japanese doubt of ultimate German victory was created by Germany's failure to invade the British Isles, this factor helping to reinforce the moderate element; and finally Germany's attack on the Soviet Union upset the expectation of continued Russo-German peace and made the Japanese realize that those who took Japan into the Tripartite Alliance have misled Japan.

Indicating, as I gather, that Japan was keenly conscious of what was going on in other parts of the world and the effect it might have on them.

By the end of the 3 months' period which is contemplated in the modus vivendi, although I think President Roosevelt indicated he preferred 6 months, but by the end of the 3 months' period the Germans were in full retreat on the Russian front, and I would like to ask you whether or not, if that had occurred—and here again it is hypothetical—whether that would have had a material influence on the Japanese position?

[1973] Mr. GREW. I doubt very much if that had any direct bearing on Japanese procedures at that time. The Japanese were pulling away more and more from the Germans. While the Germans were constantly egging them on and doing everything they could to prevent the Washington conversations from succeeding and to prevent a settlement between Japan and the United States, the Japanese did not like the Germans, a great many of them resented being tied up with them in the Axis Pact.

The Germans, as they had in other capitals, swarmed into Tokyo and more or less tried to control things, and the Japanese did not like it, so they were pretty unpopular there.

I do not believe the events which you speak of had any direct bearing on the event which occurred.

Senator BREWSTER. I, of course, recognize after the die was cast that was the end, but I am now speaking of the possible modus vivendi in connection with the events, that on December 1, 1941, the Germans had reached the peak of their power, they were at the gates of Stalingrad, had been for some time, and 2 weeks later they were turned back in a rather decisive retreat that turned into a rout. The coincidence of the two affairs had always impressed me, that Japan struck at the height of German power and it seemed almost as though the Germans had come on to Stalingrad for the purpose of getting the Japanese in.

[1974] So my question is not as to what happened but as to what might have happened if the modus vivendi had been in effect and at the end of 3 months the Japanese surveying the situation, had found their German friends in a very different position. I think you have hitherto emphasized that the Japanese had never believed they could conquer the world alone but that they were dependent on the success of the Axis armies in Europe for any final plan.

Mr. GREW. My belief, Senator, was that at that time the Japanese were pretty independent. They were certainly very cocky. They had complete self-assurance, and I rather doubt whether any fluctuations in the war in Europe would materially have altered their procedure.

But that is something that of course cannot be proved. It is only supposition.

Senator BREWSTER. Yes. Now what did you feel, Mr. Grew, as to the consequences of any further southern expansion, moving into the Kra Peninsula, Singapore, the Dutch East Indies, as to it requiring that we should, at all odds, take action or whether we could have tolerated any further movement safely for the sake of gaining time?

Mr. GREW. The Japanese program, Senator, was constantly expanding. In the beginning they talked about the Greater East Asia coprosperity sphere, and later that developed into [1975] the coprosperity sphere for Greater East Asia including the South Seas, and that included Australia.

In other words, their visions of grandeur were constantly increasing.

Senator BREWSTER. You called it delusions.

Mr. GREW. It was constantly increasing.

Senator BREWSTER. You felt that at some point the line must be drawn, you could not let them go on indefinitely?

Mr. GREW. Very decidedly so.

Senator BREWSTER. That meant some parallel of latitude or some other definite spot beyond which you could not permit them to pass?

Mr. GREW. I never thought of it in terms of precise geography, Senator. It was the general movement which was threatening what I considered our vital national interest. It was not a question of arriving at any particular point or crossing any particular line, it was simply the general movement.

Senator BREWSTER. Now one other question, for the purpose of the historical record.

You spoke yesterday about the encouragement which was given to the warlike spirit of Japan by the publication of statements of an isolationist or pacifist character in this country, and that those were frequently featured in the [1976] Japanese press during the year 1940 for the purpose of stimulating the Japanese attitude that they could safely attack us.

Mr. GREW. It was for the purpose of creating in the Japanese mind a totally erroneous conception of the spirit of the American people.

Senator BREWSTER. In order to do complete justice I want to read the most distinguished publication on that score and I want to ask you whether or not it was published in Japan. This was on September 16, 1940,¹ a statement which I took from volume IX of Public ¹ Subsequently corrected to October 30, 1940.

Papers and Addresses of Franklin D. Roosevelt, President Roosevelt, on page 434, and I quote:

And while I am talking to you mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance.

I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again.

Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars. They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores.

That is the end of the quotation. Do you recall whether or not that was published at that time in Japan.

Mr. GREW. No, sir. I would not recall whether that precise statement was published in Japan at that time.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the Senator yield?

[1977] Senator BREWSTER. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. In view of the fact that the Senator from Maine has brought out the quotation, I want to state in the record that there were a number of other speeches made by the same distinguished gentleman from which any fair-minded person would take a proper construction.

I would like also to say that on yesterday there was reference made by a member of this committee to certain things connected with politics, and now we have a reference to another political speech. I hope we will keep politics out of this investigation.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I certainly share the hope of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that politics may be kept out, the Chair suggests that the whole speech from which the quotation was read be made a part of the record.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time the Senator from Illinois—

Senator BREWSTER. That is entirely agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, you have concluded?

Senator BREWSTER. Yes, that is all.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the Senator from Maine brings up this one quotation, the Senator from Illinois, at the proper time, will proceed to insert other [1978] speeches made by this distinguished President upon that same question, and those quotations will not be the same as the Senator from Maine quoted. I think the Senator from Maine, if he wanted to do real justice to the cause, would use more than that one quotation.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I might well have taken a single sentence, but I did not, I took the entire quotation. I think those concerned will point out the language which the President there used regarding the defense. In other speeches he used the words "unless we are attacked."

In this speech he used the words "that is for our defense," which may be considered as moderating its implication. However, I think the question is quite fair, and I certainly have no objection to any other statements of any kind being inserted, which I hope certainly are not in conflict or contradiction. I would expect a continuity of policy.

The CHAIRMAN. The speech from which the quotation was read may be made a part of the record.

(The speech referred to follows:)

[1979]

Campaign Address at Boston, Mass.

"WE ARE GOING FULL SPEED AHEAD!"

October 30, 1940

(Rebuilding the Navy and naval bases—Expending and training the Army—Defense contracts—Defense housing—Our Air Power is growing—Planes for Britain—Production capacity—Progress of agricultural recovery—Republican opposition to aid to the farmers.)

Mr. Mayor, my friends of New England:

I've had a glorious day here in New England. And I do not need to tell you that I have been glad to come back to my old stamping ground in Boston. There's one thing about this trip that I regret. I have to return to Washington tonight, without getting a chance to go into my two favorite States of Maine and Vermont.

In New York City two nights ago, I showed by the cold print of the Congressional Record how Republican leaders, with their votes and in their speeches, have been playing, and still are playing politics with national defense.

Even during the past three years, when the dangers to all forms of democracy throughout the world have been obvious, the Republican team in the Congress has been acting only as a Party team.

[1980] Time after time, Republican leadership refused to see that what this country needs is an all-American team.

Those side-line critics are now saying that we are not doing enough for our national defense. I say to you that we are going full speed ahead!

Our Navy is our outer line of defense.

Almost the very minute that this Administration came into office seven and a half years ago, we began to build the Navy up—to build a bigger Navy.

In those seven years we have raised the total of 193 ships in commission to 337 ships in commission today.

And, in addition to that, we have 119 more ships that are actually under construction today.

In those seven years we raised the personnel of our Navy from 106,000 to 210,000 today.

You good people here in Boston know of the enormous increase of productive work in your Boston Navy Yard. And that is only one of many Navy yards—one of the best. There are now six times as many men employed in our Navy yards as there were in 1933. The private ship-building yards are also humming with activity—building ships for our Navy and for our expanding merchant marine.

The construction of this Navy has been a monumental job. In spite of what some campaign orators may tell you, you cannot buy a battleship from a mail-order catalogue.

[1981] We have not only added ships and men to the Navy, we have enormously increased the effectiveness of Naval bases in those outlying territories of ours in the Atlantic and Pacific.

For our objective is to keep any potential attacker as far from our continental shores as we possibly can.

You here in New England know that well, and can well visualize it.

And within the past two months your Government has acquired new naval and air bases in British territory in the Atlantic Ocean; extending all the way from Newfoundland in the north to that part of South America where the Atlantic Ocean begins to get narrow, with Africa not far away.

I repeat: Our objective is to keep any potential attacker as far from our continental shores as we possibly can.

That is the record of the growth of our Navy. In 1933 a weak Navy; in 1940 a strong Navy. Side-line critics may carp in a political campaign. But Americans are mighty proud of that record and Americans will put their country first and partisanship second.

Speaking of partisanship, I remind you—when the Naval Expansion Bill came up in 1938 the vast majority of Republican members of the Congress voted against building any more battleships.

What kind of political shenanigans are these?

Can we trust those people with national defense?

[1982] Next, take up the Army: Under normal conditions we have no need for a vast Army in this country. But you and I know that unprecedented dangers require unprecedented action to guard the peace of America against unprecedented threats.

Since that day, a little over a year ago, when Poland was invaded, we have more than doubled the size of our regular Army. Adding to this, the Federalized National Guardsmen, our armed land forces now equal more than 436,000 enlisted men. And yet there are armies overseas that run four and five and six million men.

The officers and men of our Army and National Guard are the finest in the world.

They will be, as you know, the nucleus for the training of the young men who are being called under the Selective Service Act. 800,000 of them in the course of this year out of nearly 17,000,000 registered—in other words, a little less than 5 per cent of the total registration.

General Marshall said to me the other day that the task of training those young men is, for the Army, a "profound privilege."

Campaign orators seek to tear down the morale of the American people when they make false statements about the Army's equipment. I say to you that we are supplying our Army with the best fighting equipment in all the world.

Yes, the Army and the Defense Commission are getting things [1983] done with speed and efficiency. More than eight billion dollars of contracts for defense have been let in the past few months.

I am afraid that those campaign orators will pretty soon be under the painful necessity of coming down to Washington later on and eating their words.

I cannot help but feel that the most inexcusable, most unpatriotic misstatement of fact about our Army—a misstatement calculated to worry the mothers of the Nation—is the brazen charge that the men called to training will not be properly housed.

The plain fact is that construction on Army housing is far ahead of schedule to meet all needs, and that by January fifth, next, there will be complete and adequate housing in this Nation for nine hundred and thirty thousand soldiers.

And so I feel that, very simply and very honestly, I can give assurance to the mothers and fathers of America that each and every one of their boys in training will be well housed and well fed.

Throughout that year of training, there will be constant promotion of their health and their well-being.

And while I am talking to you mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance.

I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again:

Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

[1984] They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores.

The purpose of our defense is defense.

The Republican campaign orators who moan and groan (laughter) about our Army and Navy are even more mournful about our strength in the air. But only last year, 1939, the Republicans in the Congress were voting in favor of reducing appropriations for the Army Air Corps.

What kind of political shenanigans are these?

Can such people be trusted with national defense?

I stress particularly what every Army and Navy flier tells us—that what counts most in sustained air power is the productive capacity of our airplane and engine factories. That ought to be almost a first-grade lesson.

We are determined to attain a production capacity of 50,000 planes a year in the United States. And day by day we are working and making very rapid progress toward that goal.

You citizens of Seattle who are listening tonight—you have watched the Boeing plant out there grow. It is now producing four times as many planes each month as it was producing a year ago.

You citizens of Southern California can see the great Douglas factories. They have doubled their output in less than a year. You citizens of Buffalo and St. Louis can see the Curtiss plants [1985] in your cities. Their output has jumped to twelve times its level of a year ago.

And, of course, we are training our young men, and training them successfully in sufficient numbers, to fly these planes as soon as they come off the lines.

But planes won't fly without engines. You citizens of Hartford, who hear my words: look across the Connecticut River at the whirring wheels and the beehive of activity which is the Pratt and Whitney plant which I saw today. A year ago that plant was producing airplane engines totaling one hundred thousand horsepower a month. Today that production has been stepped up tenfold, stepped up to one million horsepower a month.

And you citizens of Paterson, New Jersey, you can see the Curtiss-Wright plant which a year ago produced two hundred seventy thousand horsepower a month and this October is producing 859,000 horsepower.

In ten months this Nation has increased our engine output for planes 240 per cent; and I am proud of it.

Remember, too, that we are scattering them all over the country. We are building brand new plants for airplanes and airplane engines in places besides the Pacific Coast and this coast. We are also building them in centers in the Middle West.

Last spring and last winter this great production capacity program was stepped up by orders from overseas. In taking these [1986] orders for planes from overseas, we are following and were following hard-headed self-interest.

Building on the foundation provided by these orders, the British on the other side of the ocean are receiving a steady stream of airplanes. After three months of blitzkrieg in the air over there, the strength of the Royal Air Force is actually greater now than when the attack began. And they know and we know that that increase in strength despite battle losses is due in part to the purchases made from American airplane industries.

Tonight I am privileged to make an announcement, using Boston instead of the White House: The British within the past few days have asked for permission to negotiate again with American manufacturers for 12,000 additional planes. I have asked that the request be given most sympathetic consideration by the Priorities Board. I have asked the Priorities Board to give it that consideration—the Board made up of William S. Knudsen, Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., and Leon Henderson. When those additional orders are approved, as I hope they will be, they will bring Britain's present orders for military planes from the United States to more than 26,000. They will require still more new plant facilities so that the present program of building planes for military purposes both for the United States and Great Britain will not be interrupted.

Also large additional orders are being negotiated for artillery, for machine guns, for rifles, for tanks with equip- [1987] ment and ammunition. The plant capacity necessary to produce all this military equipment is and will be available to serve the needs of the United States in any emergency.

The productive capacity of the United States which has made it the greatest industrial country in the world, is not failing now. It will make us the strongest air power in the world. And that is not just at campaign promise!

I have been glad in the past two or three days to welcome back to the shores of America that Boston boy, beloved by all of Boston and a lot of other places, my Ambassador to the Court of St. James, Joe Kennedy.

Actually on the scene where planes were fighting and bombs were dropping day and night for many months, he has been telling me just what you and I have visualized from afar—that all the smaller independent nations of Europe—Sweden, Switzerland, Greece, Ireland and the others—have lived in terror of the destruction of their independence by Nazi military might.

And so, my friends, we are building up our armed defenses to their highest peak of efficiency for a very good reason, the reason of the possibility of real national danger to us; but these defenses will be inadequate unless we support them with a strong national morale, a sound economy, a sense of solidarity and economic and social justice.

When this Administration first came to office, the foundation of that national morale was crumbling. In the panic and misery [1988] of those days no democracy could have built up an adequate armed defense.

What we have done since 1933 has been written in terms of improvement in the daily life and work of the common man.

I have discussed the falsifications which Republican campaign orators have been making about the economic condition of the Nation—the condition of labor and the condition of business.

They are even more ridiculous when they shed those old crocodile tears over the plight of the American farmer.

Now, if there is anyone that a Republican candidate loves more than the laboring man in October and up to Election Day, it is the farmer.

And the first one that he forgets after Election Day is the farmer.

Do I have to remind you of the plight of the farmer—not just the Western farmer, but the New England farmer—during the period between 1920 and 1933—declining income, accumulating surpluses, rising farm debts—ten-cent corn, twenty-cent wheat, five-cent cotton and three-cent hogs?

But before 1933 the Administration did nothing to stop that slide. But, of course, before every Election Day they always uncork the old bottle of soothing syrup and spread it thick. (Laughter.)

The farmers of America know from the record what the state [1989] of American agriculture is today.

Farm income this year is just about double what it was in 1932.

Farm buying power this year is greater than it was even in 1929.

Tens of thousands of farmers have had their farms saved from foreclosure.

More than 800,000 low income farmers have been able to obtain credit from the Government which they could get nowhere else. And, incidentally, credit which they are repaying.

Over a million farms have been electrified since 1933.

Over 6,000,000 farmers have received benefit payments of more than three and a half million dollars.

What does it all add up to? It means an agriculture that is strong and vigorous.

And we all know how much this is due to the patient efforts and practical vision of Henry Wallace.

The people of New England, whether they live in the city or out in the country, know that if the farmers' income in this Nation had remained what it was in 1932, they would be buying fewer shoes, fewer watches and ice boxes, less woolen goods and cotton goods, than they are buying now. Prosperous farmers mean more employment, more prosperity for the workers and businessmen of New England and of every industrial area in the whole country.

[1990] Parity—the proper relationship between agriculture and the rest of our economy—will continue to be our guiding principle.

We now have great stocks of wheat, corn and cotton—in a sense really strategic materials in a world that is threatened by war.

Surpluses not needed for reserves are now being used to feed the hungry and the ill-nourished and that is a fact that is difficult for the old Republican orators to deny.

Our school luncheon program will this year reach three million children with milk and other foods. And milk does those children more good than political soothing syrup.

While this was being done, what were the Republican leaders doing? Here is the record:

In 1933, Republicans in the Congress, in both houses, voted against the first Agricultural Adjustment Act, 88 to 52.

In 1936 they voted against the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, 75 to 25.

In 1938, they voted against the second Agricultural Adjustment Act, 84 to 15.

And even in 1940, this year, they voted against parity payments to farmers by 143 to 32.

In the spring of this year, they voted overwhelmingly against the Stamp Plan to distribute food to needy people through private grocery stores.

[1991] The American farmers will not be deceived by pictures of Old Guard candidates, patting cows and pitching hay in front of moving picture cameras.

And even since the Convention in Philadelphia, all the sweet words of the Republican leaders in that Convention have not been worth the paper they were written on.

For listen to this: Last summer, only a few weeks after the Republican National Platform had been adopted endorsing commodity loans for the farmers, the Republican members of the House marched right back into the Halls of Congress and voted against commodity loans for the farmers, 106 to 37.

Among the Republican leaders who voted against that bill and against practically every other farm bill was the present Chairman of the Republican National Committee, that "peerless leader," that "farmers' friend"—Congressman Joe Martin of Massachusetts.

I would not single him out except that he is of national interest now, because at the time of his appointment as Republican National Chairman this handsome verbal bouquet, this expensive orchid, was pinned upon him: "In public life for many years Joe Martin has represented all that is finest in American public life."

Considering the source of that orchid, Martin must be slated for some Cabinet post. So let's look for a minute at the voting record of this representative of what they call, "all that [1992] is finest in American public life."

Martin voted against the Public Utility Holding Company Act, the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, the National Securities Exchange Act, and the extension of the Civilian Conservation Corps Act. He voted against practically all relief and work relief measures, and against the appropriation for rural electrification.

Martin voted against the Civil Service Extension Act and against the United States Housing Act.

What I particularly want to say on the radio to the farmers of the Nation, and to you here in this hall, is that Republican National Chairman Martin voted against every single one of the farm measures that were recommended by this Administration. Perhaps Brother Martin will be rewarded for this loyal service to the principles of his party by being appointed Secretary of Agriculture.

He is one of that great historic trio which has voted consistently against every measure for the relief of agriculture—Martin, Barton and Fish.

I have to let you in on a secret. It will come as a great surprise to you. And it's this:

I'm enjoying this campaign. I'm really having a fine time.

I think you know that the office of President has not been an easy one during the past years.

The tragedies of this distracted world have weighed heavily on all of us.

[1993] But—there is revival for every one of us in the sight of our own national community.

In our own American community we have sought to submerge all the old hatreds, all the old fears, of the old world.

We are Anglo-Saxon and Latin, we are Irish and Teuton and Jewish and Scandinavian and Slav—we are American. We belong to many races and colors and creeds—we are American.

And it seems to me that we are most completely, most loudly, most proudly American around Election Day.

Because it is then that we can assert ourselves—voters and candidates alike. We can assert the most glorious, the most encouraging fact in all the world today—the fact that democracy is alive—and going strong.

We are telling the world that we are free—and we intend to remain free and at peace.

We are free to live and love and laugh.

We face the future with confidence and courage. We are American.

[1993-A] The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, the telegram which you brought in this morning, dated December 5, in the typewriting it is December 3, and across the "3" is marked in pen "5". You say you do not have any recollection of ever receiving this telegram?

Mr. GREW. That is the one regarding the destruction of the codes? Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I have no recollection of having received it.

Senator FERGUSON. Where did you get this copy?

Mr. GREW. This telegram?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. This was one of the telegrams—you remember the question was asked me at the hearing—

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I am asking you, did you get it from the Secretary of State's office?

Mr. GREW. I asked that an exploration be made of the archives to see whether such telegram existed, and it was found and brought to me this morning.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you tell me, Mr. Grew, notwithstanding whether you received the telegram or not, whether any codes were destroyed? I am not asking you [1994] the kind of codes, but were there any of the American codes or code machines destroyed prior to the 7th?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. As I think I have already said, some of our codes were destroyed shortly before the break. I do not know, frankly, how long before they were destroyed or how many were destroyed. I remember simply taking steps to see that at least one code was left for last minute communication with Washington in case of necessity.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I notice that affidavits were to be filed, according to this message.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Were such affidavits prepared and filed?

Mr. GREW. They presumably were, but I could not answer that question because this was really a matter of more or less routine which I probably had nothing to do with. It might have been the counsel of the Embassy; it might have been the first secretary who would have taken charge of this particular matter.

Senator FERGUSON. The Secretary of State's office would have those affidavits?

Mr. GREW. The affidavits?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GREW. If they were kept, they were undoubtedly [1995] brought back by us to Washington when we came back on the Grips-holm in August 1942.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you bring the papers back?

Mr. GREW. I brought a good many papers back, but I do not recollect, Senator, whether those particular papers were among them. It would have to be looked up.

Senator FERGUSON. Do I understand then you want to convey to the committee that the destruction of the codes was a routine matter?

Mr. GREW. Well, the actual act of the destruction—

Senator FERGUSON. I appreciate that the actual destruction would be routine after your instructions, but you do not wish to convey to the committee that the giving of the orders to destroy the codes is a routine matter?

Mr. GREW. Oh, no, that is perfectly true.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, if you did not receive this message—and your memory is you did not—from what did you get the information to destroy the codes prior to the 7th? When I use the "7th" I am using the day of the attack, the time of the attack is what I have in mind.

Mr. GREW. I do not recollect having acted on any document or any report, but we knew the way things were shaping up at that time. This destruction of the code may have taken place very shortly before the final break. I shall [1996] have to check up on that to answer your question.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you check up on that, as to just when they were destroyed?

Mr. GREW. I will, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would your diary give that?

Mr. GREW. No, I do not think it is mentioned there.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you conferred recently with the military or naval attachés that were with you?

Mr. GREW. As far as I know they are both absent from Washington. Senator FERGUSON. Would you give them orders for the destruction of other codes or code machines?

Mr. GREW. That would have been undertaken by themselves on the basis of their own instructions.

Senator FERGUSON. Would those instructions come through your Embassy?

Mr. GREW. In a matter of that kind I assume that they would have come direct to the attachés.

Senator FERGUSON. Do I understand then that your opinion, from what you had in Japan, was such that you considered it advisable to destroy some codes and code machines and only retain one code? Is that correct?

Mr. GREW. That is correct, Senator, but I am not clear about the timing. I do not like to answer that question [1997] categorically until I look into it.

Senator FERGUSON. But you will look into it and return?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; I will.¹

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the quotation that I used the other day, that I could not find at that time is on page 701 of Foreign Relations. My phrasing was not quite accurate, and it could have been misleading, so I want to quote what I had in mind.

It is the message of November 3, or two messages of November 3, one is a long one and one is a short one. It is the first one. I had phrased it something like this:

"What is the significance of the message that the Cabinet had made up its mind and told the Emperor?"

Then I asked you whether or not that had caused you to send the November 3 message. I had in mind the long message.

Now, at the top of the page there is a quotation in the message, "Memorandum by the Ambassador in Japan. Tokyo, November 3, 1941." It is signed by you.

The Foreign Minister had told him—that is your friend, the reliable informant, as you called him—that during the past few days he had been constantly in conference day and night with the Prime Minister and the Minister of the Navy, and that as a result, the Government had reached a [1798] definite decision as to how far it was prepared to go in implementing the desires of the Emperor for an adjustment of relations with the United States. This decision, which was being held in strictest secrecy, had been communicated by the Prime Minister to the Emperor on the afternoon of November 2.

The Foreign Minister had conveyed to my informant the impression that he expected to ask me to call for an extended conversation within a few days.

Now, what significance has that had; that they in effect, as I read it, had told the Emperor what they were going to do?

[1999] Mr. GREW. Well, that is really an assumption, Senator. There again is one of those things that cannot be proved.

Senator FERGUSON. I just want to know what you mean by this sentence, what you are conveying to the State Department. All I am after in these questions is merely to ascertain what knowledge the State Department had, what knowledge you had, and sometime we will get to the question as to what knowledge they had in Hawaii, to ascertain how this attack could have been as successful as it was at Pearl Harbor.

Mr. GREW. You spoke a moment ago about my telegram of November 3 and asked me whether this conversation with the Japanese informant had brought about the sending of that telegram. I do not think so because that telegram had been elaborated over a period of time. It represented our thoughts in the Embassy in Tokyo at the time it was sent.

With regard to this particular conversation he says that the Foreign Minister expected to call me for an extended conversation within a few days. That Foreign Minister was Mr. Togo. I don't recollect whether he did call for me or not. I shall have to go through the files to see.

Senator FERGUSON. It goes further and says the Government had reached a definite decision as to how far it was prepared to go in implementing the desires of the Emperor for an adjustment of relations with the United States. That indicated that the Government, the war lords, were dictating to the Emperor just what they were going to do.

Mr. GREW. That is a fair assumption, certainly.

Senator FERGUSON. I mean that is a fair statement from what you said?

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate that these war lords had at that time, as far as your informant was concerned, had taken the matter out of the Emperor's hands and they were going to dictate or decide what they were going to do; is that what you were conveying to the State Department?

Mr. GREW. I think that is a plausible assumption.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, how are we going to get what you were trying to convey to the State Department? I don't want to construe it. I want you to construe it.

Mr. GREW. Senator, I think the construction of that telegram of mine of November 3 to the Secretary of State is self-explanatory. It is a very long telegram. It goes over the whole ground and it indicates our feeling at that time based on what information came to us through various channels, but I can't put my finger on any one piece of information that led to that telegram.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know why you separated these two telegrams and sent two telegrams instead of putting it all [2001] in one, when you sent it the same day?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. There is a distinction there. This telegram before us, on page 700 of Foreign Relations, is reporting a specific instance. My telegram of November 3—the long telegram of November 3—is not reporting a specific instance. It was an analysis and survey of the whole situation. That is why the telegrams were separated.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did the Foreign Minister call on you as indicated in this first telegram that "he expected me to call for an extended conversation within a few days"?

Mr. GREW. That I shall have to look up the records on to see. The Foreign Minister did occasionally call for me. I cannot now recollect the dates.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that shortly after this that we had intercepted messages indicating that the 25th of November was the deadline date, as they called it?

Mr. GREW. No, sir; I did not know that fact. As I have already said, Senator, I knew nothing about any of those intercepted messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any information that what the Prime Minister and the Government had done was to tell the Emperor what the deadline had been?

Mr. GREW. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You had no such information?

[2002] Mr. GREW. I had no information whatsoever to that effect.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Grew, did you get any information that we had changed the course of our ships, that Admiral Stark had issued an order about—Counsel, can you give me the date of that order?

Mr. MURPHY. November 25.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it November 25?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was in October, I think.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it October?

Mr. MITCHELL. The order shifting the fleet? October 16, I think. My recollection is it is October 16, but we will check.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the same date as the fall of the Cabinet and I don't associate the two together.

I will get the date for you later, Mr. Grew.

Mr. GREW. In any case I shall have to look that up, Senator, and see.

Senator FERGUSON. You don't recall it now?

Mr. GREW. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that we had withdrawn certain shipping from the Japanese area?

Mr. GREW. My recollection is that I didn't know that but there again—

Senator FERGUSON. You want to look that up?

Mr. GREW. Yes.¹

[2003] Senator FERGUSON. I will get you that date, Mr. Grew, in relation to Admiral Stark's notice of changing the route of shipping.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question?

Senator FERGUSON. I thought it was November 25.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield to the Congressman?

Senator FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, in the record within the past several days the Senator from Michigan in questioning the witness on the stand made reference at various times to the note of August 17 handed by the President of the United States to the Japanese representative as being an ultimatum.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, may I just interrupt to say—

Mr. MURPHY. Not that the gentleman called it an ultimatum but whether or not the witness did not think it was an ultimatum.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I have given no opinion whatever on that note.

I wish to convey on the record that I have not purported to convey any opinion whatever upon that note. I used the language of ¹ See Mr. Gesell's statement, Hearings, Part 5, p. 2067.

Captain Schuirmann in a war committee meeting, on the instructions of Admiral Stark, as the note reads. But [2004] I have no intention whatever of saying that this is an ultimatum or conveying to anyone that I even think that this is an ultimatum. What I am trying to find out, Mr. Chairman, by these questions is what knowledge they had here in Washington and what knowledge they had in Japan and what knowledge they had at Pearl Harbor.

This statement came from the—

Joint Board, Washington, Secret Minutes of a Meeting, November 3, 1941, at the call of the Senior Members, weekly meeting scheduled for November 5, 1941 was held today, 2003 Munitions Building, meeting called to order at 3:40—and this is a statement of action of the United States in the Far East in support of China; at the request of Admiral Stark, Captain Schuirmann gave a statement of the action, and it is in that statement that that word was used.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear the Senator from Michigan say that because the question was asked on several occasions as to whether or not this was an ultimatum and reference made to Captain Schuirmann's statement that it was an ultimatum.

And so that no one will make any mistake, since the Senator has said he didn't think it was an ultimatum, I ask that there be inserted in the record a paper also handed to the Japanese [2005] representative by the President of the United States on the same day, in which the following sentence may be found:

The program envisaged in such informal discussions involved the application in the entire Pacific area of the principle of equality of commercial opportunity and treatment. It would thus make possible access by all countries to raw materials and to all other essential commodities.

I am not going to go on and read it all, but I ask that it be inserted in the record.

Senator FERGUSON. I think that is already in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's recollection might be at fault but he thinks that was included as part of the record. If it is not included, it may be included now.

Mr. MURPHY. If it is not I would like to have it made a part of the record so I can ask Captain Schuirmann how the note of the 17th would be an ultimatum.

Mr. MITCHELL. May we have the page?

Mr. MURPHY. Page 558. The statement commences on page 557 of volume II, Foreign Relations of the United States, 1931 to 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope the time never comes when the asking of a question will assume that the questioner believes that the thing is true. He is asking for [2006] information from the witness as to whether or not the witness believes it was true or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. It is for the purpose of trying to get information.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further questions?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to answer Senator—

Senator FERGUSON. No, Mr. Chairman, I have no other questions except this one:

Mr. Grew, did you find that May 1939 instrument, the definite instrument from the Prime Minister to the President of the United States or the Secretary of State, in relation to an over-all settlement of all matters?

Mr. GREW. No, sir. A search is being made for that document. It has not yet come to me.

Senator FERGUSON. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Does counsel wish to make a statement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Senator Ferguson, you asked about the date of the order putting the merchant shipping out of the normal lines through Torres Straits. I am not sure whether that document is in evidence, but I missed the date by 1 day. I said October 16, but this message, which will be presented shortly, was dated October 17, 1941. It is addressed to the commander in [2007] chief of the Asiatic Fleet with information to all the other Pacific commanders and directs they immediately route all trans-Pacific United States flag shipping, and so forth, through the Torres Straits. That is the one you had in mind?

Senator FERGUSON. That is the message. Whom is that signed by?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is from the Chief of Naval Operations.

Senator FERGUSON. That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL. To the commander in chief at Naval District 12; I think that is the Pacific coast—with copies to all the other Pacific commanders.

[2008] Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Lucas.

Senator LUCAS. Before the Ambassador leaves the witness stand, I should like to obtain permission from the committee to make a statement with respect to the personal private diary of Mr. Grew.

I have seen some of the headlines in the press overnight, and in view of the fact that the question had been raised I gave it some thought and study, and would like at this time to make a statement on it.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman—may I interpose?

Senator LUCAS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Maine.

Senator BREWSTER. I fully concur with what the Chairman said yesterday that it is a matter that should receive the most careful consideration of the committee. Thus far I have simply been asking about it. Before I arrive at an opinion, I should welcome a full discussion among the members of the committee on this question. I had hoped that that discussion would be in a somewhat more private form.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no information as to what the statement is that the Senator from Illinois wishes to make. It seems to be based upon some newspaper publication.

Senator LUCAS. No; it isn't based on a newspaper [2009] publication. It is based on what the Senator from Maine said in this public forum and which got into the newspapers on the question of the private diary being admitted in the public record.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is a question of law, that is to be discussed, it might well be relegated to an executive session of the committee for discussion; if it is a matter of law to be thrashed out by the committee.

Senator LUCAS. It is not a question of law.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is a correction of any impression——

Senator LUCAS. That is exactly what I contend it is, a correction of an impression made.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to the Congressman from Wisconsin?

Senator LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. If statements of that character are to be interjected in the record at this time, I would like to reserve the right also to make a statement with respect to this diary at this time.

I had understood that the whole question as to the admission of this diary in evidence before this committee was a matter that was going to be discussed by the full committee in executive session, and it would seem to me highly improper [2010] for members of the committee to now indulge in statements with reference to the propriety or lack of propriety of bringing this diary before the committee. I think it is a matter that ought to be discussed by the committee in executive session. Therefore, I refrained yesterday, in connection with my examination——

Senator LUCAS. I yield just for a question, not a long speech. If the Congressman from Wisconsin will just restrain himself a few moments, he will discover that in this statement I am not attempting to say anything about what the committee should or should not do with respect to bringing this diary before the committee. I am attempting to answer the Senator from Maine, who, on yesterday, said in his opinion that this diary of the Ambassador would be subject to a subpoena duces tecum to be brought into the record.

I don't think it is material or relevant to this hearing one way or the other, and I so stated, but in view of the fact that it has been raised, I desire to answer that point. Not whether or not the committee should have the diary before it.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the Senator yield?

Senator LUCAS. I yield.

Senator BREWSTER. I am certainly sorry if any questioning by me of Mr. Grew, or the letter which I wrote, conduced [2011] to any extraneous discussion. I assured the Senator from Illinois privately yesterday that I had no final views on the matter, and I repeat that now, but I would comment that while I did mention the question of private court procedure, I wouldn't pretend to be as good an authority as the Senator from Illinois on that.

I think the chairman very correctly stated that irrespective of that, there would be no question regarding the power and authority of this committee; or, at any rate, it was a subject that could be considered by the committee. I won't say that the Chairman expressed any final conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not do so.

Senator BREWSTER. I share the opinion of both the Representative from Wisconsin and the Chair that we ought to deliberate on this matter carefully, and with regard for Mr. Grew and his rights and interests, and for the high public interest involved.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot pass on something that isn't before him and which has not been read, and the nature of which he does not know.

The Chair might express a sort of ex cathedra opinion that Mr. Grew took pretty good care of himself in his answers to these questions about his diary, and the Chair thinks he [2012] is capable of doing that not only on that subject, but on most any subject about which he might be interrogated.

But the Chair would certainly wish to discourage any discussion as to the legal power of this committee to summons Mr. Grew to bring his diary, or any other witness to bring his diary, his private property, before this committee without considering the legal aspects of it after a discussion in executive session. That is the Chair's view.

Senator BREWSTER. Will the Senator yield?

Senator LUCAS. If the Chair does not want me to proceed with this memorandum I shall not do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not expressing any objection to that. There is this one thing we might keep in mind. The newspapers every day in reporting these proceedings, I have discovered, are not always accurate, and the temptation is constant to say something here that would refute some impression of a newspaper reporter about what the witnesses have said.

Senator LUCAS. I find there is a temptation also around this table to suggest certain things that do make headlines.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, there is no way to control that.

Senator LUCAS. No; there is not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Grew has a short statement of his own views, a one-page statement that he [2013] would like to read in supplementing his reasons already given for not producing the diary. I think it fair that he be given an opportunity to read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have him do that at the conclusion of his testimony. I wouldn't want it to interfere with the questioning.

Senator LUCAS. I do not propose to ask Mr. Grew any further questions and I will defer the reading of this statement until Mr. Grew gives to the committee what he has with respect to his personal diary. It may be that it coincides with what I have here, but I doubt that it does.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Does any member wish to ask any further questions?

Mr. KEEFE. I have one question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Grew, in connection with the examination by Senator Ferguson, reference was made to a telegram which you may or may not have received with respect to the destruction of the code material in the Embassy and certain other documents.

In that telegram it was suggested that when this destruction was undertaken, that it be witnessed by two witnesses who would place in affidavit form the fact of the destruction.

Now, whether under your direction or the direction of [2014] some other official of the Embassy, certain code material was destroyed at some time, and I assume that it was customary for an affidavit to be filed, and you were asked about that affidavit and I believe you stated that you do not have the affidavit but that you will search the records of the State Department to see if they are to be found; is that right?

Mr. GREW. That is correct, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. KEEFE. I want counsel to understand that we are requesting that those affidavits be presented.¹

Now, do you know a man by the name of Lawrence Salisbury? I believe you referred to him, or some witness did, in testimony here.

Mr. GREW. Yes, I know him.

Mr. KEEFE. Didn't he occupy a position in the State Department?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. He was formerly in the Office of Far Eastern Affairs. He has been in our foreign service for many years.

Mr. KEEFE. He retired or resigned about a year ago?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

Mr. KEEFE. Were you in the State Department at the time he left the service?

Mr. GREW. I was technically in the State Department. I [2015] may have been out in the field somewhere because I was moving around a great deal.

Mr. KEEFE. I don't mean whether you were physically there.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. Technically, I was in the State Department.

Mr. KEEFE. In what capacity were you acting at the time he left?

Mr. GREW. I don't recollect the exact status; I don't know whether I had then become Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs, or whether Mr. Salisbury's retirement took place prior to that date. I will have to check the dates.

Mr. KEEFE. Do you recall that prior to Mr. Salisbury's retirement, he wrote and delivered to the State Department a document of about 40 pages stating the reasons for his resignation and leaving the State Department?

Mr. GREW. I don't recollect that document now, Congressman. I should have to check the records.

Mr. KEEFE. May I ask counsel then to undertake a search of the records of the State Department in an effort to find what I am very definitely and reliably advised was about a 40-page statement prepared by Mr. Lawrence Salisbury and filed with Secretary Hull shortly prior to the time that he (Salisbury) retired from the State Department. Whoever [2016] undertakes it, I don't care whether it is Mr. Grew or counsel.

Mr. GESELL. We will undertake it. Do you have the date of the resignation?

Mr. KEEFE. I don't have the exact date, but it was some time during 1944. I do not have the exact date he left.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

Mr. KEEFE. Now, I asked you yesterday, Mr. Grew, with respect to the proposal that was submitted by the Japanese Foreign Minister in 1939, and about which Senator Ferguson had likewise inquired into, wherein a proposal was submitted to the President and our State Department for an over-all review of the world situation just prior to the outbreak of war in Europe. Do I understand a search is being made for that document?

Mr. GREW. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. You have not yet discovered it?

Mr. GREW. Not yet found it.

Mr. KEEFE. You were familiar with the instrument that I am requesting and that Senator Ferguson has requested?

Mr. GREW. Familiar with what?

Mr. KEEFE. You are familiar that there was such an incident?

[2017] Mr. GREW. Oh, yes, I am.

Mr. KEEFE. I understood you to say during my examination of you yesterday you are not certain that you were at the Embassy at that time, or whether Mr. Dooman was there.

Mr. GREW. That is correct. I should like to look up the record on that before I make a categorical statement.

Mr. KEEFE. You have not refreshed your recollection since yesterday on that point?

Mr. GREW. I have not had an opportunity as yet.

Mr. KEEFE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

Mr. KEEFE. That is all.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Gearhart?

Mr. GEARHART. There are one or two points that I would like to better understand.

Mr. GREW, do you remember vividly the receipt of the telegram instructing the Embassy to destroy its codes?

Mr. GREW. Congressman, I think I have already stated that I have no recollection of having received that telegram. I am not sure whether it ever came or not.

Mr. GEARHART. You have since verified that such a telegram was received?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. A copy has been found and placed [2018] in the hands of general counsel.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. "Received" or "sent"?

Mr. GEARHART. You have verified that such a telegram was sent.

Mr. GREW. Yes.

Mr. GEARHART. After reading that telegram which was sent, the copy, does that bring back to your mind anything?

Mr. GREW. Not at this moment, no.

Mr. GEARHART. You can't even remember that any code machines or codes were destroyed; is that correct?

Mr. GREW. I have already stated, Congressman, that it is my impression that several of our codes were destroyed at about that time. I cannot give you the definite date because I don't recollect it. As you know a great many things were happening at that time of a political nature. And, frankly, the act of destroying the codes would not have lain with me. It would have lain with the subordinate officers, presumably the counselor at the Embassy. I would have to look up the whole episode and find out just how it was done and when, and by whom, in order to give a clear report on it.

Mr. GEARHART. I take it you can't remember at this date whether the codes were destroyed on your order or upon the order of a subordinate?

[2019] Mr. GREW. They were certainly destroyed on my order. They were destroyed on my order.

Mr. GEARHART. You are sure of that?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; I am sure of that. As I say, I cannot give you the dates without looking them up.

Mr. GEARHART. Can you remember the incident?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir; certainly I remember the incident.

Mr. GEARHART. Why did you order them destroyed if you didn't have a message from Washington.

Mr. GREW. Congressman, things were coming to a stage at that time where I realized fully it was wise to take precautions, but before stating exactly why that order was given, I would like to check up on the actual time, which is of great importance, and without looking up those records, I don't feel that my testimony would be very helpful.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, at that time, and during that period, the tension was running pretty high; there was a good deal of suppressed excitement in the Embassy?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. Tension was high.

Mr. GEARHART. And do you mean to tell us that you are not clear as why you destroyed code machines. That is an unusual thing in an Embassy, is it not?

Mr. GREW. I have made no such statement, I believe, Mr. Congressman. The codes, when they were destroyed, were destroyed in view of the tenseness of the situation.

[2020] Mr. GESELL. Congressman Gearhart, I think I can throw some light on this which will be helpful.

Mr. GEARHART. I am really exploring the condition of mind of the Ambassador. I am wondering how they could do such an out-of-the-usual thing as to destroy code machines and his not being able to remember vividly what transpired.

Mr. GESELL. I think we have the partial answer.

Mr. GEARHART. I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. GESELL. There is a naval dispatch, which we had proposed to introduce at the time Admiral Wilkinson takes the stand, dated December 4, 1941, from the Chief of Naval Operations to the naval attaché at Tokyo, Bangkok, Peiping, and Shanghai, for the information of the commander in chief of the Asiatic Fleet and the naval attaché at Chungking and the commander of the Sixteenth Naval District. That is dated December 4, 1941, and reads as follows:

Destroy this system at discretion and report by word "Jabberwock" Destroy all registered publications except CSP 1085 and 6 and 1007 and 1008 and this system and report execution by sending in plain language "boomerang".

That suggests that on December 4, the Chief of Naval Operations is sending instructions to the naval attaché at Tokyo—instructions to destroy certain codes.

[2021] I thought that might be helpful.

Mr. GEARHART. Would instructions to your naval attaché or your military attaché to destroy codes result in their destruction without an order from you?

Mr. GREW. Yes, Congressman, I would have nothing to do with the decision of the military or naval attachés to destroy their own codes. That lay entirely with them.

Mr. GEARHART. In view of what has been read by counsel, are you still sure that the destruction of the codes which occurred in the Embassy was done under your order?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. The codes could not have been destroyed without my instructions. There would be no question about that.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, do you remember whether or not you were making destructions and the naval attaché was making destructions simultaneously?

Mr. GREW. I cannot recollect the actual instance, that was a long time ago, and, as I say, a great many things have happened since then, and I was exceedingly occupied at that moment with very large affairs of a political nature. I cannot recollect at just what moment the codes were destroyed or which codes were destroyed.

As I say, I would have to look it up before I could give a categorical answer.

[2022] Mr. GEARHART. Now, you had at that time a large battery of files in the office of the Embassy?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, we did.

Mr. GEARHART. Those files contained a lot of information which would have been very valuable to the enemy if they had been able to seize them?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

Mr. GEARHART. Did you take any steps to destroy the secret files of the Embassy at about the same time?

Mr. GREW. Those secret files of the Embassy were destroyed, as I recollect it, immediately after the word came that Pearl Harbor had been attacked. We had those files in such a situation that they could be destroyed in a very few minutes and that step was taken, as I recollect it, immediately after the announcement of Pearl Harbor.

Mr. GEARHART. Then so far as you now recall you never received any directions from any source to destroy your highly secret files prior to the actual bombing of Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GREW. I should like to have a search made before I give a categorical answer and I shall have the files in the State Department examined in order to be able to give an answer on that point.

Mr. GEARHART. I will now ask you, did you accomplish the complete destruction of all secret papers and codes before the [2023] Japanese came into the Embassy?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, we did.

Mr. GEARHART. And the Japanese obtained no information of value to them from our secret files after war was declared?

Mr. GREW. None whatsoever.

Mr. GEARHART. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman would like to ask you a question to clear up a point.

These codes, these diplomatic codes and messages, were entirely separate from any naval or military messages or codes between the Navy Department and the naval attaché and the War Department and the military attaché?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And the State Department and you?

Mr. GREW. That is a fact. The naval attaché and the military attaché had offices in what we called our Chancellery Building. They kept their own files and their own codes separate and apart from ours.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, when you came back in August 1942 you made this report to Secretary Hull and in that report I presume you canvassed pretty much the ground, the events, that had transpired immediately prior to your capture by the Japanese. You had no communication with the Secretary directly while you were in captivity?

[2024] Mr. GREW. None whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. So, when you got back in August 1942 the natural thing for you to do was to report to the Secretary and go over with him any pertinent things that occurred in regard not only to events leading up to Pearl Harbor but what had happened after Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GREW. That is a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you go to Tokyo first?

Mr. GREW. You mean officially?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GREW. Officially I arrived in Tokyo June 6, 1932.

The CHAIRMAN. Who was Secretary of State at that time?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Stimson.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall who was Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. GREW. Charles Adams. Charles Francis Adams.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall who was Secretary of War? Was it Mr. Hurley?

Mr. GREW. Mr. Patrick Hurley.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you familiar with the Manchurian incident? Did you become familiar with it?

Mr. GREW. I was familiar with it after the event. The Manchurian incident occurred in September 1931. I arrived some 6 months later.

[2025] The CHAIRMAN. What post did you occupy immediately prior to your assignment to Tokyo?

Mr. GREW. I was Ambassador to Turkey, to the Turkish Republic, for 5 years prior to that period.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you know whether at the time of your arrival in Tokyo in June 1932 or thereafter the Navy of the United States was in Hawaiian waters not in any way connected with the Manchurian incident?

Mr. GREW. No, sir. Frankly, I cannot recollect whether the Navy was there then or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to read a couple of pages from the book that Mr. Stimson published shortly after his retirement as Secretary of State in regard to that to see whether that will refresh your recollection. The pages are 137 and 138 of Mr. Stimson's book called The Far Eastern Crisis, under heading, "The American Fleet at Hawaii" [reading]:

Under plans which had been made and published the preceding summer, long before the outbreak of the trouble in Manchuria, the American navy had been ordered to hold its annual maneuvers in the Pacific between the California coast and the Hawaiian Islands. The prosecution of these maneuvers brought the fleet in natural course to Hawaii. Soon after the outbreak in [2026] Manchuria we discussed whether the plans should be changed, but decided that, in view of the fact that it was so well known that they had not originated as a threat to Japan, the maneuvers would be allowed to continue. Thereafter, just when the Japanese were making their attack on Shanghai, the American fleet in the course of these maneuvers came to Hawaii on February 15th—that is 1932.

After further careful consideration it was allowed to remain in that neighborhood and was not dispersed or sent back to the Atlantic on the conclusion of the maneuvers. During the tumultuous and uncertain times which followed we were glad of that decision. With events showing that the Japanese government was falling completely into the control of militaristic leaders, backed by a populace inflamed to a state of fanatical excitement by the events which had occurred, it was impossible to tell what coup might not be attempted. During that winter responsible foreign observers stationed in the Far East were informing their respective governments that in their opinion there was a real possibility of a Japanese attack being suddenly launched at the possessions of European and American governments in the neighborhood. In such a situation the presence of the entire American fleet assembled at [2027] a port which placed it on the flank of any such outbreak southward towards Hong Kong, French Indo-China or the Philippines, undoubtedly exercised a steadying effect. It was a potent reminder of the ultimate military strength of peaceful America which could not be overlooked by anyone, however excited he might be.

Does that passage from Mr. Stimson's book refresh your recollection in any way as to the presence of the fleet out in the Hawaiian waters?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir. Well, it refreshes my memory with regard to those maneuvers. Can you tell me when those maneuvers took place? I have forgotten the precise date.

The CHAIRMAN. Apparently the maneuvers took place prior to February 1932.

Mr. GREW. Prior.

The CHAIRMAN. Because this passage from Mr. Stimson's book recites the fact that the fleet appeared in Hawaii on the 13th of February, 1932, but it states that the plan for the maneuvers had been agreed to prior even to the Manchurian outbreak or the invasion of Manchuria in 1931 by Japan. That was in 1931, was it not?

Mr. GREW. Yes, that was in September 1931. That all happened before I arrived at my post.

The CHAIRMAN. It happened before you arrived there but [2028] I was wondering after you arrived whether you became acquainted with the fact that the fleet was in Hawaiian waters and remained there, according to Mr. Stimson's statement here in his book, on account of the outbreak in Manchuria and the general feeling that Japan might attack the territory of European and American Governments in that part of the world.

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, I do recollect that.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, just one question about the destruction of the codes. In view of your long experience in the diplomatic service I would like to ask you whether there would be anything unusual about the destruction of codes that might exist in an embassy under circumstances that might bring about at any time an imminent breach between governments and might even result in hostilities?

Mr. GREW. Yes, Mr. Chairman, the destruction of the codes would take place only under a very tense situation.

The CHAIRMAN. It would take place as a matter of precaution?

Mr. GREW. As a matter of precaution.

The CHAIRMAN. And would it necessarily require any instructions from the State Department in a case like that, if the Ambassador representing the country felt that the situation had arrived at a critical state so that it might result in the breach of diplomatic relations or even hostili- [2029] ties? As a matter of precaution would he not do that anyway?

Mr. GREW. I think in a situation of that kind the responsibility would lie entirely with the Ambassador to do that on his own initiative.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. In your testimony the other day you stated that you did not receive information with respect to these intercepts that the American Government were making of Japanese messages to Washington?

Mr. GREW. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair understood you to say that it would have been indiscreet if you had been notified of that fact because if the Japanese were intercepting our messages or were in any way advised of the intercepting by our Government of their messages, it might have resulted in their changing their code so that we could no longer get the information which the messages were conveying. Is the Chair correct in that?

Mr. GREW. I am not sure that I made that precise statement but I entirely agree with it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair got the impression from what you said that it would have been indiscreet on the part of the State Department to have advised you at that time of the intercepting of these Japanese messages.

Mr. GREW. I think that is true.

[2030] The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I just have a few questions owing to the Chairman's question.

Was there any other means of getting to you this information than by wire? Weren't there personal messengers coming back and forth?

Mr. GREW. We received regular pouches from the State Department which arrived every fortnight. They came out by American vessels, American ships, but the material in those pouches was, of course, very old, sometimes as old as 3 or 4 weeks, so we depended a great deal on telegrams.

Senator FERGUSON. They did not pass through any Japanese hands so that that would have been a secret means.

Mr. GREW. They passed through no Japanese hands. They were taken charge of by the captain of the ship, an American. They were turned over to an American officer on arrival of the ship in Yokohama and brought up to our Embassy.

Senator FERGUSON. I spoke to you this morning that I thought that the message that I had in mind in relation to the route of shipping was on the 25th of November 1941. I have before me now the message that I did have in mind and I read it to you [reading]:

25 NOVEMBER 1941.

[2031] From: OPNAV.

Action: COM 12.

Info: CINCPAC, CINCAF, COM 14, COM 16.

252203

Route all transpacific shipping thru Torres Straits. CINPAC and CINCAF provide necessary escort. Refer your dispatch 230258.

There were two messages on that. And would you look up and see whether or not you ever received that information on the 25th of November 1941?

Mr. GREW. I will look into that, sir, yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to ask counsel when he received this 4th of December 1941 [reading]:

Destroy this system at discretion and report by word jabberwock. Destroy all registered publications except CSP 1986 and 6 and 1997 and 1998 and this system and report execution by sending in plain language "Boomerang".

How long has counsel had this in his possession?

Mr. GESELL. We have had it only a short time. We received it, as I recall it, about a week ago and immediately sent it back to the Navy Department to be mimeographed for distribution to all members of the committee. It is in a [2032] detailed folder that we received this morning while the hearing was in session, that has got the compendium of Navy messages, so we have been making them up and we will distribute them to the committee as soon as we have copies.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, can counsel explain whether or not he knew of this message last night, when I was asking Mr. Grew these questions?

Mr. GESELL. No; I did not know about that then.

Senator FERGUSON. Counsel had no knowledge of it, then, at that time?

Mr. GESELL. No.

Senator FERGUSON. He had knowledge, however, when I was asking Mr. Grew these questions this morning?

Mr. GREW. I did not get that question.

Senator FERGUSON. I asked counsel if he had this. I asked counsel if he had this at the time I asked Mr. Grew these questions.

Mr. GESELL. No; we did not have any knowledge of that message and I have no recollection of it, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. This morning I mean, when I asked Mr. Grew the question. Is there any reason why counsel did not call it to my attention so that we could have the record and not take the time up with the witness?

Mr. GESELL. Well, I think there is a reason, Senator.

[2033] Senator FERGUSON. What is the reason?

Mr. GESELL. The reason is, as I stated, this mimeographed publication did not come to my hands until the hearing was in progress and I did not have it placed before me to bring to the committee's attention until after you had finished your examination.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I want to assure counsel I will appreciate the cooperation, if he has any information when I am questioning a witness, that if he has it it may save considerable time.

Mr. GESELL. We have endeavored to do that from the start.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Gearhart.

Mr. GEARHART. My curiosity is still with me.

In the Japanese intercepts which directed the Washington Japanese Embassy to destroy their codes, they also directed the Japanese at the Embassy to use certain acids which they already had on hand. That suggests to me that the matter of destroying codes might be a somewhat intricate matter.

Did we use acids in the destruction of our codes and code machines in Japan?

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield before the question [2034] is answered?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Congressman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. I just cannot see, Mr. Chairman, why we should reveal how we destroy our codes and how we could consider spreading that on the public records, or how it would help the inquiry. It may be that there is an excellent reason but I do not think that the satisfaction of curiosity is enough. I don't mean to be impertinent.

Mr. GEARHART. I assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have a very excellent reason. It has to do with the credibility of the witness and the fitness of his memory on a very, very important affair.

I am asking the question if it is an intricate process to destroy codes and code machines, or is it a matter as simple as the word suggests to an ordinary person's mind, of using an axe and chipping them up?

Mr. GREW. My answer to that question, Mr. Congressman, would be that in the case of certain codes it would be a very simple matter. In the case of other codes it would be an intricate matter.

Mr. GEARHART. Did we have some of each type of codes in our Embassy at Tokyo?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir.

[2035] Mr. GEARHART. Then it was not a simple matter to destroy all of our code and code machines?

Mr. GREW. I cannot tell you, Mr. Gearhart, just how intricate that process was or would be, or how long it took or would take. Frankly, I had a good many duties in the Embassy and the mechanics of our coding was one matter in which I had not gone into in technical detail. I am not in a position, really, to give you very much information on that general subject.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, isn't the matter of the destruction of codes and code machines of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the Ambassador, especially when he is called upon to supply affidavits that the result had been achieved?

Mr. GREW. I have already stated, Mr. Congressman, those codes would not have been destroyed without my instructions without any question; and as to the affidavits, in all probability they were contained in the papers that I brought home to the State Department and a search will be instituted for this and we will see if we can find them. We probably can.

Mr. GEARHART. Didn't the suggestion that the codes and the code machines should be destroyed immediately create in your mind the idea that hostilities were imminent?

[2036] Mr. GREW. As I have already stated, Mr. Congressman, a step of that kind would only be taken in a very tense situation, but I also say that I am not at the present moment in a position to tell you the precise day and time at which that step was taken. I should like to look it up before I give you any further information on it.

Mr. GEARHART. I subside until we can have further information upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

Senator LUCAS. What would have happened to you, Mr. Grew, had you not taken the necessary reasonable precautions that you should have taken as Ambassador with respect to those codes?

Mr. GREW. They might well have fallen into Japanese hands. I think it would have been quite possible that they might have done something with them.

Senator LUCAS. Supposing you had done nothing and they had fallen into the hands of the Japanese: Then when you returned to this country what would have been your status down in the State Department?

Mr. GREW. Well, it would have caused a ferment. If those codes had fallen into their hands, why those codes would have to be abandoned and new codes substituted, which [2037] would have been a very expensive and complicated matter.

Senator LUCAS. What would have been your position with the State Department in view of the fact that you failed to carry out those particular destructions in view of the tense situation that you described?

Mr. GREW. I think it would have been a very embarrassing situation, a very embarrassing position.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

Senator LUCAS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Cooper?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire briefly in an effort to be clear on a point, Mr. Grew, with respect to the message of November 26, 1941 from the State Department to Japan.

Am I correct in my understanding of your statement that that message of November 26, 1941, from the United States Department of State to Japan was not carried in any of the Japanese press?

Mr. GREW. It was not carried in any of the Japanese press. It was not allowed to be carried. And, as I said to the committee, one paper, as I recollect it, one paper published the document after Pearl Harbor and that paper was promptly confiscated. Whether the document was ever published completely and freely, that I do not know.

[2038] The VICE CHAIRMAN. But am I also correct in understanding you to say that the impression was conveyed to the Japanese people that an ultimatum had been received from the United States to Japan?

Mr. GREW. Yes, sir, definitely.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Although the message itself was not an ultimatum, the Japanese officials in charge of the Government at that time sought to convey the information to the Japanese people that it was an ultimatum?

Mr. GREW. That is true, and in the case of one prominent Japanese, a very prominent Japanese, after I had told him the contents of the memorandum he said that if that were so, as I had related, he felt that the Japanese people if they knew those facts would be very much opposed to an intransigent attitude on the part of their Government.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The chair understands Mr. Grew has a statement he wishes to read. Go ahead, Mr. Ambassador.

Mr. GREW. Mr. Chairman, as the question of the diary has been considerably discussed in the committee and possibly as being helpful to the committee in considering the question in executive session, I would like to submit one further point.

In these hearings the question of the submission of my [2039] diary kept in Japan has been raised. In my letter of November 12 to the general counsel certain reasons why, in my opinion, the diary should properly be regarded and treated as a purely private document were set forth. I believe those reasons to be controlling. I should like, however, now to advance another reason for taking this position, a reason which I do not believe can be open to question.

American diplomatic officers abroad, as in the case of diplomatic officers of other countries, depend in considerable measure among their sources of intelligence upon those foreign diplomatic colleagues with whom they have been able to establish relations of mutual confidence. This is not always easy to do, but once done, the trust must be mutual and complete. The result of such a relationship is often of the highest value to our national interests. It was of special value in Japan where friendly Japanese were in general prevented by the secret police from imparting information of any character to foreigners.

My diary, kept during my years in Japan, as probably is the case with every diary kept by any diplomatic officer, contains the records of many talks with foreign diplomatic colleagues, sometimes of a nature the confidential character of which I am in honor bound to respect. In most cases these records are interwoven with the comments in my diary and [2040] could not be separated therefrom. To reveal these records would not only place me in a position to which, I respectfully submit, no former American ambassador ought ever to be subjected, but would inevitably place all American representatives abroad in an invidious situation in establishing their own future contacts on a basis of mutual trust. I could not willingly subject our future representation abroad to the prejudice that would surely arise from the revelation of these private records.

I cannot believe that the American people would wish their representatives abroad to be placed in such a position, or that they would wish one of their former representatives to compromise on what, to him, is clearly and unquestionably a point of honor.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will undoubtedly give consideration to that statement.

The Chair, on behalf of the committee, wishes to thank you for your appearance here and for your obvious frank effort to give it all the information that you possess in this inquiry and the committee is under great obligations to you for your appearance and willingness to testify. Thank you very much.

Mr. GREW. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like to express on my part my full appreciation of the courtesy and [2041] patience of the committee in listening to me during these last several days. I thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The patience is mutual.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the Ambassador and in deference to the wishes of the distinguished chairman of this committee, I shall refrain at this time from making the statement that I informed the committee I would make.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. We will proceed, gentlemen, with another witness.

[2042] Mr. GESELL. Before calling the next witness, Mr. Chairman, we think we should read into the record two documents among those submitted in exhibit 18, because of their direct pertinence to matters which were considered by the committee during its examination of Mr. Grew.

These documents in exhibit 18 relate to the modus vivendi.

The first is the message to Lauchlin Currie from Lattimore, at Chungking under date of November 25, 1941, and it reads as follows:

After discussing with the Generalissimo the Chinese Ambassador's conference with the Secretary of State, I feel you should urgently advise the President of the Generalissimo's very strong reaction. I have never seen him really agitated before. Loosening of economic pressure or unfreezing would dangerously increase Japan's military advantage in China. A relaxation of American pressure while Japan has its forces in China would dismay the Chinese. Any "Modus Vivendi" now arrived at with China would be disastrous to Chinese belief in America and analogous to the closing of the Burma Road, which permanently destroyed British prestige. Japan and Chinese defeatists would instantly exploit the resulting disillusionment and urge oriental solidarity against occidental treachery. It is doubtful whether either [2043] past assistance or increasing aid could compensate for the feeling of being deserted at this hour. The Generalissimo has deep confidence in the President's fidelity to his consistent policy but I must warn you that even the Generalissimo questions his ability to hold the situation together if the Chinese national trust in America is undermined by reports of Japan's escaping military defeat by diplomatic victory.

The other is a message of the same date, transmitted to Secretary Stimson by Mr. T. V. Soong under cover of a letter dated November 25 which was obtained both from the War Department and State Department files.

Mr. KEEFE. May I ask counsel if those messages are included in Exhibit 18?

Mr. GESELL. They are.

Mr. KEEFE. It is part of Exhibit 18 that you are now reading for the record?

Mr. GESELL. That is correct.

Telegram from General Chiang Kai Shek to Dr. T. V. Soong dated Chungking, November 25, 1941.

I presume Ambassador Hu Shih has given you a copy of my telegram yesterday. Please convey contents of the message to Secretaries Knox and Stimson immediately.

Please explain to them the gravity of the situation. [2044] If America should relax the economic blockade and freezing of Japanese assets, or even if reports that the United States is considering this should gain currency, the morale of our troops will be sorely shaken. During the past two months the Japanese propaganda have spread the belief that in November an agreement will be successfully reached with the United States. They have even come to a silent but none the less definite understanding with the doubtful elements in our country. If, therefore, there is any relaxation of the embargo or freezing regulations, or if a belief of that gains ground, then the Chinese people would consider that China has been completely sacrificed by the United States. The morale of the entire people will collapse and every Asiatic nation will lose faith, and indeed suffer such a shock in their faith in democracy that a most tragic epoch in the world will be opened. The Chinese army will collapse, and the Japanese will be enabled to carry through their plans, so that even if in the future America would come to our rescue the situation would be already hopeless. Such a loss would not be to China alone.

We could therefore only request the United States Government to be uncompromising, and announce that if the withdrawal of Japanese armies from China is not settled, the question of relaxing of the embargo or freezing could [2045] not be considered. If, on the other hand, the American attitude remains nebulous Japanese propaganda will daily perform its fell purpose so that at no cost to them this propaganda will effect the breakdown of our resistance. Our more than four years of struggle with the loss of countless lives and sacrifices and devastation unparalleled in history would have been in vain. The certain collapse of our resistance will be an unparalleled catastrophe to the world, and I do not indeed know how history in the future will record this episode.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Gearhart.

Mr. GEARHART. May I request counsel to have the records of the State Department searched to see whether or not any instructions were sent to the American consuls in Japan during the last one-third of November, and first 7 days of December 1941, directing the destruction or disposition of codes and code machines and secret papers?

Mr. GESELL. We will do that, Mr. Congressman.¹

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. So the record will be clear, as I understand it, counsel now has the Army message to the attaché and will produce it sometime later, so we may put it [2046] in as part of Mr. Grew's testimony where I have asked about the Army?

Mr. GESELL. The army is getting it and we will produce it Senator.*

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could it appear in the record at the time I was questioning Mr. Grew, so as to make the record clear?

The CHAIRMAN. The reporter will transpose this at the proper place. That record has already gone to the transcription stage and may have been typewritten by now, but the reporter will make an effort to put it in the place where the Senator asked it to go.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY. At the time I asked for the paper under discussion, the Chairman said it was his impression that it was already in the record. I want to make the statement that the paper of August 17, on which the Senator from Michigan was questioning, is separate and distinct from the one to which I refer. In other words, in one volume of Foreign Relations there is one outlined on page 554, one on page 556 and one on page 557, all on the same date. I want to make certain that the one on page 557 is copied into the record.

[2047] The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection. In fact, I would like to have it copied into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the unanimous view of the committee that that ought to be done.

(The matter referred to follows:)

[2048] STATEMENT HANDED BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT TO THE JAPANESE AMBASSADOR (NOMURA) ON AUGUST 17, 1941

Reference is made to the question which the Japanese Ambassador raised on August 8 during a conversation with the Secretary of State whether it might not be possible for the responsible heads of the Japanese Government and the Government of the United States to meet with a view to discussing means whereby an adjustment in relations between the United States and Japan might be brought about. The thought of Prince Konoe and of the Japanese Government in offering this suggestion is appreciated.

Reference is made also to the desire expressed by the Japanese Ambassador during a call on the Secretary of State on August 16 that there be resumed the informal conversations which had been in progress between the two Governments toward ascertaining whether there existed a basis for negotiations relative to a peaceful settlement covering the entire Pacific situation.

* Subsequently admitted as Exhibit No. 38. See p. 841, infra.

When the Japanese Ambassador brought up these suggestions, the Secretary of State reminded the Ambassador that the Government of the United States had shown great patience and had been prepared to continue in that course of patience so long as the Japanese Government manifested a desire to follow courses of peace. It was pointed out to the Ambassador that while proceeding along this course this Government had [2049] received reports indicating clearly that the Japanese Government was adopting courses directly the opposite of those on which the recent conversations between the Ambassador and the Secretary of State had been predicated. It was pointed out also that the Japanese press was being constantly stimulated to speak of encirclement of Japan by the United States and was being officially inspired in ways calculated to inflame public opinion. The Secretary of State made it clear that he did not see how conversations between the two Governments could usefully be pursued or proposals be discussed while Japanese official spokesmen and the Japanese press contended that the United States was endeavoring to encircle Japan and carried on a campaign against the United States.

On two occasions officers of the Department of State, pursuant to instructions from the Secretary of State, called on the Japanese Ambassador to indicate concern over the reports that Japan intended to acquire by force or threat of force military and naval bases in French Indochina. Subsequently, on July 21 and July 23 the Acting Secretary of State raised with the Japanese Minister and with the Japanese Ambassador the question of Japan's intentions with regard to French Indochina and pointed out that the Government of the United States could only assume that the occupation by Japan of French Indochina or the acquisition of military and naval [2050] bases in that area constituted notice to the United States that Japan had taken by forceful means a step preparatory to embarking on further movements of conquest in the South Pacific area. The Acting Secretary pointed out further that this new move on Japan's part was prejudicial to the procurement by the United States of essential raw materials and to the peace of the Pacific, including the Philippine Islands.

The Government of the United States accordingly had no alternative but to inform the Japanese Ambassador that, in the opinion of this Government, the measures then being taken by the Japanese Government had served to remove the basis for further conversations relative to a peaceful settlement in the Pacific area.

Informal discussions between the Japanese Government and the Government of the United States directed toward ascertaining whether there existed a basis for negotiations relative to a peaceful settlement covering the entire Pacific situation would naturally envisage the working out of a progressive program attainable by peaceful methods. It goes without saying that no proposals or suggestions affecting the rights and privileges of either the United States or Japan would be considered except as they might be in conformity with the basic principles to which the United States has long been committed. The program envisaged in such informal discussions would involve the application in the entire Pacific area of [2051] the principle of equality of commercial opportunity and treatment. It would thus make possible access by all countries to raw materials and to all other essential commodities. Such a program would envisage cooperation by all nations of the Pacific on a voluntary and peaceful basis toward utilizing all available resources of capital, technical skill, and progressive economic leadership for the purpose of building up not only their own economies but also the economies of regions where productive capacity can be improved. The result would be to increase the purchasing power of the nations and peoples concerned, to raise standards of living, and to create conditions conducive to the maintenance of peace. If such a program based upon peaceable and constructive principles were to be adopted for the Pacific and if thereafter any of the countries or areas within the Pacific were menaced, the policy of aiding nations resisting aggression would continue to be followed by this Government and this Government would cooperate with other nations in extending assistance to any country threatened.

Under such a program for the Pacific area Japan would, in the opinion of the Government of the United States, attain all the objectives which Japan affirms that it is seeking. This program would not enable any country to extend its military or political control over other peoples or to obtain economic rights of a definitely monopolistic or preferential [2052] character. In those cases where the production and distribution of essential commodities are vested in monopolies, the Government of the United States would expect to use its influence to see that all countries are given a fair share of the distribution of the products of such monopolies and at a fair price.

If the Japanese Government is seeking what it affirms to be its objectives, the Government of the United States feels that the program above outlined is one that can be counted upon to assure Japan satisfaction of its economic needs and legitimate aspirations with much greater certainty than could any other program.

In case the Japanese Government feels that Japan desires and is in position to suspend its expansionist activities, to readjust its position, and to embark upon a peaceful program for the Pacific along the lines of the program and principles to which the United States is committed, the Government of the United States would be prepared to consider resumption of the informal exploratory discussions which were interrupted in July and would be glad to endeavor to arrange a suitable time and place to exchange views. The Government of the United States, however, feels that, in view of the circumstances attending the interruption of the informal conversations between the two Governments, it would be helpful to both Governments, before undertaking a resumption of such conversations or proceeding [2053] with plans for a meeting if the Japanese Government would be so good as to furnish a clearer statement than has yet been furnished as to its present attitude and plans, just as this Government has repeatedly outlined to the Japanese Government its attitude and plans.

[2054] The CHAIRMAN. Will counsel go ahead now?

Mr. GESELL. We would like to call as the next witness, General Miles.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES, UNITED STATES ARMY¹

(The witness having been first duly sworn by the chairman.)

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel will proceed.

Mr. GESELL. General, will you state for the record your full name and your present rank, and duty, please, sir?

General MILES. Sherman Miles, major general, Army of the United States; stationed in Boston, Mass.

Mr. GESELL. You were head of G-2, were you, General, on December 7, 1941?

General MILES. I was, sir.

Mr. GESELL. How long have you had that duty?

General MILES. I reported on May 1, 1940.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the counsel permit the Chair, for the purpose of identification, to ask General Miles if he is the son of Gen. Nelson A. Miles, who was head of the United States Army.

General MILES. I am, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think counsel might also, for the benefit of the record, show what "G-2" is.

Mr. GESELL. That was my next question.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I beg your pardon.

[2055] Mr. GESELL. What, in a general way, would you say are the duties and the functions of G-2?

General MILES. The Military Intelligence Division of the General Staff is charged with the collection, analysis, estimation, dissemination of information primarily for the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War.

G-2 is a staff officer of the Chief of Staff, an assistant chief of staff for intelligence.

Mr. GESELL. G-2 is another name for Military Intelligence Division, is that correct?

¹ See p. 2486 infra, for suggested corrections in his testimony submitted by General Miles.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, prior to assuming your duties as G-2, what had been your military experience, as far as the Far East was concerned? Had you had duty in the Far East or any particular contact with far eastern matters?

General MILES. No, sir, I had never had duty in the Far East.

Mr. GESELL. Had you ever had duty in Hawaii?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What was the nature of that duty?

General MILES. I was G-3, operations officer of the Hawaiian Department, from April 1929 until May 1932.

Mr. GESELL. And who was your commanding officer during that time at Hawaii?

[2056] General MILES. I had four commanding generals during my service as G-3 in Hawaii: Gen. Fox Connor, General Wyant, General Lassiter, and General Wells.

[2057] Mr. GESELL. Now during the entire time you were there you were G-3, operations, is that correct?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Generally, what was the nature of that duty?

General MILES. I had supervision over all war plans and defense projects of the Hawaiian Department. I was the staff officer in general charge of training, I prepared maneuvers, exercises of all kinds for the commanding general.

Mr. GESELL. Had you ever had any war plans duty in the General Staff here at Washington?

General MILES. Not before going to Hawaii.

Mr. GESELL. Subsequent to that time did you have such duty, and if so, what was it?

General MILES. I did, sir. I served 4 years on the War Plans Division of the General Staff, from June 1934 to June 1938.

Mr. GESELL. In what capacity?

General MILES. I was the head of the Plans and Projects Section of the War Plans Division and as such had supervision over war plans and defense projects of the three overseas departments, Philippine, Panama, and Hawaii.

Mr. GESELL. How long have you been in the military service, General?

General MILES. I entered the military service in June, [2058] 1901, as a cadet.

Mr. GESELL. When did your responsibilities as G-2 cease?

General MILES. I was relieved of G-2 the 30th, I think, of January, 1942.

Mr. GESELL. Now, if the committee please, before proceeding with the examination of General Miles, we would like to offer for the record two basic exhibits which will be the subject of consideration as the examination proceeds.

The first, to be designated as exhibit 32, is entitled "Messages Between War Department and Hawaii from July 8 to December 7, 1941."

I would like to explain to the committee that these messages are, of course, all in the nature of radio dispatches, and primarily we have assembled these messages of a warning character or of an alert character. We believe this is a fairly complete compilation of such messages.

Mr. GEARHART. What is the date?

Mr. GESELL. From July 8 to December 7, 1941. It has been distributed to the committee and is the thin volume in pink covers.

The title requires a slight explanation also, to orient the committee to the exhibit. On November 27 there was a message sent to General Short, with which of course the committee is familiar, warning of the imminence of hostilities. [2059] On the same day some similar messages were sent by the War Department to the Western Defense Command, to General MacArthur and to the General in charge of the Panama area.

We have included in this group of messages the messages sent to those other theaters at the same time, and their replies as well, feeling that in order for the committee to have the full picture it would be of interest to compare the replies of other theaters to the reply of General Short to somewhat comparable messages.

We want to point out, however, as it will appear, that the messages were different in certain respects.

We would also like to offer at this time as exhibit 33, the thick folder in pink covers, entitled "Military Intelligence Estimates Prepared by G-2, War Department, Washington, D. C."

This includes, as the index at the beginning makes clear, military intelligence estimates during the period July 1 to December 7, 1941, and there are some 30 in number of various dates, the subject matters being indicated in the index.

May those be received, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Those will be made exhibits as indicated, 32 and 33.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 32 and 33, respectively.)

Mr. GESELL. Now, General, I believe you said the Military [2060] Intelligence Division had the responsibility of assembling and disseminating military information. Was it also a function of that Division to evaluate the information assembled?

General MILES. It was, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Could you indicate to us briefly how the Military Intelligence Division was organized, the principal branches and functions?

General MILES. I believe, Mr. Counsel, that there is before the committee a chart of the organization of the Military Intelligence Division. Am I correct, sir?

Mr. GESELL. I believe I have seen such a chart. Would you indicate generally what the principal branches of the Division are?

General MILES. The latest chart I have is October 10, 1941. The principal branches were the Administrative Branch, the Intelligence Branch, the Counter-Intelligence Branch, the Plans and Training Branch, and the Information Control Branch.

Mr. GESELL. Now what were the functions of the Intelligence Branch?

General MILES. The functions, in general, of the Intelligence Branch were those duties of the War Department General Staff which related to the collation, evaluation and dissemination of military information; that is, positive information coming from foreign countries. I emphasize the [2061] word "positive" because in the preceding war we had designated these two branches as the positive and the negative.

In other words, the difference between the Intelligence Branch and Counter-Intelligence Branch was the difference between the assembly of actual information we needed on the one hand and the information which the enemy was seeking from us, or the potential enemy was seeking from us, and our following up that information in the Counter-Intelligence Branch.

Mr. GESELL. Now what was the general function of the Plans and Training Branch? Did that have to do with the evaluation of the intelligence?

General MILES. No, sir. The Plans and Training Branch was practically entirely a branch devoted to the plans for the expansion of the Military Intelligence Division, which, in the years in which I was G-2, was very considerable, and of the training of future officers, agents and other personnel for the Division.

Mr. GESELL. Did the Information Control Branch have to do with the maintaining of security regulations and controls over the information assembled?

General MILES. It did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Was that primarily a function of the Military Intelligence Division?

General MILES. It was a function. The security of [2062] information was a part of the general duties of the Military Intelligence Division.

Mr. GESELL. Now did the Military Intelligence Division report to any particular officer or branch of the War Department?

General MILES. It reported to the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. In the collection, evaluation and dissemination of information was it charged with reporting to anyone other than the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. Not strictly reporting, sir. We did disseminate information to a good many people other than the Chief of Staff, but we reported only directly to the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. You mean reported in a command sense?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Was it the responsibility of the Military Intelligence Division to disseminate information to the various theaters?

General MILES. It was, sir, if I understand it to mean the overseas departments and major divisions of the Army.

Mr. GESELL. Was it the responsibility of the Military Intelligence Division to also distribute such information to the other branches of the General Staff, such as War Plans?

General MILES. Very definitely, sir, it was.

[2063] The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the committee will recess until 2 o'clock.

[2064]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.
Counsel will proceed with General Miles.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding, there is a correction I want to make in the record.

In the quotation which I gave this morning I spoke of September 16, 1940. I find that I took the one above rather than the one below. It was October 30, 1940, so that should appear correctly in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. That correction will be made.

Senator BREWSTER. And there is another matter in connection with the quotation by the Chairman this morning from Mr. Stimson in 1932. I gathered that that was to lend support to the idea that the fleet in Hawaii did act as a deterrent in the view of Mr. Stimson and possibly of his chief at that time and, if so, in connection with that I would like to have the records of that time, if they will secure it from the Navy, showing the relative strength of the American and the Japanese Fleets at that time and also the strength of the air forces as then developed, in order that in appraising the deterrent possibilities of the fleet in Hawaii in 1932 and in 1941 we may have a complete picture.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair might state that in presenting that memorandum from the book by Mr. Stimson he was seeking to refresh the recollection of Mr. Grew, but he has no [2065] objection to the request of the Senator.

Senator BREWSTER. I think that was a very relevant matter, a very good piece to have in the record and I would like to have with it the relative strength.¹

The CHAIRMAN. All right. Go ahead, counsel.

Mr. GESELL. General Miles, we are discussing the organization and the responsibilities of the Military Intelligence Division. Could you give us a little more fully a picture of the activities of that Division and the manner in which it functioned?

General MILES. The Military Intelligence Division comprised a good many activities and functions. I would say that they could be largely summarized by the statement that those functions were designed to secure, evaluate and disseminate the information, to prevent information from getting to any potential or possible enemy, and to train and expand the Division for possible eventuality, even war.

During my period with G-2 the war in Europe was increasing in tempo and the situation in the Far East was certainly becoming no better, so that we were constantly branching out into activities that had not been handled by the Military Intelligence Division in time of peace and expanding enormously our personnel to handle those activities.

Mr. GESELL. What was the size of the organization in [2066] Washington, roughly, at the time of the Japanese attack?

General MILES. Within the War Department I should estimate it as somewhere in the neighborhood of 400 or 450 persons.

Mr. GESELL. There were also representatives of the Division, were there not, in the various overseas departments?

General MILES. The G-2's of the overseas department, as well as those of the corps areas, were not directly representatives of the Military Intelligence Division. They were the staff officers of their particular commanding officers, chosen by them. We had only a liaison relationship with them, if I may so express it.

The military attachés and military observers overseas, on the other hand, were directly responsible to and selected by the general Military Intelligence Division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call your attention to the fact that the spectators do not hear you distinctly and will you turn your voice to the microphone in front of you so that you may be heard distinctly?

General MILES Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you very much.

Mr. GESELL. You were discussing the attachés, General, and I gather from what you say that the military attachés attached to the various embassies and legations were directly [2067] responsible to the Military Intelligence Division.

General MILES. Yes. They were selected by the Military Intelligence Division, of course, with the consent of the Department of State. In many cases I imagine the Department of State consulted the respective ambassador or minister, and they were while so serving, of course, members of the embassy or legation staff, but they had more direct responsibility to the Military Intelligence Division than with G-2's of the various major commanders of the Army.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, as far as those G-2's are concerned, let us take a specific situation such as prevailed at Hawaii.

Is my understanding correct that the communication and contact between G-2 in Washington and the Hawaiian department would be through the commanding officer there rather than a direct relationship between the G-2 on General Short's staff and officers of your own Division?

General MILES. That is not wholly correct, sir. The G-2 of the War Department sent out a great deal of information directly to the G-2's of the overseas department and the corps areas, what might be called technical or static information. Information, however, which would imply the decision or belief of the Chief of Staff as to a particular situation, particularly if it was very important, would [2068] normally be and should be sent out by the War Department, as such, under the name of the Chief of Staff or the Adjutant General because there you are speaking directly to the commanding general of this major unit.

Mr. GESELL. In other words, G-2 in Washington kept the G-2 members of the overseas department staff informed through the submission of basic information directly to them from time to time?

General MILES. That is correct. We supplied the overseas departments with static information, revised from time to time, on countries of interest to them and also current information which affected them.

[2069] Mr. GESELL. On the other hand, if, on the basis of that information, it was felt that some specific action should be taken that was communicated, as a matter of procedure, and practice from the War Department, as such, in the matters you indicated directly to the commanding officer, in the case of Hawaii, General Short; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, whenever this information became more than information per se and became in any sense a directive or suggestion of the War Department, then that information should be and was transmitted through command channels.

G-2 was not in the command channel.

Mr. GESELL. Then I take it the reverse was also true, that G-2, at Hawaii, for example, would transmit what you call static information from time to time to the Military Intelligence Division for it to integrate with the information already available.

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will counsel have the witness explain what he means by static information? It is not clear to me what that term signifies.

Mr. GESELL. Will you explain that, General Miles?

Mr. KEEFE. I think I understand what the word "static" means, but as applied to this case, I do not synchronize it exactly.

[2070] General MILES. The Military Intelligence Division maintained what was known as a digest of intelligence on the countries of the world which were of military interest to us. Those were very voluminous documents. They were divided into headings of political, economic, combat, civil aviation, and military aviation. They were loose-leaf documents, added to and changed as information came in by the transmission of the new mimeographed sheet for inclusion in the digest.

From that digest was written, in the Military Intelligence Division, estimates on these countries. Those again were rather voluminous. They were divided into political, economic, and combat. They were always revised yearly, and from time to time also when necessary, by the forwarding of loose-leaves for inclusion in the estimates.

There was also a handbook on the Japanese Army gotten out by the Military Intelligence Division, on the 14th of May 1941.

There was another publication on the identification of Japanese aircraft, gotten out on the 24th of October 1941; a monograph on Thailand for the same year.

All that is what I have described perhaps loosely by the use of word "static." It was more or less static information, which we kept up, however, currently, as new [2071] information was received.

Mr. GESELL. So we understand, General, would it be fair to say that that information was generally of a statistical and informative character, with little evaluation material contained therein? In other words, it was designed to keep the G-2's posted as to the size of the armies and movements that might be anticipated of their forces, and matters of that sort?

General MILES. Generally speaking; yes, sir. But we also, of course, expressed definite opinion, as to the efficiency of the various forces that we were discussing.

[2072] Mr. GESELL. Some of those estimates are contained in this document that was introduced this morning, are they not, as they relate to the Far East, military intelligence estimates prepared by G-2, exhibit 33?

General MILES. Those are estimates of the situation prepared directly for the Chief of Staff. I think it is unfortunate we used the word "estimates" twice, referring to two different sets of documents. The estimates that I spoke of in answer to the Congressman's question were the static estimates, so-called, which were revised from time to time. The estimates of the situation were our opinions of current situations written for the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. They were distributed to all the G-2's, were they, and they were not prepared with any specific reference to any overseas theater as opposed to any other overseas theater?

General MILES. They were not written with any particular overseas theater in mind, but they were written directly for the Chief of Staff and General Staff.

Mr. GESELL. Of the theaters or of the overseas departments?

General MILES. No, sir, of the General Staff, the War Department General Staff.

Mr. GESELL. Now, I think there is some confusion here. [2073] I was talking still about the static information which we were referring to and not about this volume, exhibit 33.

General MILES. Then you are correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. On the other hand, the estimates in exhibit 33 were prepared not for distribution to the theaters, but for the information of the General Staff?

General MILES. Chief of Staff and his General Staff; yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, what were your particular functions and duties in this organization, General Miles?

General MILES. I was the head of the whole organization, Military Intelligence Division, responsible for its administration, its expansion and for its output.

In other words, I spoke for the Military Intelligence of the General Staff. A paper would normally be prepared, we will say, of the Far East estimate by the far eastern section. That would then go for revision or comment to the immediate chief of the far eastern section, the head of the intelligence branch, and from that branch to me. But I am responsible for and was responsible for the output of the division.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, as head of the organization, of course, you had to give special emphasis to certain aspects of its activities, and I wondered whether there was any particular phase of the work of the Military Intelligence Division which [2074] you gave particular attention to.

General MILES. Normally I would say that my particular attention was devoted to our output in the way of analyzed and estimated, evaluated information which we called "Intelligence," but I also had a good many other irons in the fire.

Mr. GESELL. Now how were you organized within your division in respect to the handling of the far eastern information?

General MILES. The Far Eastern Section of the Intelligence Branch was at that time under Colonel Bratton. He received all information that we obtained on the Far East from our military attachés, our observers, from the State Department, from the Navy Department, other departments of the Government, and although it was drying up considerably, information from civilian companies or press in the Far East, together, of course, with the secret information that we were getting from the intercepts—magic.

Mr. GESELL. Now to whom was he responsible?

General MILES. He was directly responsible to the Chief of the Intelligence Branch, at that time Col. Hayes Kroner. There was, however, also within that branch a situation section under Lieutenant Colonel Betts, now brigadier general. That was in charge of information bearing on the situation in all parts of the world. I described it at that time as the heart [2075] of the Intelligence Branch. It maintained situation maps both for G-2 and for the Secretary of War. All special studies, and so forth, emanate from this particular section.

Mr. GESELL. And that section would work in close coordination, I gather from your statement, with the Far Eastern Section of the Intelligence Branch in the formulation of estimates and studies, is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, during that time you have indicated you had several sources of information. You mentioned attachés, you mentioned, I believe, the Japanese intercepts, which you referred to as "magic." What other sources were there?

General MILES. We had some observers in the field. We had a mission under General Magruder in China. We had, of course, the Intelligence Division in the staff of the Hawaiian and Philippine Departments that were getting us information. We had started a nucleus of what might be called a secret service under Colonel Clear in Singapore. We had little money to give him, but at least he did make progress in tying in with the British Secret Service in the Far East. We exchange information, of course, with the Department of State and Navy Department particularly, and several other agencies, independent agencies of the Government in Washington, and with the military attachés and missions, particularly [2076] British, at that time in Washington.

Mr. GESELL. And I gather that all of these sources were sources of information which contributed data concerning the Far East?

General MILES. They did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What sort of liaison did you maintain with the State and Navy Departments? What were the mechanics of that and how did it function?

General MILES. I should like to go into that in a little detail. When I took over G-2 I found that a daily liaison was being maintained with the Department of State and the Navy Department. With the Department of State it was handled directly by then Colonel Magruder. During my tour of duty three other officers in succession took up this duty. They were then Colonel Betts, Colonel Montague, and Colonel Sands.

In addition to that I personally knew several of the Assistant Secretaries of States and the Under Secretary of State, and at least two or three times went, at his request, to the office of the Secretary of State on intelligence matters.

With the Navy Department the same liaison existed, but more in detail. In other words, officers from my Far Eastern Section visited many times a week, perhaps many times a day certain days, the corresponding officers of the office of Naval Intelligence. I was always in constant touch with the [2077] three officers who successively occupied that post.

Mr. GESELL. You mean in the Navy?

General MILES. In the Navy.

Mr. GESELL. Head of ONI?

General MILES. Head of ONI.

[2078] The liaison, I think, was very close at all times. I seem to have misplaced some papers that I wrote out in respect to the time of this committee, but I can summarize it, I think, from memory.

Two steps were taken by the Military Intelligence Division during the year 1941 to increase considerably the liaison between the war Department, particular Military Intelligence, and the other departments of the Government here in Washington.

In June, I think—I have the record here—no, in July—July 14, 1941, the Chief of the Office of Naval Intelligence, at that time Captain Kirk, and I requested the joint Army and Navy Board, which was then the highest coordinating military agency under the commander in chief, for permission to appear before it with certain suggestions and plans for integrating intelligence into that body. We did so appear on the 16th of July, with written proposals and arguments as to why we thought a greater integration of intelligence with that body would be useful.

The three proposals were that the Chiefs of Naval and Military Intelligence be made members of the Board, or alternatively, that they be made members of the Joint Planning Committee, which was the committee serving the Board, or alternatively, that a joint intelligence committee [2079] coequal with the Joint Planning Committee be established by the Joint Army and Navy Board.

These proposals were processed through the Joint Planning Committee and the General Board, and they resulted in the recommendation of the Joint Board to the two Secretaries that a joint intelligence committee be formed.

I have records of the date.

Mr. GESELL. That was a joint committee between the Army and Navy?

General MILES. That is the Joint Army and Navy Board which had been established a great many years before. The establishment of a joint intelligence committee serving the Joint Board was approved by the Secretary of the Navy on the 1st of October, and the Secretary of War on the 29th of September, and appropriate orders were issued.

The Joint Intelligence Committee members had their first meeting on the 11th of October 1941, but did not actually function until the 8th or 9th of December.

The second step taken by Military Intelligence to enlarge liaison was this:

In April of 1941, a memorandum was written by G-2 suggesting that representatives of nine departments of the Government, including War, be assembled to discuss and formulate policies and means of exchanging information between [2080] the departments, all information which affected the policy formulation of the Government.

The Secretary approved that memorandum and wrote the letters to the other eight Cabinet members or chiefs of independent offices. Throughout that summer, meetings were held in the office of G-2, two separate plans were drawn up, two successive plans were drawn up, and finally, I think in late August or September, but I can obtain the date, the representatives of the nine agencies signed the draft of plan.

This was approved by the various Cabinet members and chiefs of independent agencies, successively, during the succeeding months. The last letter that I found in the files was dated the earlier part of October 1941, from the Secretary of Agriculture.

This plan was, in general, the establishment within each department of an officer or office specifically charged with disseminating the information received by that department to the other departments concerned and receiving from the other departments and disseminating within his own department similar information.

The plan also included certain provisions for the safeguarding of this information in the various departments.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now under the scheme you have [2081] just indicated and through the liaison that was established on a more informal basis between the State and Navy, I gather you had some facilities, at least for giving them what information you had and getting their information from them?

General MILES. I think we had very complete means of doing so, so far as any information was given to us. I don't mean to say that we would always control another department, nor did we attempt to.

Mr. GESELL. Now, one of the most important types of information with which we are concerned here, is the magic, or Japanese intercepts. Are you familiar with exhibits 1 and 2 in this proceeding, the diplomatic and military intercepts contained in these volumes which I show you?

General MILES. I have seen those volumes; yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. To what extent did these intercepts come to your attention as they were translated?

General MILES. They were brought to me and to a limited number of other officers in the War Department by my own officers in the far eastern section in lockboxes or dispatch cases to which I had a key, and I read them; put them back in the dispatch case, and sent them on.

Mr. GESELL. It was the procedure and practice then, I gather, for you to see all intercepted Japanese messages [2082] during the time that you were G-2?

General MILES. There was a great deal of what we call chitter-chat in those messages which was not disseminated. Only the messages of some importance to us were disseminated.

Mr. GESELL. Would you say that these two exhibits I have referred to contain information of a chitter-chat nature, or are these more of a type which would have come to you under the procedure, the diplomatic and military?

General MILES. These are the types of messages that were distributed.

Mr. GESELL. Have you any record, General Miles, of which particular intercepts you saw during this period?

General MILES. I have no record at this time, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Do you believe the committee would be correct in assuming that you, in all probability, saw all of the intercepts contained in these two exhibits which have been introduced?

General MILES. It is my belief that I saw them all, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, did G-2 have the responsibility for intercepting those messages?

General MILES. No, sir; they were intercepted by Naval Communications; they first reached Naval Communications, [2083] and the Signal Intelligence Service.

Mr. GESELL. The Signal Intelligence Service of the Army?

General MILES. Of the Army, which was not a part of G-2, nor was G-2 a part of the Office of Naval Intelligence.

Mr. GESELL. Now, did G-2 have, as far as the messages intercepted by the Signal Service were concerned, the responsibility for translating or decoding the messages?

General MILES. No, sir. The messages were decoded jointly by Naval Communications and S. I. S., Signal Intelligence Service.

Mr. GESELL. Then, do I understand that the messages reached G-2 from the Signal Service after they had been translated or from the Naval Communications Service after they had been translated.

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, to whom did these messages come in G-2?

General MILES. They came to the far eastern section, Colonel Bratton.

Mr. GESELL. Whose responsibility was it to determine which messages would be distributed among higher officers?

General MILES. Colonel Bratton, initially.

Mr. GESELL. Did you exercise any judgment or selection [2084] in that regard?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What other officers did in the Army?

General MILES. I think no one except Colonel Bratton and his subordinates.

Mr. GESELL. Now, can you tell us who, in the War Department, received the texts of the messages during this period?

General MILES. I have before me a confidential agreement drawn up in G-2 dated January 23, 1941, signed by Capt. Hugh James, Acting Director of Naval Intelligence, and myself, in which was laid down what officers or persons this magic was to be distributed to, and by whom.

Within the War Department, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, the military aide to the President in exceptional cases only; he was, however, not an officer of the War Department.

Mr. GESELL. That was General Watson, was it?

General MILES. Yes, sir, that was General Watson.

Mr. GESELL. Yes, sir.

General MILES. And the War Plans Division.

Mr. GESELL. The War Plans Division, or the Chief of the War Plans Division.

General MILES. The Chief of the War Plans Division.

Mr. KEEFE. Who was that?

[2085] General MILES. General Gerow.

Mr. GESELL. So that list would include Secretary Stimson, General Marshall, General Gerow, and transmission to the President through General Watson?

General MILES. And myself.

Mr. GESELL. And yourself?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, was there anyone else in the War Department who was authorized to see the intercepts?

General MILES. No, sir. I would like to point out also that General Watson received them in exceptional cases only as per this agreement and later on the messages were delivered to the White House through the naval aide to the President, and not the military aide.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, during the time that delivery was being made by the Army to the White House, who made the determination of what messages would be sent to General Watson for the President?

General MILES. That also was Colonel Bratton's duty.

Mr. GESELL. What was meant by "exceptional circumstances," particularly significant messages?

General MILES. I imagine that that was the meaning of that phrase at the time this agreement was written.

Mr. GESELL. For what period—put it this way: When [2086] did the War Department cease advising the White House and that function was taken over by the Navy?

General MILES. My recollection is the 1st of November 1941.

Mr. GESELL. Did the Deputy Chief of Staff, General Bryden, receive these intercepts?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, what was the machinery for distributing them? Were they left with these various officials for their study, or how was it handled?

General MILES. So far as possible, the distributing officer remained in the office while the officer, whoever it was, read the message. That, of course, was not always possible, particularly the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and they were then left for him to read and he transmitted them back in the locked pouch.

Mr. GESELL. The practice was, I gather, then, for all the distributed messages, eventually to be returned to the point of distribution rather than remain in the files of the officers receiving them?

General MILES. They were never to remain in the files. They were always to be returned and burned.

Mr. GESELL. Who established that procedure?

General MILES. I was responsible for the establishment [2087] of it. I don't know that I personally did it. I imagine it was done on the recommendation of Colonel Bratton who was handling them directly. I also remember the Chief of Staff was personally very much interested in the procedure and the protection of those messages which constituted so important a military secret.

Mr. GESELL. One filed copy of the messages was retained, is that not correct?

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. GESELL. Who determined what officers and officials should see these messages?

General MILES. I hesitate to answer the question, because I don't remember that it ever arose. It was so obviously the Secretary of War, Chief of Staff, Chief of War Plans Division, and the Chief of Military Intelligence Division, were the officers directly responsible.

Mr. GESELL. Well, I quite agree that they are obvious people to be on a distribution list, but the question arises whether perhaps there should not have been others on the list, as well.

General MILES. I remember no case in which that question arose, sir.

The general tendency always was to limit these messages, the distribution of these messages, the knowledge of the [2088] existence of these messages, to as few people as possible.

Mr. GESELL. You didn't mention the Department of State. Am I correct in my understanding that these messages were sent to the Department of State, these magic messages, by the Navy?

General MILES. By the Navy and by the Army. We took over the distribution to the Department of State when the Navy took over the distribution to the White House, about the 1st of November. Before that we distributed to the Department of State and to the White House on alternative months.

Mr. GESELL. From November 1, 1941, the Army distributed to the State Department, and the Navy to the White House, as a general matter of practice?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Who, in the Department of State was authorized to see these messages?

General MILES. Our distribution was directly to the Secretary of State. What handling he had within his own Department, of course, we did not control.

Mr. GESELL. Was that handled in the same mechanical fashion as far as the dispatch cases were concerned and the return of the messages?

General MILES. That is correct, except that I believe the private secretary of the Secretary of State had a key.

[2089] Mr. KEEFE. Might I interrupt?

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman didn't understand. The private secretary had a what?

General MILES. Had a key to the box.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. It is not clear to me, this answer of the witness as to the disposition of the intercepts after they had made their routine delivery, delivery by the Navy and the Army to these various people.

I think it was said that they were destroyed or burned.

Mr. GESELL. The testimony was, I believe, and will you check me on this—I understood the testimony to be that they were all returned and burned with the exception of one filed copy, which was maintained.

General MILES. That is true. That filed copy never went on the distribution rounds.

Mr. GESELL. So that following distribution through these precautions, you had one filed copy of all messages intercepted?

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. What I am trying to understand is, the intercepts that were brought back, were returned to the Army by Colonel Bratton, and to the Navy by the officer in charge of distribution for the Navy, those messages were burned?

[2090] General MILES. That is true.

Mr. KEEFE. By the Army and by the Navy?

General MILES. Respectively.

Mr. GESELL. Those messages that were distributed were duplicates of messages which were retained in the file that was kept, the complete file that was kept at the Army and Navy?

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. GESELL. Any messages intercepted by the Signal Corps were made available to the Navy and any messages intercepted by the Navy were made available to the Army under this procedure; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir. It was a joint operation of the Naval Communications and SIS.

The CHAIRMAN. What is SIS?

General MILES. Signal Intelligence Service. If one was overcrowded, the other would step in.

Mr. GESELL. Did I understand you to say that one copy or more than one copy was sent to the Secretary of State?

General MILES. One copy, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, we have been discussing here the distribution, have we not, of the actual translated texts of the different messages; not any evaluation or summary, but the actual text of the messages themselves?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

[2091] Mr. GESELL. Were there any facilities under Army control at Hawaii which enabled the Army to intercept these messages at that point?

General MILES. I believe not, sir. There was a naval intercepting station at Hawaii but I think not an Army. And by intercepting I mean simply taking the messages out of the air. I don't mean breaking the code or translating from the Japanese to the English, of course.

Mr. GESELL. What I had referred to was the latter, the question being whether or not there were any facilities at Hawaii through which General Short or persons in his command would have been in a position to intercept, translate, and decode these messages which we have been discussing the magic messages?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What steps were taken to distribute the intercepted messages to the commanding officer at Hawaii?

General MILES. There were no steps taken to distribute these messages to that general.

Mr. GESELL. Do I understand from your answer that these messages as intercepted and translated were not sent to Hawaii by the Army?

General MILES. They were not. In some cases the substance of some messages, were sent to Hawaii, and almost always in naval code, I think always in naval code, because [2092] the naval code was considered to be more secure than the Army code.

Mr. GESELL. Who made the decision that these messages should not be sent to Hawaii as they were intercepted and translated as far as the Army is concerned?

General MILES. That followed from the general policy laid down by the Chief of Staff that these messages and the fact of the existence of these messages or our ability to decode them should be confined to the least possible number of persons; no distribution should be made outside of Washington.

Mr. GESELL. Was that determination by the Chief of Staff in writing or simply an expression of policy?

General MILES. As far as my recollection goes it was simply an expression of policy.

Mr. GESELL. Were you consulted in connection with the formulation of that policy?

General MILES. I do not now remember, but I imagine that I was.

Mr. GESELL. Can you state to the committee what the considerations were underlying such a policy?

General MILES. Yes, sir. The value of that secret, the secret that we could and did decode Japanese messages, in their best code, was of incalculable value to us, both in the period when war threatened and most definitely during our waging of [2093] that war. That was the basic reason for the limitation on the distribution of those messages and of the constantly increasing closing in, as I might express it, on any possible leaks in that secret.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, I have been discussing Hawaii with you. I take it your answer would be the same as to other theaters, that these messages were not being sent by the Army to any other oversea area commanders?

General MILES. That is true, sir. It applies to all of them.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall ever having received any instructions not to transmit the messages to Hawaii, let us say?

General MILES. I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Do you ever recall any discussion with anyone concerning the advisability of sending such messages to Hawaii as they were intercepted and translated?

General MILES. I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Do you ever recall any request having been made of G-2 by anyone, a commander in Hawaii or elsewhere, asking that such information be transmitted?

General MILES. No, sir, I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Then I am to understand from your answers, am I, General, that the question of the distribution of these [2094] messages to the commanding general or anyone on his staff at Hawaii was not, to your recollection, discussed by anyone in your presence or requested or suggested by anyone in your presence?

General MILES. That is true, sir, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. GESELL. And can you give us any further information as to what officer was primarily responsible for the decision to so limit the distribution?

General MILES. I regarded it as an important policy which I knew emanated from the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. Would it be fair to say that this magic information was the most reliable and authentic information which the War Department was receiving as to Japanese intentions and activities?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. To your knowledge was anyone in responsible position in the War Department organization at Hawaii advised of the fact that we were in a position to intercept, decode, and translate these messages?

General MILES. To the best of my knowledge and belief no one was advised. That, sir, was the essence of the secret. Not so much what we were getting from these messages but the very fact that we could decode and translate these messages.

[2095] Mr. GESELL. And it was for those reasons that I understand you to say that the decision was made not to send the text of the messages or any summary therefrom to the overseas commanders?

General MILES. That was the primary consideration, as I understand it, for that fixed definite policy of the War Department.

Mr. GESELL. Would you say that it was one of the responsibilities of the Military Intelligence Division to keep the overseas commanders advised as to matters which might be important to them in gaging the potential activities of the enemies or potential enemy?

General MILES. In general, yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The obligation of responsibility to disseminate information and the obligation to safeguard information then in this instance acted opposite to each other, did they not?

General MILES. Generally speaking, yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. I gather from what you say that you resolved that in favor of the closest type of security over the messages translated?

General MILES. I think that is hardly a complete answer, sir. It must also be borne in mind that a great deal of this information did not directly apply to the overseas departments unless and until it became more than information and entered [2096] the realms of an estimate of the situation which called for military action on the part of those high commanders, and that was a function of the command, in other words, of the Chief of Staff himself. A great deal of that information was of great value to us in Washington, to all departments of the Government that were within the distribution list, as indicating the course of diplomatic relations with Japan.

But was not considered at that time that the commanding generals of the overseas departments should know from day to day the course of those diplomatic negotiations. The essence of what they should know was any situation which would call for a military decision on their part or the part of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. Now, that appraisal of the situation carries with it, does it not, General Miles, a perhaps unusually high degree of responsibility in the General Staff here to send appropriate messages to the area commanders warning them of impending developments to the extent that they were known to the General Staff?

General MILES. Yes, sir. It was a matter of great responsibility to notify the overseas departments, which were our great outpost of the moment, when war became—certainly when war became imminent, or the moment when any part of the war plans, so carefully drawn up in the preceding years, should [2097] be put into effect.

Mr. GESELL. I wonder if you quite understood my question. I take it that responsibility, in the general sense, is always present in the Chief of Staff. My point was rather that under these circumstances, having reached the decision, for the reasons you have indicated, not to transmit information to the area commanders, and knowing that you had information which the area commanders did not have, you were confronted with possibly even a higher degree of responsibility in that regard, were you not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, some of these messages, General Miles, were not of a diplomatic nature, they were of a military nature, were they not, some of the magic intercepts?

General MILES. I believe that is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, does your testimony apply equally to messages of that character as compared to messages of a general diplomatic character?

General MILES. Yes, sir. Had we obtained through magic any information of a purely military character that should have been transmitted to the overseas departments, I think steps should have been taken to transmit that information in some secure way, providing always it did not come within the realms of command responsibility.

[2098] Mr. GESELL. You say you think some steps should be taken in those circumstances to transmit the messages?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, referring to exhibit 2, copy of which is handed you, will you turn to page 12. There is there a message sent from Tokyo to Honolulu, dated September 24, 1941, which was translated on October 9, 1941, reading as follows:

Strictly Secret.

Henceforth, we would like to have you make reports concerning vessels along the following lines in so far as possible:

1. The waters (of Pearl Harbor) are to be divided roughly into five sub-areas. (We have no objections to your abbreviating as much as you like.)

Area A. Waters between Ford Island and the Arsenal.

Area B. Waters adjacent to the Island south and west of Ford Island. (This area is on the opposite side of the Island from Area A.)

Area S. East Loch.

Area D. Middle Loch.

Area E. West Loch and the communicating water routes.

2. With regard to warships and aircraft carriers, [2099] we would like to have you report on those at anchor (these are not so important), tied up at wharves, buoys and in docks. (Designate types and classes briefly. If possible we would like to have you make mention of the fact when there are two or more vessels alongside the same wharf.)

Do you recall seeing that message at the time it was intercepted and translated?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. I ask you whether that is not the type of message which carried a special military significance to such an extent, taken under your previous testimony, that it should have been sent to the Hawaiian Department?

General MILES. If that message were taken alone, Mr. Counsel, it would carry that military significance. It is, of course, primarily of naval interest. It should always be remembered that it was well known to everyone in the Intelligence Departments of the two services that the Japanese were following as closely as they possibly could the movement of all of our warships.

I remember on several occasions going to Admiral Kirk's or Admiral Wilkinson's secret room in the Navy Department and looking at his big map of the positions of the Japanese warships. Everybody was doing it. Furthermore, it is rather interesting [2100] to note that in that same volume, if one counts the number of messages similar to this which was sent to Hawaii or eliciting information from naval movements in Hawaii, which were translated before December 7, we find 24 of them, of which only 4 were received in the month preceding Pearl Harbor. Similar messages concerning naval movements in Panama, however, there were 20, and there were 5 in the month preceding Pearl Harbor. Similar messages regarding the Philippines, there are 56 in the book, 16 received in the month before Pearl Harbor.

So that my answer to that question is that this message taken alone would have been of great military significance but it was not taken alone unless you look at it by hindsight, which focuses all right on the event which did happen. It was one of a great number of messages being sent by the Japanese to various parts of the world in their attempt to follow the movements of our naval vessels, a matter which we knew perfectly well they were doing, and which we ourselves were doing in regard to the Japanese.

Mr. GESELL. Why do you say this message is of great military significance standing alone?

General MILES. That would indicate they were interested in one place and one place only and it is the detail of Pearl Harbor.

[2101] Mr. GESELL. It is really, is it not, looking at it as one message alone, and, if you will, from hindsight, a plan for laying out what amounts to a bombing plan for Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. That is exactly what it looks like now, sir, now that we know Pearl Harbor was bombed.

Mr. GESELL. You say there are similar messages in this book which were intercepted prior to December 7. Will you find me one such message, General?

General MILES. Concerning Hawaii?

Mr. GESELL. Or concerning any other point in which the Japanese were interested. Will you find me one message which is similar to this one?

General MILES. Well, if you mean similar in dividing the harbor into sections, there are no such messages that I know of, but all of the messages here from page 2 to page 16 in this book, all are concerned with information requested of or received by the Japanese on movements in Hawaii.

[2102] Mr. GESELL. Well, you recognize, do you not, General, that this message, looking at it now in the cold light of this hearing room, is quite different than just a ship-movement message, is it not? They are not anxious to find ship movements. They did not even want to know much about the ships that are at the wharves. They want to know the ones that are at anchor.

General MILES. The question is what?

Mr. GESELL. Would you consider this a ship-movement report?

General MILES. No. It is primarily a message dividing up the waters of Pearl Harbor into convenient areas for reporting the presence of ships, United States warships.

Mr. GESELL. There is no other message like this in this exhibit, is there, General?

General MILES. I have not found any, sir, similar to this in the sense of dividing any particular waters, although I think you will find in the Philippines messages questions of currents in Subic Bay, I remember a message if my memory is not at fault, and other naval information which might lead one to expect an attack in Philippine waters.

Mr. GESELL. Would it be a fair statement to say that one of the functions and responsibilities of a properly organized and functioning military intelligence division [2103] would have been to single out this message, recognize its difference from the other message and attempt to evaluate its significance?

General MILES. Yes, sir, but we did not give it the significance at that time that it now has in the light of subsequent events.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, do you recall any discussion of this message with your staff, any review or critique of its importance?

General MILES. I do not. I recall discussing, I think, this message or certain such messages with my naval colleague, to whom they particularly applied even more than to the Army.

Mr. GESELL. Admiral Wilkinson you are referring to?

General MILES. Admiral Wilkinson after he joined; Admiral Kirk before.

Mr. GESELL. And what is your recollection of those discussions?

General MILES. My recollection is not very specific. I think that my naval colleagues agreed that it was perfectly normal for the Japanese to be searching in all areas for the position of our ships and certain specific information about the harbors occupied by our ships, or the waters.

Mr. GESELL. But this is neither of those. This is the [2104] specific location and situation of the ships in a particular harbor, is it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, do you recall discussing this message with Admiral Wilkinson or any of your other naval colleagues?

General MILES. I do not specifically recall discussing this message.

Mr. GESELL. Now, this message that was translated on October 9 and sent on September 24 was followed by other messages, was it not, messages translated prior to December 7 which indicated that the Japanese were implementing and following the pattern laid out in this particular message?

I refer, for example, to the one of November 15 on page 13 of the exhibit, where there is a message setting forth the code to be used in designating the various areas, and to another message on that page stating, under date of November 15, translated December 3:

As relations between Japan and the United States are most critical, make your "ships in harbor report" irregular, but at a rate of twice a week. Although you already are no doubt aware, please take extra care to maintain secrecy.

Do you recall seeing those messages?

General MILES. I believe I saw both of those messages, [2105] sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, do you recall finally on this subject, General Miles, seeing the message on page 15 of this exhibit from Honolulu to Tokyo, under date of November 29, translated December 5, which had this—

Mr. GEARHART. Pardon me. That was from Tokyo to Honolulu, wasn't it?

Mr. GESELL. From Tokyo to Honolulu, yes.

Mr. GEARHART. You had it just the reverse.

Mr. GESELL. Thank you, Congressman Gearhart.

Containing this single sentence:

We have been receiving reports from you on ship movements, but in future will you also report even when there are no movements.

At page 15 of the exhibit do you recall that message?

General MILES. I believe I saw that message, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, those three subsequent messages which I have just directed your attention to gave added significance, did they not, to the message translated on October 9 to which I first called your attention?

General MILES. They did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Did those added messages lead to any discussion or further consideration as to the appropriateness or desirability of sending specific information on this subject [2106] to Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. Not that I remember, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, I noticed and I am sure the committee and all of us have noticed here, General Miles, that many significant military messages and, indeed, other significant messages in this magic category were not translated until after December 7 although sent often substantial periods of time before that date. You have noted that in looking at some of these exhibits, have you not?

General MILES. I have, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, I understood you to testify that the responsibility for translating the messages was placed in the Signal Corps of the Army as far as the Army intercepts were concerned?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, what steps did you take, if any, to encourage a more prompt and expeditious translation of these messages as they were intercepted?

General MILES. I remember no specific steps which I took. The S. I. S. was not under my direction. I do remember, however, discussing the matter and finding that it was primarily a question of personnel and of very markedly increased traffic. It took time to decode the cryptic messages, it took time to translate from Japanese into English. The [2107] S. I. S. and Naval Communications, like all other branches of the Army and Navy at that time, were much limited in personnel and in facilities.

Mr. GESELL. You say you recall discussing this matter with someone or you simply recall the conditions that prevailed? I did not quite understand you.

General MILES. I recall discussing the matter to the extent of arriving at the opinion that was the situation in Naval Communications and S. I. S. I do not specifically recall the exact incident of any particular discussion.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, it was perfectly apparent during these latter months before the attack that the situation between us and Japan was becoming more and more critical, was it not?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GESELL. All of you in G-2 would have been more and more interested in the prompt interception and translation and examination of these magic messages as they came in?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, under those circumstances and seeing as we do here from the messages that those translated before the seventh contained vital diplomatic and military information, it would seem to me to have been appropriate to take some steps to assure a prompt translation of the [2108] messages, or do I understand you to say that you simply inquired as to the reason but you took no steps to facilitate the prompter translation?

General MILES. I assured myself that the men and facilities were doing all that they could do to get those messages out promptly. I was not able to furnish them with any additional specialists, nor with any additional equipment.

I do not like to go into the details of even the fact that I knew about the methods we used; I cannot.

Mr. GESELL. No; we do not expect you to.

General MILES. But I think it is safe to say that they are not easy to reproduce.

Mr. GESELL. Well, was any effort made to get additional manpower of this specialized type that may have been required?

General MILES. I think that manpower was being provided as fast as the two services could provide it. It had to be very specially trained manpower.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall ever having discussed with the Chief of Staff the desirability of increasing the forces and facilities for the interception and translation of these messages?

General MILES. No, sir, I do not recall bringing that matter up to the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. Turning to this exhibit 2, which I believe [2109] is still before you, General Miles, I want to direct your attention to certain messages which were sent prior to the seventh but translated subsequent to the seventh.

There is a message on page 17, for example——

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask, when you say "sent" you mean sent from——

Mr. GESELL. Sent from Tokyo to Honolulu.

The CHAIRMAN. Sent from Tokyo to Honolulu?

Mr. GESELL. Tokyo to Honolulu or Washington, a Japanese message.

The CHAIRMAN. They are all Japanese messages?

Mr. GESELL. They are all Japanese messages.

On page 17 the message of November 24, where Tokyo was advised concerning mine laying operations outside Pearl Harbor, the maneuvering activities of the U. S. Fleet and the time that the vessels lay in harbor.

On page 19 the message of November 28 where Tokyo was advised that there was usually one cruiser in the waters south of Pearl Harbor and one or two destroyers at the entrance of the harbor.

The message on page 20 of December 1 where more detailed information concerning fleet maneuvers in operational areas was given, with schedules of departures and return of battleships.

[2110] The message on page 21 of December 2, where Tokyo asked for information concerning barrage balloons and antimine nets.

The message on page 22 of December 3 where an agent in Honolulu sent detailed information concerning land signals to be given by flashing lights, ads in newspapers, and so forth.

The message on page 26 in December, an urgent request for information as to movements of ships in and out of Pearl Harbor since the 4th of December.

The message of December 6, on pages 27 and 28, where Honolulu gave Tokyo further information concerning barrage balloons and stated:

I imagine that in all probability there is considerable opportunity left to take advantage for a surprise attack against these places.

And further stated:

In my opinion the battleships do not have torpedo nets.

And, finally, the message on page 29 of December 6th, where Honolulu reported:

It appears that no air reconnaissance is being conducted by the fleet air arm.

[2111] Now, with those messages in mind is it fair to state that if facilities had been available for the more prompt translation of these intercepted messages we would have had more than ample data in our hands to indicate that there was to be a surprise attack by the Japanese on Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. Those messages would certainly have indicated the strong possibility, if not actual probability, of such an attack.

I think I failed to state, sir, that it was not only a question of personnel and facilities here in Washington for the decoding and translation of those messages, but also very definitely out in the field. Those messages had to be picked out of the air by intercepting stations. They were not all picked up by the same station. There was no one station that could have picked them up.

In fact, I understand now that the best intercepting station for the few messages emanating from Japan itself was Manila.

Now, some of those intercepting stations had teletype facilities by which they could promptly transmit the message intercepted to Washington. Some did not. Some of the messages were received in Washington by air mail.

So we had not only a question of personnel and facilities and a very rapidly growing traffic to handle it in Washington, but also the actual intercepting of the message in the field [2112] and the transmission of those messages to Washington.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask counsel one question? Those messages that you read last are messages that were sent from Tokyo or Honolulu and were not translated or decoded until after Pearl Harbor?

Mr. GESELL. That is right. They are all Japanese messages which were not in translated form available, as far as these records show, prior to the attack.

Senator LUCAS. Thank you, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Counsel does not want to leave the impression that all the messages referred to are in that category, because there were several that were translated before.

Mr. GESELL. I took it Senator Lucas referred to this last bit of reading and not the first messages I have discussed.

Senator LUCAS. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me ask counsel whether he has indicated in his questions how far back prior to Pearl Harbor these messages went out that were not translated until after Pearl Harbor? Did you indicate that?

Mr. GESELL. I have indicated in most instances the date that the message was sent out. I think the ones to which I referred were all sent subsequent to November 24, 1941.

The CHAIRMAN. And prior to the 7th of December?

[2113] Mr. GESELL. And prior to the 7th of December.

The Vice CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, in that connection, I think it might be helpful if counsel will be kind enough to point out, the first one on page 16 of the exhibit, dated November 24, 1941, shows that was translated December 16, 1941. That is what counsel has in mind, is it?

Mr. GESELL. That is correct.

The Vice CHAIRMAN. And running all the way through this exhibit to page 31 it shows messages received and translated from a few days to a few weeks after they were received.

Mr. GESELL. That is correct; and quite a number on the 8th and the 10th and the 11th and some of them later than that.

General MILES. In the desire to make the record accurate it might be pointed out, I think, that certainly the message on page 26 from Tokyo to Honolulu, which was dated Tokyo, December 6, could not possibly have been translated even with the best facilities until early in the morning of the seventh. Tokyo on the 6th—yes, it might be on the 5th, that is right. And from there on the messages are dated the 6th of December.

Mr. GESELL. General, I meant to ask you—

Mr. GEARHART. That is Tokyo time on the 6th?

General MILES. Tokyo and Honolulu.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

[2114] Mr. GESELL. I meant to ask you, General, a little earlier. After the war started did the War Department change its procedure in respect of transmitting to the area commanders information from these magic sources?

General MILES. I believe not, sir; not to my knowledge. That was always regarded up to the termination of the Japanese war as a very important vital military secret.

Mr. GESELL. Now, I wish to read a paragraph to you from your affidavit given to Col. Henry C. Clausen under date of August 16, 1945 and ask if you will give to the committee a full statement concerning the matters covered in this paragraph. The paragraph reads as follows:

Concerning the testimony I gave before the Army Pearl Harbor Board, 8 August 1944, as corrected by my letter, 18 August 1944, I wish to add that I avoided any statement concerning details of information and intelligence which I had derived from Top Secret sources then called 'Magic', or any intimation that such sources existed. The reason I so limited my testimony was because prior to my appearance before the Board, Brig. General Russell A. Osmon and then Colonel Carter W. Clarke, of G-2, War Department, transmitted to me instructions from the Chief of Staff that I was not to disclose to the Army Pearl Harbor Board any facts concerning [2115] the radio intelligence mentioned, or the existence of that form of information or intelligence in the period preceding 7 December 1941. Accordingly, I obeyed that instruction.

General MILES. That statement is literally correct. I regret that it was worded that way because it has been twisted out of its meaning entirely and I think very unfairly to the Chief of Staff.

What happened, of course, was preceding that I appeared before the Army Pearl Harbor Board in early April 1944, when we were in the midst of our war with Japan. We were approaching the crisis, if you like. We had not landed in Leyte, we had not fought the battle for the Leyte Gulf. We were in the midst of a great war and this was a military secret of incalculable value to the United States in that war, the secret that we could break that code and were breaking that code. It might well have been worth to us many thousands of valuable American lives. I knew that perfectly well.

I am sorry I mentioned the Chief of Staff because under no conditions would I have appeared before the Army Board or any other group and intimated in any way the existence of that secret without specific authority of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff.

Now, when I made that affidavit to Colonel Clausen the [2116] situation had changed entirely. The war with Japan was over; Japan had surrendered. Colonel Clausen came to my headquarters in Boston with the written authority from the Secretary of War to take my testimony on any and all subjects.

He suggested, however, that the affidavit which he himself wrote from the conversations that he had had with me, all under oath, he suggested that my affidavit, which became part of his record, be tied in with my testimony before the Grunert Board, the Army Board, and I think he drafted or maybe I drafted that paragraph that the counsel has just read.

That, gentlemen, is the whole situation there. I was not gagged by the Chief of Staff or in any way suggesting that I should do anything to cover up anything other than this vital military secret that we were all guarding with the greatest of care.

General MILES. I was not.

Mr. GESELL. You were aware that such sessions were held, were you not?

General MILES. Not at that time, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, General Miles, I want to turn to another subject. You referred to your liaison with the State Department, which I gather was maintained by you and by officers acting under, your direction, and you indicated that information was transmitted in both directions, that G-2 gave information to the State Department and the State Department gave information to G-2.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. I want to ask you some specific questions concerning information which may or may not have been given by the State Department to G-2. The first question has to do with the modus vivendi, which I believe you have become familiar with, at least sitting here waiting for your turn to testify. Do you recall whether or not the Department of State discussed with you, or officers acting under your direction, the question of the modus vivendi, and whether or not that should or should not be submitted in a note to the [2118] Japanese Ambassadors?

General MILES. I have no recollection of any such occurrence. I feel very sure that I would have remembered it had I been consulted, and I feel very certain of being able to make the statement that I was not consulted.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, you were not advised, were you, in any way, when the decision was reached by the State Department to send the 10-point note and not to send the modus vivendi on November 26, 1941?

General MILES. I was not, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Did the Department of State advise you, to your recollection, that they had received information from various representatives in South American countries to the effect that the Japanese representatives to those South American countries had been sounding out South American governments as to their attitude in the event of war between the United States and Japan?

General MILES. I have no recollection of that, sir. I would have to check the records to see if it was ever transmitted through my liaison officer from the State Department.

Mr. GESELL. The exhibit in evidence indicates that at least some of that information was sent to military authorities, and I wondered if it had been a matter of any [2119] discussion, or had come to your attention specifically?

General MILES. I do not remember at this time having those matters brought to my attention.

Mr. MURPHY. Will counsel state what exhibit that is?

Mr. GESELL. Exhibit 31.

With respect to the message to the Emperor, do you recall any consultations or any information coming to you from the State Department concerning that message?

General MILES. I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Would you have been the officer that the State Department would have been most likely to consult under the liaison conditions which prevailed at that time, or did that come under the province of that other department of the General Staff?

General MILES. The liaison, Mr. Gesell, was maintained for the exchange of information. It did not, of itself, include any provision for consultation with the Military Intelligence Division by anyone. Generally speaking, the Military Intelligence Division was not consulted on the actions or decisions arrived at by the State Department.

Mr. GESELL. Do you know whether other officers of the War Department were consulted in that connection?

General MILES. I only know through listening to testimony that I have heard in this room.

[2120] Mr. GESELL. Do you recall whether or not the War Department, and specifically the Military Intelligence Division, was consulted or whether its opinion was asked by the Department of State or the President, as to the appropriateness of applying embargoes and freezing orders against the Japanese?

General MILES. I can recall no action on which the Military Intelligence Division was consulted by the Department of State in those matters.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall discussing those problems in memoranda submitted to the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. I do.

Mr. GESELL. I notice, referring to exhibit 33, a series of memoranda on that subject. No. 7 of July 25, 1941, particularly paragraph 9, and item No. 9, memorandum of August 16, 1941—

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Counsel, if I may make a suggestion, it seems to me that is important enough to have it read into the record at this time. It will be done sooner or later.

Mr. GESELL. Very well, I will read the paragraphs to which I refer.

On item 7, paragraph 9 of the memorandum of July 25, 1941, signed by you, General Miles, addressed to the Chief of Staff, and copies apparently were distributed to the [2121] Secretary of War and other officers, the 9th paragraph reads as follows:

Effective economic sanctions against Japan imposed by us, today, would not, in the opinion of this division, force Japan to take any steps in the way of aggressive action which she does not plan to take anyway, when a favorable opportunity arises, nor would they precipitate a declaration of war on us by Japan. Such action on our part need not and should not distract our attention from the main theatre of operations. On the contrary, by adopting such a policy, we will be able to conserve for Britain and for ourselves supplies which from the viewpoint of our national defense, are being worse than wasted when we place them in Japanese hands.

Item 9, the memorandum for the Chief of Staff, dated August 16, 1941, reading paragraph 6, which is another memorandum signed by you, which was distributed to the President, the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, the War Plans Division, Office of Naval Intelligence, and General Embick, reads as follows:

Considering all of the above, this division believes that forceful diplomacy vis-à-vis Japan, including the application of ever-increasing military and economic pressure on our part, offers the best chance of gaining time, the [2122] best possibility of preventing the spread of hostilities in the Pacific area, and of the eventual disruption of the Tripartite Pact. The exercise of increasingly strong "power diplomacy" by the United States is clearly indicated.

Item 16 of September 23, 1941, signed by you, and distributed to the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, reading from paragraph 7, states:

This division still believes as stated in IB-112 dated August 16, 1941, that forceful diplomacy vis-à-vis Japan, including the application of ever-increasing and economic pressure on our part offers the best chance of gaining time, the best possibility of preventing the spread of hostilities in the Pacific area, and also the hope of the eventual disruption of the Tripartite Pact. The exercise of increasingly strong "power diplomacy" by the United States is clearly indicated.

The memorandum of October 2, 1941, item 17, to the Chief of Staff, again sent to the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and others, this one being signed by Hayes A. Kroner of your staff, refers to this matter in several paragraphs, and I am reading from paragraph 10, the following:

This division is of the opinion that neither a conference of leaders, nor economic concessions at this time [2123] would be of any material advantage to the United States unless a definite commitment to withdraw from the Axis were obtained from Japan prior to the conference. The immediate objective of the United States is to weaken Hitler in every way possible. A Japanese guarantee not to attack Russia in Siberia would free Russia, psychologically, and militarily for stronger opposition to Hitler. With this in mind, a definite condition precedent to such a proposed conference should be a complete withdrawal by Japan from the Axis and a guarantee, backed by substantial evidence of sincerity not to attack Russia in Siberia.

There is then a discussion again of your position concerning economic sanctions in the same terms as before.

Item 28:

Item 28, December 5, 1941, to the Chief of Staff, reading just prior to paragraph 7 thereof, an unnumbered paragraph as follows:

Our influence in the Far Eastern theatre lies in the threat of our naval power and the effort of our economic blockade. Both are primary deterrents against Japanese all-out entry in the war as an Axis partner. If we become involved in war with Japan, we could launch a serious offensive here by naval and air forces based on the Philippines and elsewhere in Malaysia. But such an attack would fall [2124] short of a major strategic offensive, because it could not be decisive within a reasonable time, and still more, because it would be a diversion of forces away from rather than toward our objective, the defeat of the Nazis.

That again was signed by you, and sent to a number of officers.

And tab A—

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, might I inquire what exhibit counsel is reading from?

Mr. GESELL. Exhibit No. 33.

Senator FERGUSON. What do you mean by tab A?

Mr. GESELL. Oh, that tab A, is attached to the last memorandum I read, item 28.

Now, those statements, and I believe there are others in this exhibit, General Miles, indicate that you were preparing memoranda supporting the idea of economic sanctions over a period of months preceding Pearl Harbor, and that this memoranda, while addressed to the Chief of Staff, were also distributed to the President and the Secretary of State. I wondered if you could give us a better idea of the circumstances under which the question of economic sanctions was reviewed by you, and why these memoranda were prepared?

General MILES. These memoranda were prepared in the [2125] face of a constantly increasing diplomatic crisis, and accurately express our then views as to what we believed should be the general policy of the United States vis-à-vis Japan. We arrived at that conclusion from long study of the Military Intelligence Division as such of the economic psychological factors of Japan, and, rightly or wrongly, they were our views as to the best means of gaining what we then assumed to be and what has transpired to be the national objective.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, might I just clear the record?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

[2126] Senator FERGUSON. The reason I was not able to identify the exhibit is I thought counsel was referring to a pamphlet with tabs on his pamphlet. I saw him reading from a pamphlet with tabs, and I have not received such a copy. I inquired from counsel what it was. I have just received a copy so I know now what he was talking about.

Mr. GESELL. Senator, I am sure there is a misunderstanding. The items I was reading from are shown in the index of the copy. The tabs I was referring to are not the tabs on the copy you have.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I wanted to explain. I thought you were referring to the book you had having tabs, and I thought that you were referring to those tabs.

Mr. GESELL. I understand.

Senator FERGUSON. I could not identify exhibit 33, because my exhibit 33 had no short tabs, and I now see that the other members of the committee have them with tabs on. I have been unable to get such a copy.

The CHAIRMAN. There is supposed to be one for each member, but it seems that all the members do not have tabs on their copies, and therefore the Chair suggests that the tabs be furnished to all members.

Mr. GESELL. I believe we have one for each member of the committee.

[2127] I was inquiring, General, whether those views, as expressed in these memoranda at the time, were solicited from you as the Acting Assistant Chief of Staff by the Chief of Staff, the Secretary of State, or the President, or whether they were submitted by you voluntarily, so to speak, giving your position on an important subject?

General MILES. They were certainly not solicited by the President or the Secretary of State. I am not sure whether they were solicited by the Chief of Staff or not. It was a matter of routine for the Military Intelligence Division to prepare such memoranda for the Chief of Staff in situations in which it would appear that it might be useful to him.

Mr. GESELL. In other words, you were giving him the considered views of your department on matters of moment in the Japanese relations?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now during this period were you consulted at all in connection with the question of the need of getting a delay, or obtaining a delay through negotiations or otherwise, so that the maximum military preparations could be made?

General MILES. I knew that it was the desire of the War Department Chief of Staff, Secretary of War, that we obtain as much time as possible to increase particularly the forces in the Philippines, particularly the air forces in the [2128] Philippines.

Mr. GESELL. Did you participate in the drafting of the joint memorandum of November 5 which Admiral Stark and General Marshall submitted to the President? Are you familiar with that memorandum?

General MILES. I have seen that memorandum, and so far as my recollection goes, I am fairly certain in saying I had no part in its drafting.

Mr. GESELL. Your participation in that matter then was confined to making an estimate of the possibility of Japanese advance in the area of China which was under discussion at that time?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Were you consulted at all in connection with the Joint memorandum which General Marshall and Admiral Stark sent to the President under date of November 27? Are you familiar with that memorandum?

General MILES. I would like to refresh my memory. Can you refer to it, or let me see it?

Mr. GESELL. That is Exhibit 17. Perhaps this would be an appropriate place to adjourn, Mr. Chairman. The witness can be shown that over the recess.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The committee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 4 p. m., the committee recessed until 10 a. m., Friday, November 30, 1945.)

[2129]

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[2130] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.
Counsel will proceed with General Miles.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES (Resumed)

Mr. GESELL. General Miles, I understand that you have one or two matters that you wish to bring to the committee's attention by way of amendment of your testimony yesterday. Would you please do that before we get under way?

General MILES. Yes, sir. There are a few points that I note in reading the transcript in which I was not as clear as I might be.

On page 2071 of the transcript, you suggested in a question to me that the digests and estimates of the Military Intelligence Division which I had referred to as static information had little evaluation material contained therein. It was a fairly long question, and I answered, "Generally speaking, yes, sir. But we also, of course, express definite opinion as to the efficiency of the various forces that we were discussing."

That is not wholly a complete answer. The digests and estimates on foreign countries were thoroughly evaluated. We had plenty of time, generally, to do that as they were static and encyclopedic information.

Mr. GESELL. Before you go on with that, I gathered [2131] from the testimony when you referred to static information, you meant background information as opposed to information requiring some immediate action. Would that be a fair statement?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

On page 2094 of the transcript, you asked:

Would it be fair to say that this magic information was the most reliable and authentic information which the War Department was receiving as to Japanese intentions and activities?

My reply was, "Yes, sir."

That also is an inadequate reply. It was the most reliable and authentic information which we received as to Japanese diplomatic intentions and activities, the activities, as far as we could read them, of the controlling Japanese Government. But we went much further afield in seeking information of Japanese military intentions and activities.

Then on page 2108, you asked, "Was any effort made"—by the Military Intelligence Division—"to get additional manpower of this specialized type"—SIS—"that may have been required?"

I replied, "I think that manpower was being provided as fast as the two services could provide it. It had to be [2132] very specially trained manpower."

That also is an inadequate answer. As a matter of fact, as I have since looked up and found, we, for many months before Pearl Harbor, were lending to SIS one of our specially trained language officers. We ran through at least five whose names we can now remember, and one of them was on duty at the time of Pearl Harbor. We were not permitted by the personnel policies of the War Department to lend more than one at a time.

There was a limitation on actual number of officers allowed the Military Intelligence Division.

We also furnished the SIS from time to time the names of civilians who were competent to do this work. That had to be a very special selection. In the first place telegraphic Japanese is a language within a language. There were very few people then and there are very few people now capable of translating it into English.

Furthermore, we had to be particularly careful as to security. We could have probably gotten a considerable number of Nisei Japanese to do this work, but we were limited always, not only to American citizens, but to American citizens whom we knew, and knew all about. Specifically, two young men were furnished that we can remember to SIS, whom we very carefully went over and provided.

[2133] Lastly, I would like to expand, if I may, my answer to your request for a general description of the operations of the Military Intelligence Division, found on pages 2060 and 2061 of the transcript.

Beginning with the Far Eastern Section of the Military Intelligence Branch, with which this committee is mostly concerned, I should like to note that the operations of that branch can perhaps be best judged summarily by a glance at the summary of far eastern documents which is now a part of the record before this committee, and which is supported by some 15 volumes of photostats of the actual documents gotten out and disseminated in the same way by the Far Eastern Section in the years 1937-41.

Then going out from that particular section, let me note the four sections concerned in the Intelligence Division in Europe, and the Empire Section. We were still primarily concerned, up to November 1941, with the European war, the outcome of that war. We were still feverishly preparing for what we called hemispheric defense. The success of German arms was the most obvious threat to the Western Hemisphere.

We were lining up against the Axis with our lease-lend, and other means, but hemispheric defense was vulnerable through the bulge of Brazil.

[2134] That brings up the Latin-American Section of the Military Intelligence Division. Intelligence Branch, we will say, or subsection.

A side line of all of this work was the several Army schools into which we fitted Latin-American officers, arranged for their transportation to and fro, and so forth.

We also conducted two quite extensive tours for senior Latin-American officers through our training camps, and war plants.

[2135] The Dissemination Section prepared and sent out to the Army a series of tentative lessons, special bulletins on the war then waging. We were trying desperately to furnish our own people, the expanding Army, with information as to how the new war was being waged and what developments were taking place.

What did the Air Corps want to know? What did the Ordnance want to know, the Medical Corps, and so forth? We had a New York office which eventually furnished, and it was at that time furnishing, a great deal of information, later used by the Air Forces in their bombing targets. We got this information from certain civilian concerns that had detailed information of German and even of Japanese installations of great importance.

But that was only a very small part of it. Our Counter-Intelligence Branch was very extensive. We were one of the three agencies in Washington especially designated by the President to concern ourselves with all counter-intelligence activities, and we worked with two other agencies, the FBI and ONI in great detail.

The whole question of plant protection was up at that time, and the question of sabotage, strikes, labor agitation, and so forth; recommendations on the applications of aliens for employment in classified contracts, all had to be passed [2135] through us. We even sat on a committee with the FBI and ONI in the State Department passing on all passport controls issued by the Government at that time.

We were organizing and schooling and training a corps of intelligence police, something new that had to be put in in time of war.

We wrote the first antififth-column plan ever drawn up in the United States, and had considerable difficulty in writing it.

We also put into the Army a counter-subversive system by which we could gage, I hoped we could gage, any subversive activities going in the Army itself.

We ran Army extension courses in Military Intelligence for the Reserve officers and for newly appointed officers.

The geographic section of the Plans and Training Branch was expanding enormously. We knew the need very definitely for maps of all sort, and we were coordinating. We were the only coordinating branch for military graphic information between the various agencies of the Government then producing maps, such as the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and so forth, and our own Engineer Air Corps mapping activities.

In addition to that, of course, we ran all our own military attachés and took care of all the foreign military attachés and missions here in Washington. We ran language [2137] schools in Japanese and Chinese and Russian for our own officers. We had a translation section doing an enormous amount of work in translation of various documents and magazine articles, and so forth, which were appearing of interest to the service.

We ran an office in New York which got out six foreign-language dictionaries, the only ones that were in existence when we actually got into war. They were, as I remember, German, French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, and Russian.

Mr. GESELL. I think, General, that gives us an idea of the very divergent and extensive activities of the division.

General MILES. I do not want to extend it too long. Simply in the interest of the division of which I was immensely proud, I want to get before the committee the fact that we were doing quite a number of things in those days.

Mr. GESELL. I meant to ask you, in that connection, when we were discussing your military experience, whether prior to becoming G-2 you had ever had any experience in the intelligence field?

General MILES. Yes, sir; quite a lot. I first joined Military Intelligence as a young officer in 1912 when I went abroad as military attaché for five countries, later ending up in Russia in the last war as an observer for the Russian Army. I mean the next to the last war. I served other times [2138] as military attaché. I served in the Military Division immediately after the First World War and also as an officer attached to the American Peace Commission in 1919.

Mr. GESELL. I think when we closed yesterday I had asked you whether you had anything to do with the joint memorandum which General Marshall and Admiral Stark sent to the President under date of November 27, which is exhibit 17 in this hearing.

General MILES. To the best of my knowledge and belief, I had no hand in it.

Mr. GESELL. Now, before going on, I want to return to the intercepts for a moment to see if I can clarify one or two points.

I asked you yesterday whether any of the messages which had been intercepted and translated were sent to the overseas departments and particularly Hawaii by the Army, and you said they were not.

Now, I want to be sure we understand. I take it your testimony is that the text of the messages as intercepted was not so transmitted; is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct, and also the essential information was not generally transmitted; in fact, it was only in rare cases.

Mr. GESELL. That is the point I wanted to get at. The same considerations which you have testified to of security [2139] which governed not sending the actual text of the message to Hawaii, let's say, applied equally as far as paraphrases or summaries or gists of the messages is concerned; is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct; and I would like to revert to what I said yesterday, that the heart and essence of this very important secret was the fact that we could break this code, not the message itself, and had the Japanese learned that we were transmitting, say to Hawaii, information which we could have received only by breaking their code, the secret would have been out just as clearly as if we had sent the text of the message itself.

Mr. GESELL. Now, you did state, at page 2091 :

In some cases the substance of some messages were sent to Hawaii, and almost always in naval code, I think always in naval code, because the naval code was considered to be more secure than the Army code.

Could you amplify that for us? That indicates that a summary or substance or gist of whatever you want to call it of the message was sent by the Navy, as you state, in some cases. Did the Army have anything to do with that?

General MILES. Oh, yes, sir. We certainly knew that it was being sent by Navy and that was quite satisfactory to us. I remember two cases specifically when we first learned from [2140] magic that orders had been issued by the Japanese to certain embassies and legations to burn their codes and I think you will find that that information was transmitted by Navy to the overseas departments, or to the fleet, which meant the same thing.

Mr. GESELL. You are referring then to what were in effect joint messages which were sent by the Army and Navy when something of a special significance such as that developed; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir; they were joint in the sense that we had every reason to believe, thought we had, that a message sent by Navy code would always be transmitted by them to their opposite numbers in the Army command.

Mr. GESELL. Did you have any understanding that the Navy as a regular matter of practice was sending to Hawaii the information contained in these magic intercepts?

General MILES. I knew they were not doing so as a regular matter of practice for the reasons I have given, sir.

Mr. GESELL. I gather, then, from your testimony that your reference at page 2091 which I read, in some cases the substance being sent by the Navy, had to do with very special circumstances and didn't relate to a general practice of sending out that information?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

[2141] Mr. GESELL. In those instances, where the Navy sent the information, was that after consultation with you or someone on your staff?

General MILES. I believe I am correct in saying it was at least, I am sure, with our knowledge.

Mr. GESELL. Were you aware of the fact that over the period up to July 1941 the Navy had been sending to their representatives in Hawaii rather detailed summaries and in some cases the actual text of intercepted magic messages?

General MILES. I believe that I must have been aware of it at that time, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Was that under any arrangement or understanding with the Army?

General MILES. That I do not remember specifically, but I do know that during all that period our liaison with the Office of Naval Intelligence was such as to make me believe that it was our understanding.

Mr. GESELL. Well, were you aware of the fact that in July 1941, or thereabouts, the Navy discontinued that practice and ceased sending such detailed summaries of the intercepts to Hawaii?

General MILES. I believe, for the reasons that I have given, that is, liaison, that I must have been aware of that fact at that time.

[2142] Mr. GESELL. Were you consulted in connection with the question of discontinuing the sending of that information?

General MILES. I do not remember specifically being consulted but I do remember clearly that during that summer and the months preceding Pearl Harbor we were at all times progressively closing in on this secret, trying to protect the essential secret that we were breaking codes.

Mr. GESELL. Do I gather from that then that the decision to discontinue the distribution of this magic information through Navy channels, which appears to have taken effect sometime in July 1941, was a joint decision of the Army and the Navy for security reasons?

General MILES. It was certainly based on a joint policy of the Army and Navy to close in on this secret. Now, just what conferences were held I am not at this time able to recollect.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall participating in any conferences on that?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall any consideration being given to the question whether the discontinuance was of such a nature that the theater commanders should be advised that a change in policy was taking place?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not now recall any such [2143] discussion.

Mr. GESELL. Do you know whether Admiral Kimmel or General Short was advised that a more tight control of this information for security reasons was being inaugurated?

General MILES. They were not so advised to my knowledge.

Mr. GESELL. Was it your understanding that the information that the Navy was sending prior to July was information which would be passed on to the Army representatives at Hawaii?

General MILES. Yes, sir; it was.

Mr. GESELL. Did you give consideration then to advising the Army representatives at Hawaii that the information would not be sent after, say, sometime in July?

General MILES. No, not specifically. I don't think we had ever informed them that they were getting this magic. The Navy was giving them the essence of certain information we received from magic, but I do not remember that they had been informed of the source, nor was there any reason, therefore, to tell them we were discontinuing that particular source.

Mr. GESELL. Now, when I have been asking you whether that magic information was distributed by the Army to Hawaii and you have answered in the negative, your answer applies to the entire War Department, does it not, not just to G-2, since the dissemination of information was a responsibility [2144] of G-2?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, just how far, General, did this question of security go in this regard? To take an extreme case, assuming you had intercepted a message in which the Japanese said that they planned to attack Pearl Harbor on the 7th of December at dawn. I take it I am correct in assuming that that message would have been transmitted to Hawaii for their information?

General MILES. It would have been, by the Chief of Staff. I think that case is similar to the one which actually occurred on the morning of December 7. We didn't know where this attack was coming but we very much feared an attack would come coincident with the 1 p. m. delivery of the Japanese reply and my action then was to bring this to the notice of the Chief of Staff so that an additional warning would be sent out.

Mr. GESELL. Am I correct that where the information from the intercepts was of such a nature that you felt it required some specific action by the commanders at Hawaii, you would bring that information to the attention of the Chief of Staff so that he might take such action as he felt necessary in advising the Hawaiian officers of the information you had?

[2145] General MILES. That is absolutely correct. G-2 had to be very careful that the information that he sent to General Short or General MacArthur didn't, ipso facto, practically force their hands into some definite military decision of importance. If the Chief of Staff desired such information to be sent to them, which would affect their military dispositions or inaugurate their war plans, it should definitely come through the command channels.

[2146] Mr. GESELL. Then, in other words, while you weren't as a matter of fact or procedure sending the text of the messages, or the gist of them, or a summary of them to the theaters, it was, even in the face of these security considerations, always open to the Chief of Staff to send specific instructions or directions to the commanders at Hawaii or the Philippines, or elsewhere, based on the information which had been obtained from the intercepts?

General MILES. That is true; and at that point I think I should like to go further and point out that from early August, I think it was the 5th of August, 1941, we discontinued, by direction of the Chief of Staff, presenting magic in evaluated form, so the Chief of Staff and the Chief of the War Plans Division Section of War, were, from then on, doing their own evaluation of the raw material that we were presenting to them in the form of magic.

Mr. GESELL. You mean that from August on, G-2 had no responsibility to evaluate the intercepted material?

General MILES. No, sir, I do not mean that, but I do mean that our responsibility in that respect was somewhat lessened by the direction of the Chief of Staff that he wanted not only the evaluation of the Military Intelligence Division, he wanted the material itself presented, the raw material itself, presented to him.

[2147] Mr. GESELL. But it was always still open to you to go to the Chief of Staff or any other officer concerned and present orally your evaluation of the circumstances?

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. GESELL. On the other hand, the Chief of Staff and the other officers that you mentioned also had in their hands the raw material to make their own evaluation?

General MILES. That is true, yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. That is the point.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. There is another point in the record that is not quite clear on this point. I asked you whether the Army had facilities at Hawaii for intercepting, translating and decoding the magic material and you answered "no." You referred to a Navy intercept station at Hawaii. Do you know whether or not the Navy had facilities at Hawaii which enabled them to intercept, translate and decode the magic messages?

General MILES. I believe not, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, was that condition at Hawaii the same condition as prevailed in the other overseas departments or was it, on the contrary, the fact that in the Philippines, or in some other points, facilities were available for interception, translation and decoding of these magic [2148] messages?

General MILES. There were no Army facilities capable of performing all three of those functions outside of Washington.

Mr. GESELL. Do you know whether there were naval facilities at any point outside of Washington capable of performing those three functions?

General MILES. Of that, I am not sure, sir, and would much prefer that the question be answered by the naval witnesses who will appear before the committee.

Mr. GESELL. We will ask Admiral Wilkinson that question when he takes the stand.

Now, on the mechanical side—

General MILES. May I make one point clear?

Mr. GESELL. Yes.

General MILES. My testimony is perhaps not quite clear. I understood, sir, that you were referring to all three of these functions when you spoke of Hawaii, and I said we had no service capable of performing all these three functions. I now know there was a monitoring station in Hawaii capable of picking the Japanese codes out of the air, but that is all they could do.

Mr. GESELL. The coded messages?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

[2149] Mr. GESELL. But they couldn't read them.

Mr. KEEFE. That was an Army station?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. It had no reference to the Communications Commission monitoring stations out there?

General MILES. As well as the FCC. I understand there was also an FCC and a Navy.

Mr. KEEFE. I wanted to be sure what you were referring to in your testimony was the Army.

General MILES. That was the question I was asked, Mr. Congressman, the Army.

Mr. GESELL. Well, do you know whether or not the Federal Communications Commission had any facilities at Hawaii such as would make it possible for them to perform these three functions of intercepting or monitoring, translating, and decoding?

General MILES. I know that they did not, at Hawaii or any other place.

Mr. GESELL. And so far as the Army is concerned, the only place where these three functions could be performed was at Washington, D. C.?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, we have been referring to these magic communications, and I think perhaps we ought to [2150] clarify on the record just what facilities the Japanese were using for transmitting the messages. Am I correct in understanding that their messages were sent by radio in most instances?

General MILES. In most instances, I believe that is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, there were other facilities for communication available to the Japanese, were there not?

General MILES. There were.

[2115] Mr. GESELL. They could, of course, use the mails to communicate back and forth. Was there any scrutiny of the mails?

General MILES. Not to my knowledge, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, it is also apparent, is it not, that the Japanese could have used the commercial cable system?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Were we in a position to monitor messages sent over commercial cables?

General MILES. I believe we were, but I deliberately did not know anything about the details of how we got the messages from the commercial cables. It was not within my scope and I thought the less I knew about it the better.

Mr. GESELL. Would that be a subject to be considered with appropriate officers of the Signal Service?

General MILES. Yes, sir. They would know more about it than I do.

Mr. GESELL. Would your answer be the same with respect to telephonic communications?

General MILES. There was a law of Congress on the books in those days, sir, that imposed pretty heavy penalties on tapping telephone wires. So far as I know it was not done by the Army.

Mr. GESELL. Either telephone wires here or telephone [2152] wires in and out of Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. That applied to all American territory, sir.

Mr. GESELL. In referring to the laws you are referring to the provisions of the Federal Communication Act, are you?

General MILES. I do not remember which act it was, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, when a message was intercepted, I gather from what you say in your previous testimony that it might have been intercepted by the Army or it might have been intercepted by the Navy?

General MILES. Yes, sir, or the Federal Communications Commission.

Mr. GESELL. Now, did the Army and the Navy each receive the text of the Japanese message intercepted regardless of which branch did the actual interception?

General MILES. That is a detail of the joint operation of the S. I. S. and naval communications that I do not know, sir, but you will have witnesses before you who can answer that question.

Mr. GESELL. Now, at this time, General Miles, were there any orders in effect which required G-2 to send particular types of information to the overseas commanders?

General MILES. No, sir, only the general provisions [2153] of Army regulation 10-15 that put the responsibility for the dissemination of information—a broad term—in the hands of the Military Intelligence Division.

Mr. GESELL. What I was getting at was this: Take the position of any overseas commander such as General Short who, presumably, would be familiar with Army Regulations and procedure; I was wondering whether he in such a position had under prevailing orders and regulations any reason to feel that any particular type of information would be disseminated to him as a matter of course?

General MILES. I do not know that that would be covered by any orders or regulations. By the custom of the service I am sure that an officer of the experience of General Short or General MacArthur would have known that the Military Intelligence Division was supplying his command, and had been for some time, with a great deal of what we have called static information, a great deal of information on a possible enemy such as Japan, and by that the Japanese Army, and so forth, and that the War Department itself, the General Staff itself, would, one branch or another, supply him with information which would affect his military movements or instigate the war plans.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, my question is a bit more precise than that. I take it that he would from past practice have [2154] a reason to feel that certain information would be sent him, but my question was, rather, whether under orders and established procedures which were in effect at that time he had any reason to feel that any particular type of information would be required to be sent to him by G-2?

General MILES. I do not want to answer vaguely but I do not know that I can make the answer any more specific than that, sir. By custom and long custom certain information was gotten out by the Military Intelligence Division to all overseas departments. That comprised a great many different types of information. I am really trying to find out just exactly what you are getting at.

Mr. GESELL. Let us come down specifically again to this magic material. That was material which indicated diplomatic moves and, to some extent contained military information of a specific character related to Hawaii.

Did the prevailing orders, regulations, and procedures of the Army at that time specify that that type of information, either in summary form or evaluated form, had to be sent to General Short?

General MILES. I know of no such orders or regulations which specified anything like that, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The question of what information was sent, therefore, under the orders do I understand to have been a [2155] matter within the discretion of the General Staff?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, I want to turn to a somewhat different subject but closely related to this, General, and ask you whether prior to December 7, G-2 had reached any conclusions on the question of imminence of war between Japan and the United States and, if so, what its conclusions were?

General MILES. G-2 is a term used, as you said yesterday, to describe the Military Intelligence Division. It was also a term used to describe one person at the head of the Military Intelligence Division.

Mr. GESELL. Let us take the Division first.

General MILES. What?

Mr. GESELL. Let us take the Division first.

General MILES. The Division first, all right.

I think it can safely be said that my Far East section consistently rated higher for many, many months the probability of war with Japan than did the Intelligence Branch of the Division or myself. They would have been less than human and certainly less than efficient if they had not. They were a group of men who devoted a large part of their careers to a study of the far eastern situation, who were concentrating their every thought on this one specific sector of the world. [2156] It was perfectly natural for them that they should think that their particular devil was the big devil.

I like to say that in trying to answer the question what did the Military Intelligence Division think. The estimates of the far-eastern section, of the very able and capable men that I had there, were then processed, as I say, through the estimating section and through the head of the Intelligence Branch, and then they came to me.

Now, immediately they got out of the far-eastern section they got into the much bigger picture that we were considering in those days, watching a very desperate war in Europe that seemed to hold possibilities of direct threat to the security of the United States and the whole of the activities of Latin America, and so forth, and so forth.

Now, may I speak for myself? I should say that—I am reading some notes I have here because I knew this was one of the questions I was to be asked, and to save time I put it out.

I should say that in mid-November my estimate might be summed up in this way: One thing we felt sure of was that Japan faced a crisis which would almost certainly result in radical action on her part. She had been unsuccessful in her military venture against Russia in 1939 and she had been [2157] none too successful in her long and costly war against China. Her military clique was losing face, although gaining power. We were closing in on her economically in our embargoes and other measures, but her radical action might take one or more of many forms. She might give direct aid to her Axis partners by an attack on Russia. She might seek further outlet to the south by a seizure, under some camouflage, of the Dutch East Indies. She might go for the wealth of Hong Kong and the Federated Malay States, or Thailand, or Burma. She might further increase her war efforts against China.

I remember during the months preceding Pearl Harbor a Chinese military attaché coming to me at least twice to discuss their fears that the Western powers closing in on Japan might force Japan to throw her whole effort against China to wipe her out.

Lastly, Japan might add to the enormous burden to her already strained military resources by attacking simultaneously the two great naval powers of the world. Only the latter alternative would surely involve the United States. I doubted whether, at that time, we would have gone to war in defense of the Dutch, the Siamese, or even the British in the Far East, and certainly not the Chinese or the Russians.

[2158] Mr. GESELL. Do I gather from what you have just stated, General Miles, that prior to December 7 you personally at least had not reached the conclusion in your own mind that there was an immediate possibility of hostilities between the United States and Japan?

General MILES. Oh, no, sir; that is not so. The crisis that resulted in General Marshall's telegram of November 27 certainly indicated that the possibility of a war between the United States and Japan had very much increased.

By the 3d of December, when we knew that they were burning their codes, one would have rated that possibility, now well within the realms of probability, now even higher, so that if you are asking me on December 7 I am quite sure in saying that I would have rated quite highly the probability of an involvement immediate, or certainly in the fairly near future, of a Japanese-American war.

I remember on the 6th of December saying good-bye to an old naval friend of mine, Admiral Kincaid, who was leaving to take command of his division of cruisers, and telling him that I hoped he would hurry because I did not know whether he would make it or not.

Mr. GESELL. Well, now, I would like to direct your attention for a moment to item 28 of the exhibit of estimates, which was introduced yesterday, exhibit 33. That is dated [2159] December 5, 1941, and appears to be the last of these periodical estimates of the situation which was submitted prior to the attack and turning to section 6, toward the end of that document, entitled, "The Far East Theatre," I see that you list a number of possibilities, stating that the initiative rests with Japan, as lines of action open to Japan and under none of those headings do I find any reference to the possibility of Japan being involved in war with the United States.

General MILES. Heading "E," "attack the Philippines and Hong Kong."

Mr. GESELL. Well, you felt that such an attack would precipitate the United States in war?

General MILES. I did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Am I correct in gathering from this document and from others where the estimate of Japan's course of action is made from time to time, that are also contained in this exhibit, that the various items A to I which are printed here represented throughout this period preceding the attack the estimate of the variety of courses of action which were open to Japan?

General MILES. Yes, sir. We were trying in this document to list the various possible lines of action open to Japan.

[2160] Mr. KEEFE. What is that exhibit number, Mr. Gesell?

Mr. GESELL. 33.

You appear to have made a similar estimate on November 2, another on November 27, and another on November 29, which substantially state the same alternates of courses of action open to Japan?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, did these courses of action represent your views and the views of the Far Eastern Division?

General MILES. They did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Did the Far Eastern Division rate during this period higher than you did the possibility of United States involvement in a war through an attack on the Philippines or United States territory?

General MILES. I believe that that was so and, as I said, consistently the Far Eastern Section rated that probability or possibility a little higher than I did.

Mr. GESELL. Did you at any time prior to December 7 have any information of any nature which indicated the point at which Japan would be most likely to attack the United States?

General MILES. None that I remember, except that rumor in January that came from Tokyo, from some Latin-American ambassador, that Japan would attack Hawaii, which was dis- [2161] counted both by Naval and Military Intelligence, and the ship information message, particularly the one you called my attention to yesterday, which as I pointed out at the time were only one of many and more so, actually, by an attack in perhaps the Philippines, Panama, and other parts of the world. We had no specific information then that the attack would fall on Hawaii.

Mr. GESELL. Will you explain why the Military Intelligence Division discounted the report from Ambassador Grew of January 1941 concerning the possibility of a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. One, because it was inconceivable that any sources in the know in Japan would have communicated that to the Latin-American Ambassador, I believe the Peruvian; and, second, for a great many years we had known that a Japanese surprise attack on Pearl Harbor was always possible. It was inherent as a possibility in any war in which we became involved with Japan.

Perhaps at this point I should invite attention to the fact that the great fortress of Oahu—and it was one of the great fortresses of the world—was built solely for one purpose, the defense of that naval base against one sole enemy, Japan, the only enemy in the world that could put on a real attack against that naval base, and the Congress of [2162] the United States in appropriating that money from time to time, and it was quite a bit of money, must also have had that in mind.

So that an attack on Hawaii was inherent in any war in which we might become involved with Japan. That is why we built the fortress. A surprise attack by the Japanese was inherent in view of the character of the Japanese.

Mr. GESELL. Well, you have not quite explained why you discounted the report. I would gather from what you said that that report would seem to tie in with the estimates that you had made of the situation, that Pearl Harbor was perhaps a likely point of attack and that the Japanese were likely to use surprise.

General MILES. Oh, I beg your pardon, sir. I discounted that report that came from the Peruvian Ambassador as being a bona fide piece of information that he got from a responsible Japanese source. I did not at any time discount the possibility of a Japanese surprise attack on Hawaii.

Mr. GESELL. You say that over the period of years before the attack it had been always considered that the Japanese might attack Pearl Harbor. Could you give us a bit more information on that?

General MILES. I have already pointed out that the only reason of being for the fortress at Oahu was a defense [2163] against a Japanese attack if we became involved in a war with Japan.

I have already testified that I was operations officer in Hawaii for 3 years, 1929 to 1932, and in charge of the Hawaiian War Plans Division in Washington from 1934 to 1938.

Now, during all those 7 years that the defense plans were under my supervision, or certainly with my very intimate knowledge, a surprise attack by the Japanese on Hawaii, made with little or no warning, was a basic consideration in the defense plans.

Many times I have drawn up a maneuver in war games situations on the assumption of a Japanese attack following a short period of strained relations.

We also assumed generally that we would not have the assistance of the United States Fleet, which might well be blocked in the Atlantic.

Mr. KEEFE. I did not get that last.

General MILES. We also assumed generally that we would not have the assistance of the United States Fleet, which might well be blocked in the Atlantic.

After all these years of planning for defense against a single enemy, with little or no warning, I had no doubt that the messages of November 27 following long months of [2164] strained relations, would effect the immediate and complete alert of the fortress.

Mr. KEEFE. Will you read that last? I did not get that.

Mr. GESELL. Would you read the question, Mr. Reporter, and let General Miles answer the question, again.

(Whereupon the question was read by the reporter as follows:)

You say that over the period of years before the attack it had been always considered that the Japanese might attack Pearl Harbor. Could you give us a bit more information on that?

Mr. GESELL. Proceed to finish your answer, General Miles.

General MILES. Many times I have drawn up maneuvers in war-game situations under the assumption of an all-out Japanese attack following a short period of strained diplomatic relations.

These, you understand, are hypothetical assumptions on which you base a maneuver or a war game.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. I am unable to see the witness at times and I want to know whether or not he read that answer from a memorandum, or any part of it.

[2165] General MILES. Senator, I am reading from rough notes that I have prepared knowing that certain questions would probably be asked me. This is the fifth time I have testified on Pearl Harbor. I did this in order to save the time of the committee, among other things. I have drawn up some notes so I could answer certain questions.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that entire answer in your notes?

General MILES. No, sir. I am interpolating.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could he designate on the record what part was read from his notes?

Mr. GESELL. Well, he has not completed his answer, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. The general has not completed his answer. The Chair does not know whether, as he goes along, he can indicate what part of his language is taken from notes and what part is extemporaneous.

General MILES. These notes were made only the other day so that they are practically all the same thing. May I continue?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General MILES. Many times I have drawn up a maneuver in war-game situations on the assumption of an all-out Japanese attack following a short period of strained relations.

[2166] We also assumed generally that we would not have the assistance of the United States Fleet, which might well be blocked in the Atlantic. After all these years of planning for defense against a single enemy with little or no warning I had no doubt that the messages of November 27 following long months of strained relations would effect the immediate and complete alert of the fortress.

Senator LUCAS. What does he mean by "those messages"?

Mr. GESELL. You are referring to the message of November 27 to the so-called warning message sent on that date, are you not, General? I want to come to that later if that is your reference.

General MILES. To that and to the one I sent to the G-2's.

Mr. GESELL. On the same date.

General MILES. On the same date.

Mr. GESELL. The committee will find those in—

Mr. KEEFE. This message that he referred to that was sent on the 27th, is that the message that was sent from General Marshall?

Mr. GESELL. Yes, and there is one from General Miles also.

Mr. KEEFE. To the G-2's in Hawaii?

General MILES. That is right, sir.

[2167] Mr. KEEFE. And those are the two messages you are referring to?

Mr. GESELL. We will come to those two messages when we come to an examination of the first message.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. GESELL. But I was interested at this time, General Miles, in getting a full understanding of the considerations which led you to feel that there was a possibility, shall we say, of the Japanese attacking Pearl Harbor in the event of hostilities with the United States and of that attack being made without prior warning.

I gather that while you were out there you had actually war-gamed attacks somewhat of the character which took place, is that correct?

General MILES. Somewhat of the character; yes, sir. We tried to consider all possible situations.

Mr. GESELL. Was the possibility of an attack being made on a weekend or on a Sunday one of the considerations?

General MILES. I remember one war game that I got up and that we played of an attack right straight into Honolulu Harbor, landing troops early on a Sunday morning.

Mr. GESELL. Was the possibility of an air attack launched from carriers at dawn one of the factors which was considered in these war games?

[2168] General MILES. Very definitely. I remember during the maneuvers of 1932, when the fleet was out there—I am not sure whether a carrier was in that fleet or not, it was pretty early in the development of naval carriers, but I do remember that there was a great deal of discussion as to attacks by air and later on, after I left Hawaii and was here in the War Plans, there was a very considerable correspondence initiated by General Drum, then commanding the Hawaiian Division, on defenses against a surprise carrier attack.

I have recently seen those papers. They are very interesting as to the different factors, as to the time factors.

Mr. KEEFE. As to the what?

General MILES. As to the time factors involved, how far the Japanese would be away when they launched the planes, and so forth, and then approach by night for this dawn attack.

Mr. GESELL. I am sure the committee would be interested in seeing that correspondence. Can you indicate about what the date of it was so that we might make arrangements to get it?

General MILES. General Drum went to Hawaii, as I remember, in 1935. It would have been 1935 or 1936. I have seen that correspondence recently in the War Plans Division and I can get it for the committee if you so desire.

[2169] Mr. GESELL. I wish you would. I am sure the committee would like to have it.¹

Continuing on this same general line of questioning, did these plans and estimates recognize that Japan had it within her power to launch such an attack directly from Japan itself?

General MILES. Yes, sir. There was what is known as, what we used to call, the vacant sea.

Mr. GESELL. What do you mean by the "vacant sea"?

General MILES. A great stretch of that wild ocean in the Pacific which lies between the trade routes going from Honolulu to the Far East and Japan and the big circle trade route from the West Coast going all the way up via the Aleutians to Japan. There is, or we were so told at that time, an immense body of water in there in which there is very little traffic.

Mr. GESELL. The vacant sea was the course which the Japs actually followed in making the attack, is it not?

General MILES. That I do not know, sir. From what I have heard of our information I imagine that is true. I have not plotted that out or seen it plotted out.

Mr. GESELL. Well, I will get the exhibit where it is plotted out, so we may have your answer to that question.

Referring, General, to exhibit 6, item 18, you will [2170] see on there the track of the Japanese attacking force and I ask you whether or not that attack did not take place through the area which you have indicated was sometimes called the vacant sea?

General MILES. Most of the course of the Japanese task force, as indicated on this map, lies in what we called the vacant sea. They did cross, apparently, the northern trade route where, presumably, it would have been a little broader than probably down the coast of Japan.

Mr. GESELL. Well, General, did you have any information at the time concerning the orders which were issued by the Chief of Naval Operations in October 1941 routing all American shipping southward through the Torres Straits?

General MILES. Yes, sir, I remember having such information.

Mr. GESELL. Were you consulted in any way in connection with the issuance of that order?

General MILES. No, sir; I was not.

Mr. GESELL. Can you state to the committee what knowledge you have as to the facts and circumstances which led to its issuance?

General MILES. I only remember, sir, that the War and Navy Departments were considerably worried about some convoys that we had at sea at that time and were attempting to route [2171] them where we thought at least they would be least likely to be attacked.

¹ Read into the record infra, p. 868 et seq.

Mr. GESELL. Was it recognized and discussed at that time that such an order might have as one of its effects the elimination of traffic in the area where the Japanese advanced?

General MILES. I do not think so, sir. I certainly remember no such discussion and, as a matter of fact, there was very little traffic in that vacant sea at any time.

[2172] Mr. GESELL. Now, in this same connection, General, you were aware, were you not, that the Island of Oahu was, if I may state it that way, particularly vulnerable to espionage activities?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I knew that very well.

Mr. GEARHART. May I inquire as to the date of the Torres Strait order?

Mr. GESELL. I think it is October 17.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, does counsel also recall whether there was one on the 25th of November?

Mr. GESELL. The first order was, I think, in October. There is another one, Senator Ferguson indicates, subsequently issued to the same effect.

Having in mind, General Miles, this possibility of the Japs launching an attack directly from Japan, the existence of a vacant sea, the vulnerability of the island to espionage, and some of the other considerations we have been discussing, you recognized, did you not, that the defense of the island was, in large measure, dependent upon the establishment of an adequate reconnaissance?

General MILES. I did, sir. For a great many years, I thought it was pretty clearly established there was no possible way of catching a surprise attack before it actually fell, except from the Hawaiian end, by reconnaissance.

[2173] I made a statement before the Army Pearl Harbor Board which was taken up in their report, intimating rather a disagreement with it, but I would like to read it, because it is perfectly true:

I do not think any Intelligence officer ever thought that he could be sure of picking up a convoy or attack force or task force in Japan before it sailed, and know where it was going. That was beyond our dreams of efficiency. We simply could not do it.

We knew a surprise attack was possible. We knew all of the advantages which would accrue to Japan in a war with the United States if she attacked Hawaii, and all the disadvantages which would accrue to us. There were those two vulnerable places, Hawaii and Panama, which would be essential to us in a war with Japan and essential to Japan to knock out if she possibly could. But we knew also that there was no possible way that we could see of warding off or detecting a surprise attack, except by reconnaissance from Hawaii, whether that reconnaissance was air, or surface, or subsurface, or radar.

Mr. GESELL. Having in mind the need for such reconnaissance and the inability of an intelligence service to obtain the information through its own machinery, did you ever make any inquiry during these weeks immediately preceding [2174] the attack as to whether or not a reconnaissance was in fact being conducted?

General MILES. I did not, sir. That was not at all within the responsibilities of military intelligence.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall that matter being discussed by other officers of the General Staff during that period?

General MILES. I remember it was certainly brought to my attention by the inclusion of the directive for reconnaissance in General Marshall's message sent out to all overseas departments.

Mr. GESELL. On November 27?

General MILES. On November 27.

Mr. GESELL. Except for that instance, do you recall the matter being discussed?

General MILES. I do not, sir.

[2175] Mr. GESELL. I want to direct your attention at this point to item 25 of exhibit 33, a memorandum written by you to the Chief of Staff under date of November 26, 1941, in which you refer to information concerning the disposition of the Japanese Fleet, and I direct your attention to the paragraph numbered 2, reading as follows:

The combined Air Force has assembled in Takao, Formosa, with some units believed in Hainan Island. The Third Fleet is believed moving in direction of Takao and Bako, Pescadores off West Coast of Formosa, from home waters in Japan. Units from the Second Fleet are at present possibly enroute to South China as advance scouts. Strong concentration of submarines and air groups in the Marshalls.

Now this is the part that I want to address your attention to particularly:

Present location other units of this task force are not known.

Do you recall that memorandum?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. That indicates, does it not, that on November 26 you had information which was to the effect that we were not in a position to know the disposition of all of the units of the Japanese task forces?

[2176] General MILES. That is correct; but not surprising, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Had that condition occurred on earlier occasions?

General MILES. I cannot answer that question directly, but I would be very surprised to learn the Office of Naval Intelligence knew at all times the location of all the Japanese naval forces. They knew a great deal about it, and I was surprised at how much they did know.

Mr. GESELL. I quite recognize this is a subject we will want to pay particular attention to when Admiral Wilkinson is on the stand, but in view of the reference in your memorandum to the fact that the whereabouts of the units in the task force was not known, and in view of the date of the memorandum which, as we now know, was approximately the date when the Jap task force set out for Pearl Harbor, I wondered whether there had been any discussion concerning the inability to locate the task force at that time?

General MILES. I remember no such discussion, sir.

Mr. GESELL. And the fact that the task force disposition was not known did not, I gather from your prior testimony, lead to any specific consideration of the need for conducting the reconnaissance out of Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. Well, on the following day reconnaissance was ordered by the Chief of Staff of all overseas departments. [2177] It was an obvious precaution.

Mr. GESELL. Was the information contained in this memorandum one of the factors which led to the reference to reconnaissance in General Marshall's memorandum or warning message of November 27?

General MILES. I do not know, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, I want to turn with you to these various messages and review some of them with you.

I have exhibit 32 before me, General, entitled "Messages Between War Department and Hawaii from July 8 to December 7, 1941." Have you a copy of that in your hand?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The first message I wanted you to discuss is that appearing on page 2, dated July 25, 1941, which appears to be a joint dispatch from the Chief of Naval Operations and Chief of Staff, calling attention to the fact that on the following day the United States proposed to impose economic sanctions against Japan; that message being sent for action to various points, including Hawaii.

Do you recall that dispatch?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Did you participate in the discussions which led to its transmission?

General MILES. I do not remember any such participation [2178] and do not believe that I did participate.

Mr. GESELL. This dispatch was of particular interest to me, General, because it is the only dispatch which I have been able to find where the Army gave to the overseas areas advance information of what we might call contemplated diplomatic action.

The CHAIRMAN. Might I ask right there, there is a word or symbol there that I do not understand, "adees." What does that signify?

Mr. MITCHELL. Addressees.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. GESELL. Was there any particular reason why this specific diplomatic action was felt to be of such a nature as to require advance warning to the overseas area commanders?

General MILES. I do not know, sir. I do not believe that I had any hand in its preparation.

Mr. GESELL. Turning to the message on page 3, dated October 16, 1941, and to the message on page 4 dated October 20, 1941, I wish to ask whether you participated in the discussions leading up to the transmission of those messages?

In that connection, while you are getting your papers, I would like to offer for the record the memorandum dated October 18, 1941, for the Chief of Staff from Brigadier General Gerow, with reference to the dispatches in question. [2179] This will be designated as exhibit 34, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

(The document referred to was marked exhibit No. 34.)

Senator LUCAS. Will you read it into the record?

Mr. GESELL (reading):

OCTOBER 18, 1941.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:
Subject: Resignation of Japanese Cabinet.

1. The Navy dispatched the attached message on October 16. Our G-2 does not concur in the situation pictured by the Navy. War Plans Division agrees with G-2.
2. Navy dispositions may require adjustment and a special alert. This is not true for the Army.
3. Recommendation.

That the Secretary of War direct that secret radiograms, as follows, be sent to the Command General, United States Army Forces in the Far East and the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department; C. G. Western Defense Command.

"Following War Department estimate of Japanese situation for your information. Tension between United States and Japan remains strained but no repeat no abrupt change in Japanese foreign policy appears imminent end"

Do you recall this memorandum and the related messages,
[2180] General Miles?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. GESELL. Will you state your recollection of the discussions which took place at that time and the factors which led to the sending of the messages?

General MILES. I remember being consulted by General Gerow at War Plans Division as to whether or not we thought the naval message of October 16 gave a correct picture of the situation in Japan, due to the change of Cabinet, and saying that we did not; that we thought it might turn out to be correct, but we had no indication at that time that the new Cabinet would take the lines indicated in that naval message, that we had better wait a bit.

I do not actually remember seeing the memorandum that General Gerow sent to the Chief of Staff, but I do remember that I assisted in the preparation of the telegram that was sent out as a result.

[2181] Mr. GESELL. The November message, after referring to the resignation of the Japanese cabinet, stated, did it not, among other things, as follows:

Since the U. S. and Britain are held responsible by Japan for her present desperate situation, there is also a possibility that Japan may attack these two powers.

I gather that that was the portion of the message which the Army felt at that time was too strongly stated.

General MILES. I do not think so, sir. I think the next sentence was what we particularly objected to, that the possibility at that time, based solely on the change of Cabinet, the personnel of which we were not thoroughly acquainted with, or at least their views, should call for the precautions which the Navy message included. In other words, neither General Gerow nor I felt that the information which we had on the 18th of October warranted the statement contained in the October 16 message of the Navy, and particularly in the directives therein contained as to precautions and preparatory deployments, in the Navy message.

Mr. GESELL. Did you have any knowledge at that time as to the state of the alert of the Army command at Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. I do not remember that I had any [2182] knowledge, except that I know no alert, or message which would call for alert, had up to that point been sent by the War Department. But I do not think I knew whether the commanding general himself had put any of that in his command.

Mr. GESELL. The feeling that you and General Gerow had, if I understand you correctly, came down to this, then, did it, that you did not feel the change of the Cabinet created a situation which justified Washington ordering a specific alert, or state of preparedness on the part of the Hawaiian commander?

General MILES. I think that is a correct summary of it, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. That is the fall of the Konoye Cabinet and the assumption of power by Tojo; is that right, Mr. Gesell?

Mr. GESELL. I take it that is the reference, yes.

That is the reference, is it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir; the reference in the Navy telegram "Resignation of Japanese Cabinet is a grave situation," and so forth.

Mr. GESELL. Now, the next message, General Miles, is that on page 5.

Senator FERGUSON. May I just inquire on that message [2183] on page 4, who "Adams" is? I do not think that is clear.

Mr. GESELL. Adams is The Adjutant General, is he not?

General MILES. He was, sir.

Mr. GESELL. And his function was what with respect to the signing of messages of this character?

General MILES. He signed all messages for the War Department, except in the very exceptional circumstances where the Chief of Staff desired to sign his own name.

Mr. GESELL. Did Adjutant General Adams have any responsibility for the decision to send the message or to formulate the contents of the message?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. This, in effect, was a message from the General Staff which was transcribed and Adams' name was signed to it and then transmitted following the customary procedure.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The next message is that on page 5, dated November 24, 1941, from Chief of Naval Operations to the various naval posts in the Pacific and elsewhere, which again appears to be a joint message with the Army because of the instruction for the addressees to inform the senior Army officers in their areas, and the reference that shows [2184] a copy of the message was sent to the War Department. That message states, in part:

Chances of favorable outcome of negotiations with Japan very doubtful.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, these messages are not very long. It seems to me they are important enough to read them.

Mr. GESELL. I will.

Chances of favorable outcome of negotiations with Japan very doubtful. This situation coupled with statements of Japanese Government and movements their naval and military forces indicate in our opinion that a surprise aggressive movement in any direction, including attack on Philippines or Guam is a possibility. Chief of Staff has seen this dispatch, concurs and requests action aedes to inform senior Army officers their areas. Utmost secrecy necessary in order not to complicate an already tense situation or precipitate Japanese action. Guam will be informed separately.

Do you have any recollection of having participated in any conference or discussion which led to the transmission of that message, General Miles?

General MILES. I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Do you know of any Army officers that did participate in the drafting and transmission of that [2185] message?

General MILES. I do not know of any officer, of my own knowledge.

Mr. GESELL. I now wish to refer to the message at page 7. This is a message dated November 27, 1941, and signed by General Marshall, addressed to the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, Fort Shafter, T. H., Message No. 472.

Negotiations with Japan appear to be terminated to all practical purposes with only the barest possibilities that the Japanese Government might come back and offer to continue. Japanese future action unpredictable, but hostile action possible at any moment. If hostilities cannot, repeat cannot, be avoided, the United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act. This policy should not, repeat not, be construed as restricting you to a course of action that might jeopardize your defense. Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary, but these measures should be carried out so as not, repeat not, to alarm civil population or disclose intent. Report measures taken. Should hostilities occur, you should carry out the tasks assigned in Rainbow Five so far as they pertain to Japan. Limit dissemination of this highly secret information to [2186] minimum essential officers.

Signed "Marshall."

Before questioning you concerning this message, I would like also to read the message signed by yourself which appears on page 10 of the same date, November 27, 1941, addressed to G-2, Hawaiian Department, Fort Shafter, T. H.:

Japanese negotiations have come to practical stalemate. Hostilities may ensue. Subversive activities may be expected. Inform Commanding General and Chief of Staff only.

Signed "Miles."

General, do you recall having participated in negotiations and discussions concerning the transmission of these two warning messages that I have just read?

[2187] General MILES. I do not recall having taken any part in the drafting of the first message that you read, the one signed "Marshall." The second message, as far as I remember, I drafted it myself and sent it out.

Mr. GESELL. You prepared, did you not, on January 31, 1942, a memorandum for the record on the subject of "warnings sent to Hawaii prior to December 7, 1941"?

General MILES. I did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. I would like to offer that memorandum for the record at this time in connection with General Miles' testimony, to be designated "Exhibit 35."

The CHAIRMAN. That will be done.

Mr. GESELL. Copies are before the members of the committee.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 35.")

Mr. GESELL. You state in that memorandum with respect to General Marshall's message of November 27:

The contents of this dispatch was known to me at the time, though I do not remember to have seen an exact copy.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Under what circumstances did you learn of General Marshall's message?

General MILES. To the best of my recollection I learned of it verbally and of its contents from General Gerow with [2188] whom I was, of course, in very close contact. I would like to point out, I would like to state here, that General Gerow has a somewhat different recollection in regard to my participation in the drafting of that message.

Mr. GESELL. I would like to have your recollection of your participation.

General MILES. My recollection is very clear that I had no part in the preparation of that message. I base that negative statement on the fact that on the 30th of January in preparing, as I did prepare very carefully that memorandum for record, I stated at that time, as you have read, that I had no recollection then of having seen the draft. I also base that negative statement on the fact that my recollection is very clear even today of the part I played in the second message that you have just read and in the subsequent Arnold-Adams message of November 28, which undoubtedly will be read, and I cannot understand how my memory, defective as it may be, could have entirely failed to recall the even more important Marshall message if I had had a hand in its drafting.

Mr. GESELL. I gather from your testimony, then, that you believe you had no hand in its drafting, but General Gerow spoke to you about the message?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, will you tell us what conversations you [2189] had with General Gerow concerning the message and what led to the transmission of the message signed by yourself of the same date?

General MILES. There must have been some conversation between General Gerow and myself regarding the question of whether subversive activity was included in the Marshall message. I say there must have been because there is in existence a photostatic copy of a first draft of the Marshall message in which there is such a sentence and it was scratched out by General Gerow.

Senator FERGUSON. May I have the answer read?

(The answer was read by the reporter.)

Senator FERGUSON. Does counsel have a first draft?

Mr. GESELL. It is right in front of me and I was coming to it, Senator.

You may go ahead, General Miles.

General MILES. So that I knew that subversive activities had not been included in the message. Military Intelligence was specifically concerned, particularly concerned, and practically solely concerned so far as the General Staff went with antisubversive precautions and operations. That was one reason that I sent the G-2 message out.

Mr. GESELL. By the G-2 message you mean the one signed by yourself?

[2190] General MILES. Yes, sir. The other obvious reason was that I wished the G-2's of corps areas and the overseas departments to be particularly alerted in view of the Marshall message.

Mr. GESELL. I would like to have designated as exhibit 36 a photostatic copy of a draft of the Marshall message of November 27 signed by Brigadier General Gerow which contains the text of the message as sent and as printed here in exhibit 32 with the following sentence which did not appear in the message as transmitted stricken. Apparently it is stricken by General Gerow because his initial is opposite the deletion.

The sentence which appears immediately before the phrase "Report measures taken," reading as follows:

Needed measures for protection against subversive activities should be taken immediately.

May that be received?

The CHAIRMAN. You want that first draft printed as a part of the hearings?

Mr. GESELL. I think as an exhibit. I have called attention to the only portion necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be marked "Exhibit 36."

Mr. GESELL. That is the sentence that you refer to, is [2191] it not, as having been stricken?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there will be reference to that by members of the committee and in view of the fact that the message as sent was put in the record, I think that this ought to be spread in the record at this point.

Mr. GESELL. That is perfectly all right.

The CHAIRMAN. That is entirely agreeable.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 36" and follows herewith.)

SECRET

[2194] Mr. GESELL. General, that is the sentence that you referred to as having been stricken, is it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The result of striking that from the Marshall message of November 27 was that the Marshall message did not contain any instructions to the addressees as to action to be taken concerning sabotage and subversive activities?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. You stated that it was a function of G-2 to guard against such subversive activities and that for that reason you felt you had to specifically alert the G-2's in that regard?

General MILES. That was one of the reasons, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What did you say was the other reason?

General MILES. The importance of the Marshall message being brought directly to the attention of the G-2's, because of the critical situation therein exposed.

Mr. GESELL. Now, earlier we referred to the question of reconnaissance and I direct your attention to the fact that General Marshall's message of November 27 contains, among other things, this phrase:

Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary but these measures should be [2195] carried out so as not, repeat not, to alarm civil population or disclose intent.

Did you at that time have any knowledge as to the relative responsibilities of the Army and the Navy at Pearl Harbor in respect of the conduct of such a reconnaissance?

General MILES. I don't think I had any detailed knowledge at that time, sir. I, of course, had general background knowledge of the war plans and the responsibilities of the two services for reconnaissance.

Mr. GESELL. Did you understand that the Army was in a position to institute a long-range reconnaissance?

General MILES. I don't think at this time that I knew exactly what ships they had there. I believe I thought they had some reasonably long-range ships but I knew that a thorough system of long-range aerial reconnaissance by the Army was beyond its capability because of the enormous extent of the periphery which you would have to cover on a night approach of a Japanese task force.

Mr. GESELL. When you refer to "ships" you mean airplanes?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall any discussion at the time this message was sent as to the extent and nature of the reconnaissance which the Army was in a position to conduct, if any?

[2196] General MILES. No, sir; I recall no such discussions.

Mr. GESELL. Were you familiar with the message that the Navy sent under date of November 27, to Hawaii and other points also giving a warning?

General MILES. I was shortly after that. I don't remember on what day I became aware of that, but I certainly knew at the time I knew of the Army message that the Navy was sending a somewhat similar message.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Gesell: Before you leave—you may be going to cover it, I don't know—but I would like to have this witness interrogated now as to his knowledge of the agreement which had been entered into between the Army and the Navy as to this matter of reconnaissance. I understood they had a written contract or agreement.

General MILES. That was one of the details of the Hawaiian war plans as existed at that time that I was not familiar with, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. GESELL. You did not know what responsibilities the Army had and what responsibilities the Navy had at that time in respect of long range reconnaissance?

General MILES. The actual subdivision of that responsibility I do not believe that I was aware of.

Mr. GESELL. General Miles, when did you see General Short's report to the Marshall memorandum, Marshall message?

[2197] General MILES. Sometime in January 1942, sir, when I was preparing that memorandum for record which you have before you.

Mr. GESELL. The message I have been referring to appears at page 12 of exhibit 32, dated November 28, 1941, from Fort Shafter to Chief of Staff, which is signed "Short," and states:

Report Department alerted to prevent sabotage. Liaison with Navy reurad four seven two twenty-seven.

That is the message that you understood I was asking you about, is it, General?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. And you say you did not see that until sometime in 1942?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. You were aware, were you not, that General Marshall's message of November 27 specifically asked the addressees to report measures taken, were you not?

General MILES. I am not sure that I was aware of that detail. I knew the general contents of that Marshall message. I may or may not have been aware of the fact that it required an answer.

Mr. GESELL. Was responsibility for examining and appraising [2198] and evaluating whatever report was made a responsibility of G-2?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What division of the General Staff had that responsibility?

General MILES. The War Plans Division.

Mr. GESELL. That would be General Gerow's division?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall having any discussion with any officer of the General Staff concerning General Short's reply at the time it was sent?

General MILES. I did not know it was sent until the following month.

Mr. GESELL. Well, I asked you when you had seen the message and I wanted to be perfectly clear that you had not only not seen the message but you did not know of its existence until January 1942; is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct.

[2199] Mr. GESELL. You recall no discussions concerning whether or not there had been a report?

General MILES. I recall no such discussion.

Mr. GESELL. General Miles, on November 28 additional messages were sent to the Hawaiian Department concerning, among other things, the question of sabotage and subversive activities, were they not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The messages in question appear at pages 13 and 14 of Exhibit 32; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. I would like to read the messages at this time.

The first is signed "Adams" and is dated November 28, 1941, and states:

ADAMS.

I think, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, we might recess at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Twelve o'clock having arrived, we will recess until two.

(Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, the committee recessed until 2:00 p. m., of the same day.)

[2202]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order.

The chairman is detained a moment or two. You may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES (Resumed)

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, before you proceed may I ask one question?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Murphy, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURPHY. It has been called to my attention that there was some reference to a top secret Army report. It is my information we have been furnished all of the top secret Army reports, but there has been something said about a top secret Army report that changes the previous report.

Mr. GESELL. There is no top secret Army report that has not been available to counsel from the outset and been available to the committee.

Mr. MURPHY. Counsel has been furnished with all top secret Army reports?

Mr. GESELL. That is my understanding, Mr. Congressman.

At the recess, General Miles, I had just completed reading two messages on pages 13 and 14 of exhibit 32 which were sent, as far as the exhibit indicates, to the Hawaiian Department, concerning the question of subversive activities and sabotage.

It is my understanding, and I wish you would check me on this, that these two messages were also sent out at the same [2203] time and in the same text to other overseas departments. Is that correct?

General MILES. And to the corps areas in the United States; that is correct.

Mr. GESELL. Now, will you state to the committee what conferences and discussions you had at Washington with the other officers concerned relating to the transmission of these two sabotage messages of the 28th?

General MILES. I can best answer that question, sir, by referring to paragraph 4 of my memorandum prepared in January of 1942 and dated January 1, 1942.

Mr. GESELL. That is exhibit 35 before the committee.

General MILES. Shall I read that paragraph?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; you may read it, please.

Mr. GESELL. Page 2 of exhibit 35; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir; paragraph 4. Do you wish me to read that paragraph?

Mr. GESELL. If that is your statement as to what occurred; yes.

General MILES (reading):

November 28, 1941. At some time during this day, I think in the morning, General Arnold told me that he was extremely worried about sabotage of planes.

He stated that a number of bombers had been received from different points in one of the western [2204] depots, all having a certain defect which indicated sabotage. He told me that he proposed to send out drastic orders to all Air Forces at home and abroad to take all precautions against sabotage. I told him that a general warning on sabotage had been sent the previous day to the G-2's.

Mr. GESELL. Just a moment there, General. That message that you were referring to is the one we have already discussed, that was sent out by you on the 27th, which appears at page 13 of exhibit 32; is that not correct?

General MILES. That is correct. I continue:

He was not satisfied with this, and insisted that specific directions be sent by his staff to all Air Corps Commands. This directive was written by Major C. R. Blake, Chief of the Counter-Intelligence branch, Office of Chief of Air Corps, at the direction of General Martin Scanlon, A-2. It directed inter alia the Air Commands to "initiate forthwith all additional measures necessary to provide for the protection of your establishments and equipment against sabotage, protection of your personnel against subversive propaganda, and protection of all activities against espionage." I strongly objected to this message going out to Air forces only. I was in complete accord with the Air [2205] Corps in believing that sabotage was a real danger and that the necessary precautions should be taken, but I did not believe that the Air Forces alone should be given additional warnings, or that so broad and general a directive should be given to so many different commands. I feared all kinds of drastic measures against civilians which would have disastrous repercussions. I knew that the policy of the Chief of Staff was not to alarm the civilian population, as indicated in the WPD warning message of November 27.

That was the warning message of which we have recently spoken. I continue:

My objection to the proposed Air Corps directive finally resulted, late in the afternoon on the 28th, in a Staff conference in General Bryden's office attended by General Gerow, General Scanlon and, I believe, General Gullion.

Mr. GESELL. Will you indicate the duties of the various officers mentioned there? General Bryden was Assistant Chief of Staff?

General MILES. General Bryden was Deputy Chief of Staff. General Gerow was Deputy, War Plans Division. General Scanlon, A-2, that is to say, the Intelligence Officer on the General Staff of General Arnold, and General Gullion was Provost [2206] Marshall General. I continue:

The result of this conference was the approval of a message drafted by me but containing also the sentence quoted above from the Air Corps draft, modified, however, by a prohibition against illegal measures and a reference to the delimitation of responsibility in subversive activities as between the Army, Navy, and the FBI. This message as approved in the Staff conference was sent by the Adjutant General to the Commanding Generals of all corps areas and overseas departments.

Mr. GESELL. May I interrupt there and ask you which of these two messages that I read is the one that you are referring to? There were two messages on that day, appearing at pages 13 and 14. Is it the one with General Arnold's name signed prior to Adams' on page 14?

General MILES. No, sir; it is the one on page 13. I will get to the one on page 14, signed by both Arnold and Adams, later on.

Mr. GESELL. Thank you.

The message to Hawaii was numbered 482 and sent at 8:37 p. m. It was also agreed at the above mentioned Staff conference, at the insistence of the Air Corps, [2207] that identical messages would be sent by the Air Staff to all Air Commands, and this was done.

I interject here. That is the message you referred to on page 14 signed by Arnold and Adams. I continue:

The message that went to Hawaii was numbered 484 and sent at 9:23 p. m.

[2208] Mr. GESELL. Well now, so I understand the situation, you sent a message, a G-2 message on the 27th, in which you said, among other things, "Subversive activities may be expected," that message being addressed to the G-2 at the Hawaiian Department, and on the 28th there were two additional messages sent to Hawaii, one that was agreed upon in the General Staff conference, which you drafted, and another which was signed by General Arnold, which was intended for the specific attention of the Hawaiian Air Force, but also addressed to the Commanding General; so that in the space of these two days, there were three messages that went to Hawaii concerning subversive activities, or sabotage; is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct, except that I would like to add that I drafted that message in the Bryden conference.

In other words, I was the one who was raising these questions about it, so I got the job of drafting the message which resulted from the compromise decision of General Bryden.

Mr. GESELL. You were not in favor of sending either of the two messages on the 28th to Hawaii; is that correct?

General MILES. No, sir, I can't say that. I was specifically charged with subversive activities so far as the General Staff was concerned. I was deeply concerned [2209] with the danger, and I was certainly not in position, nor did I desire to, oppose anybody who went along with me in feeling the necessity for warnings. My objection, or whatever it amounted to, simply resulted in limiting it only to my pointing out that a general warning against subversive activities had gone out and in objecting to any other going out in drastic terms beyond the policy of the Chief of Staff and of our agreements with the FBI and ONI, and addressed only to Air Force officers.

Mr. GESELL. Was there any discussion or consideration given in these conferences to the question whether or not three messages concerned with sabotage being sent in such close proximity might not unduly emphasize that point in the minds of the addressee, General Short?

General MILES. I am very sure of my recollection that no such discussion was held and the idea did not enter my mind.

Mr. GESELL. Now, following the 28th, this exhibit 32 indicates that there were no other warning messages sent to the Hawaiian Department until the message of General Marshall on the morning of the 7th, with which we are all familiar, which did not arrive in time. Is that in accord with your recollection that there were no other warning messages sent from the 28th of November to the 7th of December?

[2210] General MILES. I think that is correct. You are speaking of warning messages that went directly from the War Department?

Mr. GESELL. That is correct, from the War Department to Hawaii.

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Do you recall any discussions or conferences being held in that period from November 28 to December 7, concerning the advisability of sending additional warning messages?

General MILES. I have been trying to recall those days and that specific point. I have a vague recollection of some discussion or conference with General Gerow and General Bratton and myself. I think it arose in connection with what we at the time thought might be the implementing broadcast of the winds message, but my recollection is not very specific in the matter.

Mr. GESELL. Well, we will have occasion to call you back to the witness stand at a later date to discuss conferences concerning the winds message, as I think you know under our proposed presentation we wish to put on everything concerning that at one time. The same, of course, is true with respect to the events of the 14th part and 1 o'clock message.

[2211] Do you recall any other conference or any other discussion of a proposed message except the one you have just indicated during the period of November 28 to December 7?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Do you remember ever having had a meeting at the Navy Department attended by Captain McCollum of the Far Eastern Branch of ONI either around the first of December or on the afternoon of the 6th of December at which there was any discussion concerning a proposed message?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. GESELL. Would it be correct for us to understand that by the 27th of November when the warning message that we have been discussing, signed by General Marshall was sent out to Pearl Harbor, that G-2 had reached the conclusion that there was a possibility of an attack at Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. I think it fair to say that by that time we had reached a pretty definite conclusion that war with Japan was rating as a fairly high possibility, if not probability; and, as I testified this morning, it was certainly in everyone's minds that inherent in a war with Japan was the strong possibility, if not probability, of a Japanese attack on Hawaii and on Panama.

[2212] Mr. GESELL. Well, with that in mind, and having in mind your testimony of this morning, as well as your present testimony, I have been wondering why the possibility of an attack at Pearl Harbor was not specifically indicated in your estimates of the situation, particularly in your memorandum to the Chief of Staff of December 5, 1941, which we discussed earlier, which was sent to him and other responsible officers in the Navy.

General MILES. In that estimate and the estimates of that time we were laying down the probable lines of advance of the Japanese, if they did advance. We were strongly persuaded that, late in November, I would say, and early October we were strongly persuaded that an advance to the South was indicated, and as subsequently transpired, that was the direction of the main Japanese effort.

Mr. KEEFE. Let me get those dates. Did you say late in October and early in November?

General MILES. I thought I said late in November and early in December.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. You said late in November and early in October.

Mr. KEEFE. How should it be?

General MILES. Late in November and early in December.

Mr. KEEFE. All right.

[2213] General MILES. It is true that Hawaii was not mentioned in those estimates, nor was it ever considered necessary, because, as I have repeatedly said, it was a fortress, built for one sole purpose, defense in a Japanese war. It was quite obvious to all experienced officers that if we did get into a war with Japan, Hawaii and the Panama Canal were factors of immense value to us in the prosecution of that war, factors of immense value to Japan to attack. We did not mention other points that were also within certainly the realms of possibility, if not probability, of a Japanese attack if war came, such as, for instance, Guam, Samoa, the Aleutians.

Mr. GESELL. So that in these estimates you were emphasizing the points other than the United States points which you felt it was likely the Japanese might attack?

General MILES. The lines of advance, yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. You wish us to understand that you always had in mind that there was a possibility of an attack against other United States points, other than those mentioned, including Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. If war came, it was inherent in the situation that Hawaii and Panama, at least, were extremely liable to Japanese attack.

Mr. GESELL. Now, you said, I believe, that there were [2214] no other warning messages sent by the War Department after November 28, until the message of December 7. I want to direct your attention to exhibit 1 in evidence, page 195. There is a message there to Washington from Tokyo dated November 28 which was translated on the same day in which Tokyo advises the Japanese ambassadors, among other things, as follows:

Therefore, with a report of the views of the Imperial Government on this American proposal which I will send you in two or three days, the negotiations will be de facto ruptured. This is inevitable.

Mr. KEEFE. What is the date of that, Mr. Gesell?

Mr. GESELL. November 28 and translated November 28.

Mr. KEEFE. The same date.

Mr. GESELL. Yes, sir.

I also direct your attention to a message which appears at page 204, Tokyo to Berlin. This message is dated November 30, translated December 1. There the American Ambassador at Berlin is receiving instructions concerning an interview with Hitler and Foreign Minister Ribbentrop and is given this instruction:

Say very secretly to them that there is extreme danger that war may suddenly break out between the Anglo-Saxon nations and Japan through some clash of arms, and add that [2215] the time of the breaking out of this war may come quicker than anyone dreams.

Now, having those two messages in mind, General Miles, I want to ask whether any consideration was given to sending a message to Hawaii subsequent to November 28, which would have emphasized the information which you had received indicating the real possibility of some immediate action being in the offing?

[2216] General MILES. You asked if any discussions were held?

Mr. GESELL. Any discussions concerning sending such a message.

General MILES. I remember no such discussion. The message of November 27, signed "Marshall", was, I knew, designed to alert the Hawaiian Department. That was a command action.

Had the Chief of Staff or his Assistant for War Plans thought that the Hawaiian Department was not sufficiently alerted, they would have, I felt sure, taken appropriate steps.

G-2 was not a command agency, nor did its responsibilities cover the alerting of major commands for war or any other implementation of war plans.

G-2 was charged with the dissemination of information. The essential information contained in the Chief of Staff's November 27 message, that hostilities might occur at any time on the initiative of the Japanese, held good right up to December 7. The information on Japanese code burning and the President's appeal to the Emperor emphasized the increasing tension of the crisis.

But these things were known in Hawaii. That Fortress, like a sentinel on post, had been warned of the danger which was its sole reason for being. Anything else was considered to be redundant.

Mr. GESELL. I want to come in a moment to the code, but [2217] I want to stay on this for a second longer.

The two messages that I have read indicate that action by the Japanese was expected in a matter of days or very immediately. The message of November 27 referred, as you state, to a possibility of action at any moment. I merely asked you whether there was any discussion concerning sending a message which would give more information to the Hawaiian Department of the immediacy of the situation. I gather you said "No" as to that?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Now, with reference to the question of transmitting information concerning burning of codes, if the committee please I wish to introduce at this time, as exhibit 37, a folder which has been before the committee designated "Basic Exhibit of Dispatches."

These are Navy dispatches and this exhibit will be considered primarily in connection with the testimony of Admiral Wilkinson.

The CHAIRMAN. Exhibit 37.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 37.")

Mr. GESELL. I wish to read to you from that exhibit, General Miles, two messages, the first one of December 3, 1941, which appears at page 40 of the exhibit, from the Chief of [2218] Naval Operations to Admiral Kimmel, Admiral Bloch, and others, reading as follows:

Highly reliable information has been received that categoric and urgent instructions were sent yesterday to Japanese diplomatic and consular posts at Hongkong, Singapore, Batavia, Manila, Washington and London to destroy most of their codes and ciphers at once and to burn all other important confidential and secret documents.

Senator FERGUSON. What page is that?

Mr. GESELL. Page 40.

Senator FERGUSON. Thank you.

Mr. GESELL. Now, turning to page 41.

Senator FERGUSON. Will counsel just wait until the members of the committee get the exhibit.

Mr. MURPHY. It is the one distributed yesterday.

Mr. GESELL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Entitled "Basic Exhibit of Dispatches." It has just been introduced as exhibit 37.

Senator FERGUSON. The exhibit number is what?

Mr. GESELL. Thirty-seven.

The CHAIRMAN. The dispatch which you just read is on page 40.

Mr. GESELL. Page 40.

The CHAIRMAN. And it goes over?

[2219] Mr. GESELL. No. There is another message on page 41 which I now wish to read, of the same date, December 3, to Admiral Kimmel and others:

Circular twenty-four forty-four from Tokyo one December ordered London, Hongkong, Singapore and Manila to destroy machine, Batavia machine already sent to Tokyo, December 2 Washington also directed destroy all but one copy of other systems and all secret documents, British Admiralty London today reports Embassy London has complied.

[2220] Mr. GESELL. There are other messages here concerning codes which I will not read at this time except for this message of December 6 to Admiral Stark.

The CHAIRMAN. What page is that?

Mr. GESELL. On page 46, to Admiral Stark, from "COM Fourteen" in Hawaii, stating:

Believe local Consul has destroyed all but one system although presumably not included your eighteen double five of third.

My question, General Miles, is whether you knew at the time that the Navy was transmitting messages to their representatives in Hawaii advising Hawaii of the intercepted Japanese messages indicating code destruction?

General MILES. I did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Were you consulted in connection with that?

General MILES. I believe that I was. I know that I knew that those messages were going out.

Mr. GESELL. Did you know that a message had been received from Hawaii stating that they had knowledge there that the local consul was destroying his code?

General MILES. I believe that I did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The Army did not send any messages to General Short in respect of code destruction, did it?

General MILES. No, sir.

[2221] Mr. GESELL. What is the explanation of that?

General MILES. The main reason was that the code experts apparently agreed, at least the Navy was particularly strong on the point, that their code was much more secure than ours. It was obviously, of course, of great importance in security that a message be sent in only one code and not two and we had every reason to believe, or thought we did, that a Navy message to Hawaii would be promptly transmitted to the Army authorities there.

Mr. GESELL. It is a fact, is it not, General Miles, that none of these messages contained any instructions for the Navy authorities to show the information to the Army representative at Hawaii?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GESELL. And that was the practice where joint messages were sent sometimes, as we have seen, was it not?

General MILES. That happened on one or two occasions, yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Did you give any instructions or directions to the Navy that action should be taken to see that these messages were made available to the Army authorities at Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. Any instruction to the Navy?

Mr. GESELL. To the Navy here that they should so transmit the messages that the Army would be certain to receive them? [2222]

General MILES. No, sir; that was not considered necessary.

Mr. GESELL. May I ask you, General, what significance could properly be attached at this time to the number of messages which we had intercepted from the Japanese in the period from December 1 to December 5 and later indicating that the Japs were destroying their most secret and confidential codes in Washington and in fact throughout the world?

General MILES. The inference would be that the Japanese had either planned for the outbreak of war, in other words, planned to initiate a war as they did or feared war coming suddenly through what was described in that message you recently read, a class of arms.

Mr. GESELL. Therefore, the information concerning code burning and destruction was of a specific and vital military nature, was it not?

General MILES. It was, sir.

Mr. GESELL. You stated, I believe, a moment ago that the information concerning code burning was known in Hawaii. Was your reference to these messages that I have just read?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Do you have any information as to whether or not General Short or other Army officers knew of these Navy messages? [2223]

General MILES. I had every reason at the time to expect that they would be transmitted to General Short or his staff.

Mr. GESELL. But do you have any specific information?

General MILES. But I have no specific information on that point. Obviously, if the Navy in Hawaii on the sixth knew that the Japanese consul there was burning his code, the Army must also have known it.

Mr. GESELL. Now, I wish to introduce at this time a message that we present in view of Senator Ferguson's questions the other day,¹ a message signed "Miles" to the Military Attaché, American Embassy, Tokyo, dated December 3, 1941. This is to be designated Exhibit 38.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be so designated.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 38.")

Mr. GESELL. The message reads as follows:

Memorize emergency key word #2 for use of SIGNUD without repeat without indicators, destroy document stop SIGNNQ, SIGPAP and SIGNDT should be retained and used for all communications except as last resort when these documents should be destroyed and memorized SIGNUD [2224] used stop destroy all other War Department ciphers and codes at once and notify by code word BINAB stop early rupture of diplomatic relations with Japan has been indicated. State Department informed you may advise Ambassador.

(Signed) MILES.

Do you recall sending that message?

General MILES. I do, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Just as a matter of information, General Miles, was it a practice for the Military Attachés to use the same or different codes than the Ambassador and the diplomatic staff?

General MILES. It was, sir. We had our own Army codes.

Mr. GESELL. So this related to the Army code system of communication between you and the Military Attaché at Tokyo?

General MILES. It did, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Is that offered in evidence as an exhibit now?

Mr. GESELL. Yes. It is Exhibit 38, and has been so received, I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. And made a part of the transcript.

Mr. GESELL. Now, there is just one further question.

In exhibit 33, General Miles, there are two items—items [2225] 29 and 30, being two memoranda sent by you under date of December 6 to the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, in which you set forth estimates of Japanese air and ground forces and strength in Indochina.

Could you state to the committee, please, what were the circumstances which led to the preparation of these memoranda, if you recall it?

General MILES. I do not recall specifically what those circumstances were. I do recall that in general in connection with what was commonly felt would be the main line or certainly the first line of Japanese advance to the south, that the strength of the Japanese in Indochina was a particular factor of interest. There were also, of course, as we know now, telegrams from the Chinese Generalissimo with regard to the possibility of cutting the Burma Road. That occurred sometime previous to those estimates of December 6.

Mr. GESELL. Just one final question, General Miles.

Did you know in the period from November 26 on that the Navy had lost track of the whereabouts of the Japanese carriers?

General MILES. I knew it about that time, sir; it was brought out by your question this morning that a part of the Japanese Fleet was not identified as to location by Navy.

Mr. GESELL. Specifically, did you know that that part [2226] included a substantial portion of the Japanese carriers?

General MILES. I do not believe that I did know exactly what that force was.

Mr. GESELL. I have no further questions, if the committee please. I simply would like to again point out that we have not included in General Miles' examination anything concerning the "wind" code messages or the events of the 6th and 7th as they relate to the fourteenth part and 1 o'clock messages, for the reason that those subjects are to be covered later on, and General Miles will return to the stand for that purpose, in accordance with the procedure we have outlined.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question before the cross-examination of this witness begins?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Does counsel have here the testimony of General Miles on all previous occasions? Is it available for examination? He said he testified five other times.

Mr. GESELL. I notice you said five, General Miles.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to see all five of them.

Mr. GESELL. I think on five occasions. Will you tell us what those five occasions were, General Miles, so that I can answer Congressman Murphy's question?

[2227] The VICE CHAIRMAN. He said this was the fifth.

General MILES. I appeared before the Roberts Board; I appeared before the Grunert Board, the Army Pearl Harbor Board; I appeared and gave testimony before Brigadier General Clark, G-2, the month after my appearance before the Grunert Board; and I was again under oath as shown by my affidavit to Lieutenant Colonel Clausen.

Mr. GESELL. All of that material has been available to us.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MURPHY. And it will be available during the course of this examination?

Mr. GESELL. Well, we have in some instances only one copy. In some instances we have seen the material.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, may I make this request owing to the statement just made, that when counsel gets material that is available to the committee, if not for a member of the committee asking for it, that the committee members be individually advised as to the receipt of that material or of their having it so that we might inquire about it.

Mr. GESELL. Well, I am sorry. We will try to do that. I thought the committee understood that we had received all of the reports and transcripts of testimony of all of the various inquiries conducted by both the Army and the Navy, as [2228] well as the Roberts material.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, did you understand that the committee knew that Colonel Clark, or General Clark, had made an investigation?

Mr. GESELL. Yes, I thought so.

Mr. KEEFE. I never heard of that one. It is news to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Permit the Chair to make this observation: In many instances in which documents or testimony has been made available, or in some instances at least, it has not been available in sufficient copies to permit each member to have a separate copy of his own. In other cases it has been. And in cases where there is only one copy of available testimony it is more or less difficult for all members to examine it simultaneously and in instances of that sort those who get it first ought to seek to accommodate themselves to the desires of other members so that sooner or later all of them can see it. I do not know how many have seen this.

Mr. GESELL. Well, would this be helpful to the members of the committee: If, prior to the appearance of each witness, we handed to each member of the committee the record references in these various reports and documents where that particular witness has appeared on prior occasions? We will do that if the committee wishes it.

The CHAIRMAN. It would help. The Chair might suggest [2229] that it obviously is impossible, as the Chair understands it, for each member of the committee to have simultaneously the complete record of the testimony given by all the witnesses in all the previous investigations that have been held. Is the Chair correct in that?

Mr. GESELL. We have only one copy of quite a bit of that material.

The CHAIRMAN. And to make additional copies sufficient for all members would be quite a task and quite an expense, but if any member gets possession of one of these copies first, the Chair would suggest that as soon as possible that he make it available to other members in turn.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I have a request to make.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson, you may go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if we get this material that we at least have it 48 hours beforehand or 24 hours, so that we may review it, rather than receive it at the time that a witness is on the stand or coming on. It is very difficult to prepare and we will cut down the period of time that it takes to question a witness if we have it sufficiently in advance.

Mr. GESELL. The Senator is quite right on that and we will try to make up a list for the members of the committee [2230] showing where each person testified and have it available as much ahead of time as we can.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is obvious that in cases where only one copy is available that, naturally, counsel who under our arrangement have the first examination of a witness, would like to feel that they should have the right to examine it first in order to become familiar with it, but as soon as possible in such cases after they do so that it be passed around as rapidly as possible to the various members of the committee.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I have one request.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY. It seems to me in view of the nature of the testimony we have received from General Miles that each member of the committee ought to be furnished before Monday morning or before Sunday if possible with a photostatic copy of all of his previous testimony. I think it is extremely important and I would like to go into it pretty thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to say whether that is physically possible but every effort will be made to do that.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Keefe.

Mr. KEEFE. I thought that I was more or less familiar [2231] with all of the so-called Pearl Harbor investigations but reference has now been made to a General Clark investigation, which is entirely new to me. I never heard of it, until General Miles mentioned it and I would like at this time to make some inquiry as to the nature and scope and character of that investigation. When was it held and under whose direction and for what purpose and where are the records, if available?

Mr. GESELL. Congressman Keefe, I think I can explain in this fashion. That was a technical investigation into a very detailed aspect of this situation and I have just explained—

Mr. KEEFE. You mean with respect to the codes?

Mr. GESELL. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KEEFE. And that sort of thing?

Mr. GESELL. And I have just explained the situation to the Senator from Michigan. I will be very glad to discuss it with you, Congressman Keefe, after we adjourn. That has been available to the staff and to the committee from the outset of the inquiry.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, it has never received any particular notice so far as the committee is concerned, I think; at least I have never heard of it before. Is it because of the fact that it does contain restricted material relating to [2232] codes and code breaking and that sort of thing?

Mr. GESELL. I believe that must be the reason, Congressman Keefe, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair might say he has heard in a general way of a report made by General Clark, who is a member of the General Staff, as he understands, but the Chairman of the committee has not seen the result or the testimony which General Clark took on the code situation, with which the Chairman understands he dealt exclusively.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I presume that will be made available to the committee at a certain time.

Mr. GESELL. Oh, yes; Congressman.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Gearhart.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, I am sure this is not in the spirit of "I told you so," but I raised this question at the very first meeting of the committee in executive session.

It now appears that there have been eight exhaustive investigations, eight reports written and testimony given in support of those reports. I knew that, with the exception of the Clark investigation, when we had our first meeting and I made the request that the testimony be digested so that we [2233] would have it in such form that we could compare the testimony of witnesses given at different times and I was given the impression as a result of that first meeting that that was being done.

Then at the last meeting of this committee in executive session I learned to my astonishment that nothing had been done along that line. I then asked, after having gone out of my way to call one of the great law book publishing companies to see if they could furnish us an editorial staff, I made the suggestion that even at that late hour that we employ people to compare that testimony for us, classify it as to subject so we could compare the testimony given by individual witnesses at different times to the same points and at that time the committee referred it to a sub-committee.

So today we are now confronted with the situation where we have a tremendous mass of testimony, probably thousands upon thousands of pages, probably eighty or ninety or a hundred volumes according to figures that have been given to me offhand and now we are talking about bringing that testimony in and dropping it on the desks of the different members of this committee expecting us to analyze that testimony on the spot, testimony given by the same witness at different times and then intelligently cross-examine a witness sitting on the stand here in respect of what he may have said at different [2234] times.

If anyone has ever been vindicated in offering something which should have been acted upon in the first place, which has not been acted on at all, I certainly am in reviewing the situation which confronts the committee at this particular time.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair simply wishes to observe that Congressman Gearhart did at one of our executive meetings suggest that the staff of the West Publishing Co. of Minneapolis, Minn., be brought down here to digest the previous testimony. The matter was discussed. No action was taken upon it. Whether wisely or unwisely may be a matter of opinion. It was not done. The Congressman did suggest that that be done.

Now, counsel, are you through with your main examination?

Mr. GESELL. Yes; Mr. Chairman.

General MILES. Mr. Chairman, may I add one thing that I am afraid I did not make myself wholly clear on?

The counsel asked me several questions in regard to the messages of November 3, I believe, or December 3, sent by Navy regarding the Japanese and the burning of their codes and pointed out also to me that on some other occasions the War Department had specifically asked that the Navy messages be transmitted to Army.

[2235] I think it only fair to state, therefore, why I believed and why I think everyone in my department believed that Navy messages were being transmitted to the Army in Hawaii and vice versa.

I come down to three principal reasons. One is my intimate knowledge of the basis and policies governing the plans for the defense of Hawaii, in which it was always emphasized, so far as I can remember, the great importance of close liaison between Army and Navy. It was a tight little fortress which demanded primarily the close cooperation of the two services.

Second, my knowledge that General Marshall as Chief of Staff always emphasized the necessity of close cooperation and liaison with the Navy here in Washington and, I felt sure, to his senior officers in command of the major units of the Army that had any connection with Navy, as was particularly the case in Hawaii.

And, third, I received an official letter on the 17th of September, dated the 6th of September, from the G-2 of the Hawaiian Department, Colonel Fielder, stating, inter alia:

The cooperation and contact between Office Naval Intelligence, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Military Intelligence Division, in this Department, is most complete.

[2236] Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the whole letter should go in. We should not have only the inter alia.

General MILES. I will read the entire letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the whole letter or message go into the transcript at this point.

General MILES. This refers to summaries of intelligence which we were sending them.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the date of that?

General MILES. The date? I will read the whole message. [Reading:]

6 SEPTEMBER 1941.

Subject: Summaries of Information

To: War Department General Staff, Military Intelligence Division G-2,
Washington, D. C.

1. It has been noted that many of the Summaries of Information received from your office originate with Office Naval Intelligence, 14th Naval District and have already been furnished this office by the Navy.

2. The cooperation and contact between Office Naval Intelligence, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Military Intelligence Division, in this Department, is most complete and all such data is received simultaneous with the dispatch of information to the respective Washington offices.

[2237] 3. Inasmuch as such advices are received in duplicate and unless there are other reasons to the contrary it is recommended that such notices from your office be discontinued in order to avoid the duplication of effort.

KENDALL J. FIELDER,

Lieut. Colonel Inf.,

Acting A. C. of S., G-2.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

General MILES. That is the complete letter, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. General, I would like to clear up some of the terminology used by the War Department with respect to matters about which you testified.

You have down there, I believe, "G" by itself and G-1, G-2, G-3, and G-4 and maybe some other G's, but what is "G" by itself?

General MILES. "G" was an abbreviation that we adopted in the first World War from the French. To us it meant the General Staff Division.

The CHAIRMAN. Or the Chief of Staff? Would that also indicate the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. It was used both to describe an office or a department of the General Staff and loosely applied to the individual heading that department. There were five divisions of the General Staff, four G's and the War Plans Division.

The CHAIRMAN. So that standing by itself "G" either [2238] means the General Staff or the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. A General Staff division or the Chief of Staff, depending upon context.

The CHAIRMAN. What is G-1?

General MILES. Personnel.

The CHAIRMAN. And G-2?

General MILES. Intelligence.

The CHAIRMAN. Intelligence.

General MILES. G-3 was Operations and Training; G-4 Supply and War Plans Division.

The CHAIRMAN. And you designate that by the initials "W. P. D."?

General MILES. "W. P. D."; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, did the Chief of the Division of Intelligence, in Military Intelligence under the symbol G-2, have charge of all military intelligence in the War Department?

General MILES. He was the Assistant Chief of Staff to the Chief of Staff. He was the man in charge of military intelligence of the General Staff.

I had better read it directly from the Army regulations. The Army regulations current at that time, No. 10-15, state in paragraph 9 [reading]:

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE DIVISION, GENERAL DUTIES

[2239] a. The Military Intelligence Division is charged, in general, with those duties of the War Department General Staff which relate to the collection, evaluation, and dissemination of military information.

b. The Military Intelligence Division is specifically charged with the preparation of plans and policies and the supervision of all activities concerning—

(1) Military topographical surveys and maps, including their reproduction and distribution (except special situation maps prepared by G-3).

(2) The custody of the General Staff map and photograph collection.

(3) Military attaches, observers, and foreign-language students.

(4) Intelligence personnel of all units.

(5) Liaison with other intelligence agencies of the Government and with duly accredited foreign military attaches and missions.

(6) Codes and ciphers.

(7) Translations.

(8) Public relations, to include all forms of publicity.

(9) Censorship in time of war.

And added to it the acquisition of military topographical [2240] maps, as well as their reproduction and distribution, and the custody of the War Department map collection.

The CHAIRMAN. Did each of these divisions, G-1 and G-2, 3, and 4 and also the War Planning Division have at the top an officer who was a member of the General Staff and designated as Assistant Chief of Staff?

General MILES. Yes, sir; or Acting Assistant Chief of Staff.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, Acting Assistant.

Now, yesterday I think you testified that you had no control or supervision or what you call SIS, which I understood was Signal Intelligence Service?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How does it happen that there would be any lack of supervision by the member of the General Staff or the Assistant Chief of Staff for Military Intelligence of any particular phase of military intelligence such as SIS, Signal Intelligence Service, which is under the Signal Corps? Why would there be that hiatus between the control or supervision of the Chief of Military Intelligence of that branch, of that essential branch of military intelligence that came under the Signal Corps, which was very active and no doubt expected to be active in the obtaining of information?

[2241] General MILES. Senator, the theory on which the General Staff was established was that the divisions of the General Staff were not operating agencies. They were divisions of a staff serving the Chief of Staff whose principal duty was as military adviser to the Secretary of War and the President of the United States.

Now, the SIS was a technical branch which served Military Intelligence just as the Quartermaster Corps was a technical branch which served the Supply Division of the General Staff, if I may use that analogy.

Does that answer your question, sir?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, in a way, but I would like to know to whom SIS was responsible and to whom it was expected under the regulations to make its reports?

General MILES. Directly to the Chief Signal Officer of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were under no obligation then to report to you as head of the Military Intelligence Division?

General MILES. They formed no part of the Military Intelligence Division. They were part of a technical service, the Signal Corps of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. But that technical service was charged with the responsibility of obtaining information, was it not?

General MILES. No, sir, of transmitting. It was a com- [2242] munications service.

The CHAIRMAN. So that it reported under that arrangement directly to the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. No, sir; it reported directly to the Chief Signal Officer of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom did he report?

General MILES. All heads of the different branches of the Army were directly under the Chief of Staff. Those branches of the Army were divided in General Staff Divisions and the technical or service staff if you like to call them that.

The CHAIRMAN. So that there was no obligatory connection between the Military Intelligence of which you were the head and the Signal Service Corps except such as might be informal or voluntary?

General MILES. That is true, sir. I had no right or authority whatever to give any orders to the SIS or any other part of the Signal Corps or any other part of any other technical branch of the Army. It was, of course, expected that great cooperation would exist and if I want to General Maughborne, Chief Signal Officer, and said that I wanted something very badly he would and did get it for me if he possibly could.

The CHAIRMAN. Would there or not have been an advantage [2243] in a crisis such as that which we are discussing, an imminent conflict, if there had been a more direct connection between the Signal Intelligence Service and the Military Intelligence Service of which you were the head?

General MILES. Well, Senator, that goes pretty deeply into the theory of the organization of the General Staff and the organization of the War Department which I do not feel competent to go into at this time. I can only say that it was set up that way with the approval of the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. In exhibit No. 2 entitled, "Japanese messages concerning military installations, ship movements, etc.," which covers Hawaii and the Panama Canal, the Philippines, southern Asia, the Netherlands East Indies, the west coast and then miscellaneous and under the respective headings of which we find many intercepted messages with respect to the movement of ships through the Panama Canal and also the movement of ships in Hawaii and in the Philippines and in the Southeast Atlantic, southeastern Asia, and the Netherlands, which is the Southeast Pacific region or Southwest Pacific—which was it geographically, Southwest Pacific. It was southeast Asia, but it was geographically where?

General MILES. Southwest Pacific, yes, sir.

[2244] The CHAIRMAN. The Southwest Pacific?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any particular difference in the relative importance given to these intercepted messages with respect to the Panama Canal, Hawaii, the Philippines, southeast Asia, or any other regions covered by these intercepted messages relative to the movement of ships?

General MILES. If I understand your question, Senator, these messages as a whole primarily indicated to us what we already knew or could very easily suspect, that the Japanese were doing everything they could to follow the movement of our warships, as I said yesterday, just as we were doing with regard to following the movement of Japanese warships.

The CHAIRMAN. And they were getting information from their representatives either in Panama, for instance, or through some South American country with respect to all movements of not only warships but commercial ships through the Panama Canal in both directions?

General MILES. I did not get the question.

The CHAIRMAN. I say they were receiving information as to the movement of ships, both naval and commercial, through the Panama Canal in both directions, according to these intercepted messages?

General MILES. That was their intent and I have no doubt [2245] they carried it out pretty thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. And they also were receiving information, as these intercepted messages show, concerning the movement of ships in and out of the Philippines region in Manila Bay, were they?

General MILES. That is true, sir. I mentioned yesterday that I have counted 56 of those that I have deciphered.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Hawaiian Islands. Somebody in each of these regions was reporting to Tokyo, or somebody who reported to Tokyo the movement of these ships over the various periods running from 1940, some period in 1940 up to and approaching the 7th of December 1941, and the question I would like to ask is whether the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department treated all of these intercepts, so far as you know, in the same way and with the same degree of importance, or whether they singled out this information from either the Panama Canal or from Hawaii or the Philippines or southeast Asia for any special treatment in regard to precautionary measures which might be taken in any of these different regions?

[2246] General MILES. Well, they were primarily messages which concerned the Naval Intelligence rather than the Military. Obviously, Senator, we were more interested in the fact that the Japanese were following our ships in our own waters, Panama, Hawaii, and the Philippines, than we were the Dutch East Indies, or any other places headed here "miscellaneous".

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the activity of the Japanese Government in obtaining this information through these messages from various people at the Panama Canal, Manila, Honolulu, the Dutch East Indies, and Southeast Asia, was there anything in any of them, so far as you know, as head of the Military Intelligence Division, to indicate whether the Japanese Government intended to make an attack at any of these points, and, if so, which one was singled out as the most likely to be the object of such an attack?

General MILES. No, sir, taking the messages as a whole, I do not think they indicated any particular place in which you could say the Japanese will attack there, or the most probable, that they will attack there, solely based on those messages.

The CHAIRMAN. Now yesterday I think you testified with reference to the shortage of competent help in the interception, the translation, and decoding of these various messages. I would like to ask you specifically what effort you made, as [2247] head of that Division, to secure additional help so that they might be translated, decoded and intercepted more promptly than they were in many cases?

General MILES. I testified this morning, Senator, that for a considerable period of time before Pearl Harbor, I cannot definitely define it, we had lent one of our language officers, successively through at least six of those gentlemen, to the S. I. S. We were not permitted, due to restrictions on personnel, to do more than that with those language officers. Although they were trained language officers, even then we had to put them through a course of training for that particular duty of translating from telegraphic Japanese, which is a language within a language, before they became fit to carry on.

In addition to that, we did what we could to find for the Signal Corps competent civilians, to aid them in this work. That, as I explained this morning, was very difficult, because there were very few in existence who could translate telegraphic Japanese accurately into English, and we must be accurate, and they had to be not only American citizens but American citizens on whose absolute loyalty and discretion we could count.

We were handling a very important secret.

The CHAIRMAN. How were those appointments made? Were they made under civil service, or did the War Department have [2248] some special plan by which it was able to secure competent persons who were able to intercept and also to translate and decode these messages?

General MILES. Well, the interception, Senator, was made by various stations of the Army, Navy, and FBI, and the FCC. That was simply a matter of pulling a message out of the air, then transmitting that message as it came out of the air in coded Japanese to Washington. Now the decoding and translation was altogether another matter, a very difficult proposition.

[2249] The CHAIRMAN. Now, pulling the message out of the air at Hawaii or Panama or the Philippines, or any other point, was simply pulling it out of the air as it was going through the air in Japanese?

General MILES. In coded Japanese.

The CHAIRMAN. In coded Japanese. They recorded the message in the Japanese code, and it had to be then transmitted from whatever station it may have been intercepted, Panama or elsewhere; is that true?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it Washington it had to be decoded and translated into English; is that it?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So that those who were charged with that responsibility and that duty had to be, in the first place, able to pull the message out of the air, then they had to be able to decode it and translate it so it could be understood in English, and then passed on to whoever was expected to get it finally; is that true?

General MILES. Yes, sir. The same personnel that pulled it out of the air was not the same that decoded and translated it.

The CHAIRMAN. He could pull it out of the air just like it was but he could not translate it after he got it [2250] out of the air?

General MILES. That is so, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I notice many of these messages were translated and decoded within a few days after they had been received and in many other cases it was a month, or maybe in some cases, 2 months, before the translation and decoding took place. How did that happen? It seems they were not being decoded or translated in the order of their receipt or in the order of their being pulled out of the air.

How did that happen, that they were not decoded and translated in relation to the date of their receipt?

For instance, some messages received in December were not decoded and translated until February, and others were translated within a few days. Now, until they were decoded and translated, did anybody have any idea of the relative importance of these messages so as to give priority to their translation and decoding? And if that is true, how did it happen that some of them waited a month, or 2 months, to be decoded and translated while others were decoded and translated within a week and in some cases, 3 or 4 days, and some on the same day?

General MILES. Obviously, Senator, we could not evaluate the messages or give them any priority in the ordinary case. In the case that we were looking for a particular message, [2251] as was the case in the days before the receipt of the Japanese reply beginning on the 6th of December, we knew that message would be coming. We knew it would be along, we knew to whom it would be addressed, and undoubtedly that got a high priority.

But to answer your question, primarily the delay was due two factors: One, the fact, as I have already testified, that, as I understand it, the intercepting stations that picked these out of the air—and there were various stations—did not have the same facilities for transmitting that message to Washington. Some had teletypes, and they could put the message on in teletype and send it through.

Sometimes I imagine they had to be checked and re-sent because many errors were made, and would be a perfectly meaningless message to the person sending or receiving it. Other stations had no such facilities, and had to send them by mail, and airmail usually was used.

The second reason, of course, was the traffic rate. Sometimes that increased enormously, and a backlog was created in the decoding and translating agencies here in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. I find here a message intercepted from Honolulu (Okuda) which I suppose means the Japanese representative there, to Tokyo. It is No. 003. It seems to be in reply to No. 002.

Battleships New Mexico (flag)— which I presume means flagship—

Oklahoma, Idaho, and Mississippi, together with many cruisers and destroyers left Pearl Harbor on the morning of the 6th for training.

That is the day before this message was sent.

It is reported that they will return on the (12th?)

Then there is a question mark after that in parentheses, indicating probably some doubt as to whether they would return on that day. That was a Navy translation on the 10th, which is three days after that message was transmitted.

Then there is another one on January 9, 1941, translated on the 25th, with reference to other movements:

It is reported that the light cruiser Cincinnati returned here from the Philippine Islands. This message sent to Washington and Manila.

That is a message by some Japanese representative to the Japanese Government at Tokyo.

Then on the 16th of January, 1941:

1. The capital ships returned to Pearl Harbor immediately. The Pennsylvania arrived on the 14th.

2. The number of vessels seen in the harbor on the morning of the 16th was as follows: Five battleships [2253] (Mississippi, New Mexico, Idaho, Pennsylvania, Oklahoma), five light cruisers of the Omaha class (of which one is in dock) 19 destroyers, 2 destroyer tenders, 1 - - - , about 6 small submarines, 1 submarine tender, 1 patrol boat, 7 vessels which may have been patrol boats, 2 transports.

3. The Yorktown is not in port.

All of which would indicate that somebody in Honolulu almost day by day was reporting to Tokyo the movement of all of our ships in and out of Pearl Harbor, and in and out of Honolulu. Some of these messages were translated and decoded within a very few days, while others were not.

Some of these translations were by the Navy, probably most by the Navy, and some by the Army.

Do you know, as head of the Intelligence Division of the War Department, by what rules, or lack of rules, some of these messages detailing the movements of our ships in and out of Pearl Harbor and in and out of Honolulu as far back as January 1941, nearly a year before the attack was made, were translated and decoded in some cases almost immediately, and in other cases not for weeks? Have you any explanation from your knowledge, as to why that happened?

General MILES. Beyond what I have testified, Senator, I have not. I understand you are going to have Colonel Sadtler [2254] as a witness, who can give you the details of that. I could add, however, of course, that these messages we had already discarded. We knew the Japanese were following the movement of our ships, very naturally, in Hawaii.

Much has already been said before this committee as to whether or not the presence of that fleet was a deterrent to the Japanese, but their interest in the movement of the ships was a perfectly natural activity on their part, because of the obvious fact that there was a fleet on their flank, whatever direction they chose to go, north or south.

The CHAIRMAN. The question which arises in my mind is, in view of the fact that these decoded, intercepted, and translated messages go all the way from January practically up to the attack, showing that they had detailed information with respect to the movement of the ships in and out of Pearl Harbor and in and out of Honolulu in the Hawaiian Islands, whether that gave any emphasis to the possibility of an attack in Pearl Harbor more or less than any emphasis that might have been given with respect to a possible attack on Panama, in view of the same information they were receiving from Panama or Manila, in view of the information they were receiving from Manila, or the Southwest Pacific, or southeast Asia, with respect to the same traffic information they were [2255] receiving from that region. In other words, as these intercepted messages show that Japan at Tokyo was receiving from these various points similar information with respect to the movement of all ships in these four or five regions, did the War Department, through you or your division, give any particular emphasis to anyone of these points over other points about which the same information was being conveyed?

General MILES. No, sir. Those messages as a whole, as I tried to testify yesterday, meant simply to us what we already knew, or suspected, that the Japanese were following the movement of all of our ships anywhere they appeared.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the knowledge of that fact cause any particular apprehension to the Intelligence Division that there might be an attack at any of these points in the event the situation developed to a point where there might be hostilities between the two countries?

General MILES. We knew, Senator, that, as I have said before, attack on our principal bases, Honolulu, Hawaii, and Panama, including the Philippines, was practically inherent as a high possibility or probability in any war with Japan. The messages themselves had very little effect in emphasizing that point.

The CHAIRMAN. You testified, I believe this morning, [2256] with respect to the possibility of an attack at Pearl Harbor and the possibility of a sudden surprise attack. How do you evaluate the possibility of a sudden and surprise attack at Pearl Harbor or Hawaii with relation to the possibility of a sudden or surprise attack on Manila or on the Panama Canal, or any other of these points about which the Japanese Government was making inquiry as to the movement of ships?

General MILES. I should say that our evaluation would have been that Hawaii and the Panama Canal were about equally likely to be attacked for somewhat different reasons, but both of them were of immense strategic importance to us and immense value to the Japanese, if they could be injured or put out of business.

The CHAIRMAN. When you were in Hawaii—as operations officer was it?

General MILES. G-3, operations officer; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. For how long? Some three years?

General MILES. Three years, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And you indulged in many war games, based upon assumptions of various kinds?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And in those war games you assumed that there might be an actual physical invasion of the [2257] Hawaiian Islands by the landing of troops in the harbor at Honolulu, did you, or Pearl Harbor, or both? Which was it?

General MILES. I only remembered one in which we envisaged the lading of Japanese troops in Honolulu Harbor. It was generally presumed they would land at different points of the island.

The CHAIRMAN. That was based, of course, on the possibility of landing military troops from transports and engaging such forces as we might have on land in the Hawaiian Islands?

General MILES. Based on the principle of surprise.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. That they might produce a surprise landing of troops and actually invade the Hawaiian Islands.

General MILES. Yes, sir. One maneuver, or war game, that I mentioned was based on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Testimony has been adduced here to the effect that the Japanese rather insisted that we take the entire Pacific Fleet out of the Pacific Ocean and put it back into the Atlantic, in which event, of course, the air raid on the fleet itself in Pearl Harbor would not have taken place. But if that had been the situation, would you wish to express an opinion—which may be more or less speculative—as to whether the Japanese would have attempted or could have attempted and succeeded in effectuating a landing [2258] on the Hawaiian Islands by an army and thereby capture the islands themselves, instead of bombing from the air the fleet that was in Pearl Harbor? Would you care to express any opinion on that?

General MILES. Well, sir, it was subject to a long study during my time in Hawaii, and also it was up time and time again during my course of duty here in the War Plans Division.

I remember running a general staff study on that when I was in Hawaii. It was always considered a possibility. There were very cogent reasons why the Japanese, even with the fleet in the Atlantic, should have attacked Hawaii, preferably an attack based on the capture of Hawaii. Had the Japanese captured Hawaii, we knew perfectly well we could never begin the offensive war which we have fought against the Japanese until we recaptured Hawaii—a very difficult operation.

Could they have knocked out the naval facilities of Hawaii, it would have given them a lesser time, but still a very considerable period of time before we could have begun any offensive operations in the Pacific, because those facilities would have had to be built up again. All those things were inherent in the situation, if I may so express it.

[2259] The CHAIRMAN. Well, if we may presume that the object of the Japanese attack, as it took place, was to cripple or destroy the fleet in Pearl Harbor so as to make it ineffective in resisting the encroachment, the movement of the Japanese Army and the fleet from Japan south, and into Indochina, Thailand, the Kra Peninsula, or any of that territory, is it, from a military standpoint, sound to assume that if that fleet had not been there, or within that region, that instead of making an attack upon the fleet from the air and leaving with whatever damage occurred they could have captured the islands—and of course, such attack would have brought war just as the attack on the fleet had brought war—what effect would that have had on our ability to fight Japan in the region where we had to fight her, with the Hawaiian Islands in her possession and the necessity to recapture them before we got far beyond them, and if they had captured the islands, would they have been able to base their own fleet in Pearl Harbor instead of our own? What would the effect have been on our ability to fight Japan further west in the Pacific, in the region where she was up to that time making her depredations?

That may be an involved question.

General MILES. The effect would have been that we would have been forced to recapture the Hawaiian Islands [2260] before we undertook any major offensive against the Japanese in the middle or western Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, when did you first go to Hawaii, General?

General MILES. April 1929.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the military or naval authorities while you were there—you were there until 1932?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you there when the fleet was maneuvering in the Hawaiian region in 1932, 1931, and 1932?

General MILES. I was, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were in the Hawaiian Islands when the Japanese invaded Manchuria in 1931?

General MILES. In 1931, yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You were there when they made the attack on Shanghai?

General MILES. No, sir, that was considerably later, I think, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What year was that?

General MILES. Somewhere in the middle thirties. I do not recall offhand.

The CHAIRMAN. Probably 1935. I do not recall exactly. As operations officer in charge of G-3, I believe you said, in the Hawaiian Islands from 1929 to 1932, was any consideration given to the possibility that the Japanese aggressions in Manchuria and the possible attack upon Shanghai, or an attack upon any European possession or any American possession in that region, would bring about hostilities between the United States and Japan, and was that in any way related to the maneuvers of the fleet in Hawaiian waters in 1931 or 1932?

General MILES. To answer your last question first, I do not believe that the Japanese aggression, which began in September of 1931, if I remember correctly, in Manchuria, had any particular bearing on the maneuvers, the joint Army and Navy maneuver of February or perhaps March of 1932.

To answer the second question, I think it is fair to say that beginning with the Japanese aggression of Manchuria in the fall of 1931, the possibility of a Japanese American war increased from then on. They were a bandit nation out on the rampage in a war game that was real.

[2262] The CHAIRMAN. Our Government protested against the invasion of Manchuria at the time it took place?

General MILES. It led the protest.

The CHAIRMAN. It led the protest and never at any time recognized the Manchukuo Government set up by Japan?

General MILES. I believe that is correct, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you familiar with the position of the Secretary of State at that time as stated by him that when the maneuvers of the fleet were concluded that the fleet was still retained for a time in Hawaiian waters because of the Manchurian situation; are you familiar with that?

General MILES. I have heard that. I read that in Secretary Stimson's book. I did not know it at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. When did you finally conclude your service as Chief of Military Intelligence here in Washington?

General MILES. I think it was the 31st of January 1942; and 30th or 31st.

The CHAIRMAN. Some 2 months, approximately, following the Pearl Harbor attack?

General MILES. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all

Congressman COOPER.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquiry briefly of General Miles.

[2263] First, General, along the lines of the chairman's original questions to you, I might refer to the fact that I had a brief service in the Army of 2 years during the First World War in the Infantry. Of course, the Signal Corps of the Army is a definite branch of the Army like the the Quartermaster Corps or any other part of the Army.

General MILES. That is correct. It is one of the technical branches of the Army—technical services of the Army.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And this Signal Intelligence Service is simply part of that branch?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Signal Corps has the responsibility of stringing telephone lines and indulging in various and sundry types of service—furnishing communications?

General MILES. Many other activities.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes, and this Signal Intelligence Service was simply a part of that?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And, of course, intelligence was distributed all through various units of the Army; isn't that true?

General MILES. Yes, sir; all the tactical units and to a certain extent the technical services, particularly the [2264] Air Force, the Air Corps in those days, were running an intelligence of their own.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Even during the First World War an infantry regiment had what was called an operations and intelligence officer.

General MILES. Oh, yes. All combat units in the field.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Had intelligence service.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If I may interrupt, Congressman Cooper, there is one question I overlooked.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. When these intercepted messages, intercepted at Panama, Hawaii, or the Philippines, or southeast Asia, were sent here for decoding and translation, were the officers in these various regions thereafter notified of the contents of the message which they had intercepted but which they could not translate or decode?

General MILES. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. That was true of all these points, including the Hawaiian Islands?

General MILES. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no different treatment of these messages, or no information given to high authorities, those at Panama, Manila, and southeast Asia, after these messages [2265] were sent here in the original form and decoded and translated, that information was kept with the War Department here and not disseminated to these various points?

General MILES. There was no difference made between the different overseas departments.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. General, I would like to inquire briefly, if I may, with respect to certain pages of exhibit 2, with which you are thoroughly familiar, beginning on page 16, which has the heading "B. Messages translated after 7 December 1941," and continuing to and including page 29 in this same exhibit, which, I believe, embraces the messages received before the attack on Pearl Harbor which were translated after the attack on Pearl Harbor; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir; though not necessarily received in Washington, probably not received in Washington. This one, as an example, is dated November 24. It was not translated until the 16th of December. In all probability that was picked up, although I cannot state it as a fact, by an intercepting station which did not have the facilities for rapid transmission to Washington.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, that was the next question I had intended to present to you, General. These pages to which I have referred show that the space of time from the date shown [2266] at the top of the message to the date shown at the bottom as the date of translation varied all the way from 2 days to 22 days.

Now, I was in the act of asking you whether that date at the top of each of these messages indicates the date that the message was received by the Army Intelligence Service here in Washington.

General MILES. No, sir; it does not.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That means—

General MILES. It is the date which that message was sent from Tokyo, or wherever it was sent from.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The date at the top of the message is the date that it was sent from Honolulu to Tokyo or from Tokyo to Honolulu, or whatever the case may be?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, is there anything on this page 16 to which I now invite your attention, that shows the date or the time that that intercepted message came to the attention of the Intelligence Service here in Washington?

General MILES. Yes, sir. The date at the bottom of the page is the date of its translation and almost invariably it was passed on from SIS to MID, ONI, on that same day.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Then is it correct to understand that all of these messages contained on the pages to which [2267] I have invited your attention were decoded and translated in Washington the day they were received in Washington?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not say that. You asked me, as I understood it, Mr. Congressman, was there anything in this message to indicate the date on which the Military Intelligence Division received the message. I replied, "Yes, that was the date on which it was translated in the great majority of cases, or at least the next day."

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, let's try to be more specific, if I may, General. I am just seeking light. I know you are anxious to help us and give all the light you can.

Take this page 16 in exhibit 2:

From: Honolulu (Kita).
To: Tokyo.
November 24, 1941.
Number 234 (part 1 of 2).
Re your number 114-a.
Strictly secret.

Now, I will not take the time to read the message, which covers most of the page.

Down at the bottom:

a—Not available.

Under that:

Army.
[2268] 26351.
(Japanese).
Trans. 12-16-41 (2).

What is there on that page to show when this intercepted message reached G-2 of the Army?

General MILES. The date of translation, sir, was almost invariably the date on which we received it. In other words, when this message was decoded, translated, it was very promptly sent from SIS to Military Intelligence Division. If it came in very late one night it might arrive very early the next morning. There might be one day's difference on the record.

Mr. GESELL. May I interpose, Congressman?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. GESELL. I believe the difficulty is that General Miles is telling you when the message was received by G-2 and I believe the Congressman is anxious to know when the message reached Washington, i. e., the Signal Corps. That is, perhaps the difficulty in the question.

General MILES. To answer that last one, sir, there is nothing to show when this intercepted message, uncoded and untranslated, was received by SIS.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is the Signal Intelligence Service?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

But I have no doubt that they have records in additon to [2269] what is shown on this page which might indicate that.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could I—will you yield, Congressman?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. I have in mind that if counsel through General Miles over the week end may be able to find in the Department some information on that, it will be helpful, so that we could have when each one of these messages was received by the Signal Corps here in Washington. The information is not complete on this data.

Mr. GESELL. The information is not complete here, Senator.

If I may suggest, since the question of receipt and translation is a matter within the province of the Signal Corps and not in the province of General Miles, it would be appropriate to present that information through the Signal Corps officers who are going to testify.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. They will appear?

Mr. GESELL. They will appear. Colonel Sadtler and others, who will be familiar with those details.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman—

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I might say, naturally I felt disturbed when I examined these pages and saw that from what was apparent here from 2 days to 22 days of time had elapsed between the date of the message and the time it was translated. [2270] I was concerned about that.

Now, I was just wondering how General Marshall, Chief of Staff, to whom this information was given by you as G-2 of his staff, could operate with a full degree of understanding if 22 days had elapsed from the time that a message was intercepted before it was translated and decoded and presented to him for his attention.

That was one thing I was hoping to get some light and information on.

As I understand it, officers of the Signal Corps would be the ones to whom I should address those questions?

General MILES. They would be able to give you more tactical information than I. I think you will find that the average times was far less than 22 days.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, this particular one to which I have been inviting your attention was sent November 24 and translated December 16. That is 22 days.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And the same thing is true of the one appearing on page 17. It was sent on November 24 and translated December 16, which was 22 days.

The one appearing on page 18 was sent November 28, translated December 8, which was 10 days.

The one appearing on page 19 was sent November 28, [2271] translated December 8, which was 10 days.

The one appearing on page 20 was sent December 1, translated December 10, which, of course, is 10 days.

The one appearing on page 21, the first one, was sent December 2, translated January 30, which was 28 days.

The CHAIRMAN. December 30.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. December 30, which was 28 days.

The second one on that page was sent December 3, translated December 10, which was 7 days.

On page 22, one sent December 3, translated December 11, which was 8 days.

And so on, without calling attention to each individual one. The time varies from 2 days to 28 days that elapsed from the time the message was sent until it was transmitted.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. I would like to ask counsel whether or not there has been produced up to this time the report of the SIS or the Signal Corps of the Army. Have you any reports from either the SIS or the Signal Corps with relation to their transactions during this period under questioning?

Mr. GESELL. I believe, Congressman, that some of the information that you inquire about is contained in the Clark report to which reference has been made.

[2272] Mr. KEEFE. I have been trying to get my hands on the report of the Signal Corps and the SIS without success up to date. Now, is that a restricted report?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Congressman, you asked for the annual report of the Signal Corps. It came into our hands either yesterday or the day before and I dictated a note and ordered it delivered at your office. It was a Signal Corps report for 1 year that you asked for.

Mr. KEEFE. That is what I wanted.

Mr. MITCHELL. It ought to be in your office now.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I haven't been there, of course, this afternoon.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, might I inquire from counsel—

Mr. MITCHELL. I might say, I looked it over. I don't think there is much in it that helps but if there is anything else you want we will try to get it.

Senator FERGUSON. Will the Congressman yield for a question?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. These messages, the Japanese messages concerning military installations, ship movements, and so forth, in the yellow booklet, do they come to us in the original, showing all the checks and information on them? Do they come [2273] to us just as you print them here?

Mr. GESELL. These messages, Senator, as contained in exhibit 2, as I am quite certain was explained at the executive session of the committee, have certain technical data deleted for reasons of security, but the text of the message is not in any way affected thereby.

Senator FERGUSON. What I am trying to get at is this, did they have any method of time stamping on the receipt of these messages by the various departments, so that if we saw the original message we could get the information that Congressman Cooper is now endeavoring to get?

Mr. GESELL. No. It is my understanding that that information is not on the originals of these messages that are in the file. I believe to the extent that the data is available, and there is a great deal of it that is, it will have to be assembled from work sheets and other detailed notes of the people concerned with translating and decoding in the SIS.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, so that I understand, what is deleted from the messages? Let's take the one on page 25 as an example.

Mr. GESELL. I would prefer to discuss that question with the Senator, as we have done before, in executive session, but the text of the message is complete and full as here printed.

[2274] Mr. MITCHELL. The only thing deleted, Mr. Senator, is some technical information.

Senator FERGUSON. You mean the kind of a code?

Mr. MITCHELL. Things of that kind.

Senator FERGUSON. I haven't any desire to get that kind of information, but I am desirous of getting the information as to the time of receipt of the message in the various departments and if they are not marked I would like to have some witness explain why the departments didn't keep track of when they received the message.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is exactly what I have been trying to secure but I got the impression from the statements of counsel and General Miles that probably we could get that information better from officers of the Signal Corps.

Mr. GESELL. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will also produce photostats of some of these messages which are of particular moment, like the fourteenth part message, so you will have an exact copy of just the way the record looks in the War Department. We will have the original here and the work papers. That has been arranged for.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask one more question and suspend, as the hour of adjournment has about arrived.

[2275] General, I understood you to say that for years it had been understood by the Army—I assume that means, of course, the high-ranking officers of the Army—that hostilities with Japan would involve an attack on Hawaii, and that a knowledge of the Japanese people caused the anticipation of a surprise attack.

That is substantially and in essence your statement on that, isn't it?

General MILES. That the possibility if not the probability of an attack on Hawaii was inherent in a Japanese war. You gentlemen of the Congress appropriated millions of dollars for that fortress. Against whom were you building it?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I understand that, but what I am trying to get at is your statement that it had been understood by the Army for years that that was the situation.

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Then would it naturally follow that the military commander at Hawaii might reasonably be expected to understand that also?

General MILES. I could certainly say that the four generals under whom I have had the honor to serve at Hawaii gave me every indication that they understood that situation all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand in recess until [2276] 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

(Whereupon, at 4 p. m., the committee recessed until 10 a. m., Monday, December 3, 1945.)

[2277]

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[2278] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

When the committee recessed on Friday, Congressman Cooper was in the process of examining General Miles.

Before we resume, the chairman would like to ask counsel, in view of the interest in the time when General Marshall will appear before the committee, and in view of the statement that was made the other day that he would advise counsel and the committee what his schedule might be so that we might determine that matter, I should like to ask counsel if he has any information on that matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, Mr. Chairman. On account of his plans to leave for China, he has a rather tight schedule and this morning, about a half an hour ago, I was advised that he would like to testify, commence his testimony on Thursday, December 6, at 10 o'clock and that arrangement has been made, subject, of course, to the committee's approval.

General Marshall's examination will cover all phases of the inquiry with which he was concerned, including the events of December 6 and December 7, as to which we had originally expected to make a special order later.

At the conclusion of General Miles' testimony, we would like to call General Gerow and get as far as we can with him before General Marshall is called, because there are certain things that General Gerow knows that would be well [2279] to lay into the record, if we can, before General Marshall is called.

But it is 10 o'clock Thursday, if that is agreeable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of General Marshall's situation, I am sure there is no objection on the part of the committee to having him come Thursday, no matter whom it may displace.

Congressman Cooper.

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Chairman, before Congressman Cooper begins, there are two other matters I would like to bring to the attention of the committee.

General Miles informed me this morning there are two points in his testimony which he wishes to modify, and I think he should be given that opportunity before the examination commences.

Also the question was raised during General Miles' examination, both by questions from counsel and members of the committee, concerning this matter of the delay in translations of certain messages which were sent by the Japanese prior to December 7, but not translated, decoded, and made available to the Military Intelligence Division until sometime after the 7th or late on the 6th.

I, when that came up, advised the committee that we had witnesses scheduled, both from the Army and the Navy, who [2280] would give detailed information concerning that matter. I would like to elaborate that statement for the information of the committee, and point out that in the case of the Army, the Signal Corps, not the Military Intelligence Division, was responsible for interception, decoding, and translation, as has been testified.

We have made and are making a detailed inquiry into the Army and the Navy records and will be in a position with respect to all of the messages in question, we believe, or at least, the great bulk of them, to present to the committee through those witnesses, both from the Army and Navy records, the following information:

The time at which each of the messages in question was intercepted;

The monitoring station which intercepted the message;

The time at which the message was forwarded by the monitoring station to the Army Signal Intelligence Service or to Naval Communications, as the case may be;

The method by which the monitoring station forwarded the message, whether by airmail, teletype or radio;

The time at which the intercepted copy was sent by the Army Signal Corps Intelligence Service, or Naval Communications, or vice versa, for processing, that is to say, decoding and translation.

[2281] That material is all being assembled and will be presented to the committee through the witnesses who were directly concerned in those phases of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. General Miles, before Congressman Cooper proceeds, do you want to make a statement with reference to your testimony heretofore given?

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES (Resumed)

General MILES. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

I find that, on reading the transcript, that in one case my testimony was wrong. I understood, or got the impression, erroneously, that counsel was speaking in the past tense. What he asked me was:

Do you have any information as to whether or not General Short or other Army officers knew of these Navy messages?

The CHAIRMAN. Would you mind indicating what page of the record that appears?

General MILES. On the bottom of page 2223.

I replied:

I have no specific information on that point.

That was true as of 1941. It was not true as of today, or as of last week.

I had seen last week, and before I gave this testimony, [2282] a copy of an affidavit from Col. George W. Bicknell, assistant to the Assistant Chief of Staff, G-2, in Hawaii, before Colonel Clausen.

[2283] In this affidavit Colonel Bicknell says:

Before 7 December 1941 and about 3 December 1941, I learned from Navy sources of the destruction of codes and papers by Japanese diplomatic representatives in Washington, London, Hongkong, Singapore, Manila, and elsewhere. I was shown a wire from the Navy Department, Washington, D. C., in effect as set forth on page 183, Top Secret Volume "C", testimony of Captain L. F. Safford, U. S. N. At about this same time this information was discussed with Commander Rochefort and Mr. Shivers, when Mr. Shivers told me that the FBI had intercepted a telephone message from the Japanese Consulate, Honolulu, which disclosed that the Japanese Consul General was burning and destroying all his important papers. In the morning of 6 December 1941, at the usual staff conference conducted by the Chief of Staff for General Short I told those assembled, which included the Chief of Staff, what I had learned concerning the destruction of their important papers by Japanese Consul, and stated that because of this and concurrent information which I had from proved reliable sources that the destruction of such papers had a very serious intent and that something warlike by Japan was about to happen somewhere.

[2284] The other point I would like to make, Mr. Chairman, is that I fear on rereading my testimony that I have given the impression of complacency on my part and on the part of my Division with regard to these delays in the magic messages. I very deliberately avoided testifying to the technical side of the decoding of these messages.

(1) Because I am not competent to really go into the technical side of it; and

(2) Because you will have before you a competent officer of the Signal Corps who handled this matter directly.

It was not, of course, my province, but I would like to say we were by no means complacent about it. We knew simply the difficulty of doing this work. Three processes had to be performed. A message had to be deciphered, then it had to be decoded, and then the Japanese had to be translated into English.

I have testified as to what my Division was able to do to aid the Signal Corps in translations. The other two very important and highly technical processes of deciphering and decoding we were not competent to aid in, and I felt sure that those devoted men who spent so much time on it were doing everything they possibly could in the matter.

The astonishing thing, Mr. Chairman, was not that these messages were delayed in the process of translation from [2285] Japanese to English, but that we were able to do it at all. It was a marvelous piece of work on the part of the highly technical men who handled that extraordinary job of breaking codes and ciphers.

[2286] The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Cooper?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. General, toward the end of your testimony at your last appearance I asked you a question that I would like to repeat at this time to connect up with the previous testimony that you have given.

On page 2275 of the record I asked you the question:

General, I understood you to say that for years it had been understood by the Army—I assume that means, of course, the high ranking officers of the Army—that hostilities with Japan would involve an attack on Hawaii, and that a knowledge of the Japanese people caused the anticipation of a surprise attack.

And then I asked you if that is substantially and in essence your statement on that point.

Then you answered:

That the possibility if not the probability of an attack on Hawaii was inherent in a Japanese war. You gentlemen of the Congress appropriated millions of dollars for that fortress. Against whom were you building it?

Then I asked you:

I understand that, but what I am trying to get [2287] at is your statement that it had been understood by the Army for years that that was the situation.

And you answered then:

That is correct, sir.

Then I asked you:

Then would it naturally follow that the military commander at Hawaii might reasonably be expected to understand that also?

And your reply then was:

I could certainly say that the four Generals under whom I have had the honor to serve at Hawaii gave me every indication that they understood that situation all right.

Now, that answer, of course, still stands as you gave it there?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And it does come within your knowledge, then, that the four generals who were in command of the Hawaiian Department during your period of service there understood the situation as you have indicated by the statement you have made here?

Senator LUCAS. Did he answer?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I can make that absolutely flat statement. I worked under those commanding generals in [2288] the preparation of war plans, the revision of war plans and of the defense projects, and I am convinced that all of those four gentlemen, as well as General Drum, who later took command, and when I was here in the War Plans Division, thoroughly understood that that outpost had one sole mission, the defense of the naval base in a Japanese war.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Then, as far as you know, that was the understanding by all of those who were in command of the Hawaiian Department?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, I assume that the whole purpose of all of these war games and similar activities in which the Army engaged from time to time was more or less as a practice to be trained and prepared for the time when the real thing might come, is that true?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And throughout the years there had been various war games and maneuvers and practices of that kind?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, the results of those war games and practices were reported to the War College and other divisions and branches of the Army for study and preparation, were they not?

[2289] General MILES. Reports were made on the large maneuvers by the Hawaiian Department to the General Staff in Washington. They were usually reviewed by the War Plans Division of the General Staff. Many local maneuvers, war games and exercises were not, as I remember it, reported to Washington.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. But it was the practice to make use of the experience gained during those war games and practices of that type, wasn't it, for the benefit of our officers of the Army who were not engaged in the particular game at the time.

General MILES. Yes, sir. Our war plans for the defense of Hawaii, the defense project and the war plan itself had been built up during years of study and experience of various maneuvers and exercises. It was a splendid command in which to serve as a G-3, both from the point of training and of operations, because there was but one situation you had to consider and one enemy and all of your experience and the experience of men who had gone before you was all down one path.

General Wells particularly saw that every officer landing in Hawaii, saw to it that every officer landing in Hawaii for duty with the Hawaiian Department, read certain documents on the defense of Hawaii, documents which used [2290] the term "Orange" as the term for the enemy and everybody knew who "Orange" was.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That was a part of his duty to do that, wasn't it?

General MILES. That was an order of General Wells, certainly, regarding all officers of all ranks who joined the Hawaiian Department.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, wasn't it a part of the duty of any officer in command of Hawaii to do that, to be familiar with the experiences gained through these previous war games and maneuvers and experiences of that kind?

General MILES. I would say so, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. So, then it would be reasonable to assume that it was a part of the duty of any commander in command of the Army forces in Hawaii to familiarize himself with the experience gained through previous war games and maneuvers of that type?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I think that is a correct statement. When I was in the War Plans Division in the middle thirties we went even beyond that and attempted to have ordered to Washington for a short period of duty not only commanding generals going out to Hawaii but their chief staff officers, so that we could have consultations with them on that very point, the existing war plans and the experiences [2291] that were behind those war plans. I remember distinctly General Patton coming to Washington at our request before he went to Hawaii as G-2.

Mr. GESELL. Congressman Cooper, I do not like to interpose but I think the committee should be informed—

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I yield with pleasure, of course.

Mr. GESELL (continuing). that General Miles has made available to us this morning the excerpts from the memoranda of General Drum which he referred to in his testimony as relating specifically to the matter that the Congressman is covering in his testimony.

I have one copy of these excerpts here and have just glanced at them. I think they are quite pertinent and I would like to hand them to you or have them put in the record.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, read it at this point.

Mr. GESELL. The reference occurred at pages 2168 and 2169 of the transcript and I think one of the members of the committee or counsel, I forget which, asked General Miles to make available the material that he was referring to in the correspondence of General Drum and that is the reason that it is material to have this come to us at this time.¹

The VICE CHAIRMAN. All right, read it in at this point. Allow me to inquire, though, before you do that, when was General Drum in command at Hawaii?

[2292] General MILES. General Drum, as I remember, sir, took command in 1935, I should say about the middle of the year 1935 and I think he was out there 3 years.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Three years, is that right?

General MILES. But I am not sure of that. I think 3 years.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. 1935, and that would take him to about 1938?

General MILES. And General Herron was in command before General Short.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. All right.

General MILES. Perhaps General Drum was there only 2 years.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. All right. Proceed then, Mr. Gesell and read them.

Mr. GESELL. The first is entitled: "Excerpt from memorandum from Major General H. A. Drum, Commander, Hawaiian Department, to the Adjutant General, War Department, dated September 21, 1935: Subject: Defense mission Hawaiian Dept." [Reading:]

Many assumptions are plausible as to an enemy's action against Hawaii. The variable factor relates to the location of our fleet at the time of an emergency or [2293] its success in an encounter with the enemy's main fleet. We can enumerate enemy's possible modes of action as including blockades, air raids, naval raids, landing raids, air attacks, naval attacks, landings in force, local uprisings and sabotage or any combination of these. We can assume with some certainty that local uprisings will occur on all the islands of the territory and that the first enemy hostile action will be attempted as a surprise. With our fleet present in the Pacific and undefeated, hostile external action will probably be limited to air, naval, and land raids combined with local uprisings. Hostile naval success would, no doubt, be followed by a combination of blockade and landing and air operations in force.

Pearl Harbor, with its drydock, its shops, gas and oil tanks, and ammunition storage, and our air installations on Oahu are extremely vulnerable to air attacks. One oriental power is strong enough in surface vessels and aircraft to execute successful air attacks against these objectives unless intercepted in sufficient time and with sufficient strength to defeat the attacks.

The doctrine that the only certain way to defeat an aggressive air force decisively is to destroy it on its base is sound and is applicable to the defense of [2294] Oahu. To prevent the destruction of or serious damage to our air fields on Oahu and Pearl Harbor by hostile aircraft, carriers must be sunk or driven off before they can launch their aircraft and the enemy must be prevented from establishing air bases on other islands within range.

From either an offensive or defensive viewpoint of our problem, timely information of a hostile approach is essential. The essential factor in this connection is to receive warnings of the approach of hostile air forces in sufficient time to permit our air forces to leave the ground and attack the enemy's carriers before they are within airplane operating radius of our vital installations on Oahu.

Assuming that carrier-based bombardment airplanes have an operating radius of 200 miles and that our bombardment is "in readiness" and loaded with the proper types of bombs—the highest practicable degree of readiness—first information of the carriers must be received when they are at least 300 miles from Oahu in order for our bombardment aviation to attack the carriers before they launch their aircraft. Advance notice of greater length of time is desirable. The maintenance of an aerial screen nearly 2,000 miles long requires a large number of airplanes. Economy demands the operation of some of our airplanes from the most distant islands in the Archipelago such as Kauai and Hawaii in order to reduce the time of flight to and from the 300 miles circle.

Now, the other memorandum, if the Congressman wishes me to proceed.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes, I would like for you to proceed but let us have the date of the one you just read.

Mr. GESELL. That was dated September 21, 1935.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is a memorandum of General Drum?

Mr. GESELL. That is right.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. To the War Department?

Mr. GESELL. To the Adjutant General, War Department.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. War Department. All right, go ahead.

Mr. GESELL. Now, the next one is an excerpt from the memorandum of Maj. Gen. E. T. Conley, the Adjutant General, to the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, dated April 2, 1936.

I take it this is a memorandum going the other way, from the War Department to the Commanding General, dated April 2, 1936.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That would be correct, wouldn't it, General?

[2296] General MILES. Yes, sir. That was the final answer of the War Department to General Drum's letter of September 1935, which the counsel has just read.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And that was the statement from the War Department to the Army commander at Hawaii?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GESELL. This reads:

4. "The need for suitable air fields (on the outlying islands) as an essential and vital element of the defense plans of the Hawaiian Department."

a. This point concerns our use of outlying air fields in defense, primarily against hostile sea-borne aviation. The enemy's use of such outlying fields would be dependent, as already indicated, upon our ability or inability to deny them to him, and upon his ability to repair the damage done to them by our initial demolition or subsequent air bombardments.

b. In the basic letter (Paragraph 3 b) the point is stressed that the only certain way to defeat an aggressive air force decisively is to destroy it on its bases. From this it is argued that our air forces based on Hawaii and Kauai would be of appreciable advantage in attacking hostile air forces while still on their carriers.

[2297] c. The War Department recognized that the installations at Pearl Harbor are vulnerable to air attack; that the enemy may have sufficient seapower to make such an attack from carriers; that the only certain way to defeat such a hostile air force is to sink or drive off the carriers before they can launch their planes; and, finally, that timely information of a hostile approach would be the essential factor in this problem.

d. The question therefore arises whether our air forces based on Hawaii and Kauai could solve this problem. This appears very doubtful when viewed in the light of the latest information on possible enemy sea-borne air power.

e. Information received from the Office of Naval Intelligence is to the effect that each of the four Orange carriers is capable of a sustained maximum speed for 8 or 10-hour runs of between 25 and 28.5 knots an hour. This would mean that these carriers, during an 8-hour night, could make an approach of between 215 and 245 miles, or in a 10-hour night an approach of between 270 and 305 miles.

f. Furthermore, according to information from the Office of Naval Intelligence, the radius of action of existing Orange carrier-based bombers is 330 miles. [2298] This radius will undoubtedly be materially increased as aviation is further developed. But it is not even safe to use the radius of existing Orange bombers in our calculations, since the enemy might conceivably expend his planes in non-return flights provided the target is of sufficient importance. On such flights they could go about 600 miles (the range equals somewhat less than twice the radius with bombing loads). Hence the fastest Orange carrier running in to launch a bombing attack against Oahu could be at least 600 miles, and might be 900 miles, from Oahu by dusk of a ten-hour night. If, upon reaching her dusk position, she were discovered by a Blue observation plane, she could be prevented from successfully launching her bombers the following dawn only—

(1) If our observation plane tracked her throughout the night, a most difficult operation involving continuous circling and about 900 miles of flight; and

(2) If our bombardment planes were so accurately directed as to catch the carrier just at dawn.

g. In order to surmount these serious difficulties and enable our bombers to catch the carrier before she enters the screen of night, we would have to discover her before she reaches her dusk position, i. e., 65 [2299] miles (or 100 miles if the enemy chose to expend his bombers) from that position (distances covered by carrier at cruising speed while our bombers were coming out 600 miles (or 900 miles)). Our observation plane would then have to track the carrier for 4 (or 6) daylight hours, in spite of whatever the carrier's pursuit planes could do. In any event, it would necessitate the carrier being discovered 665 miles (or 1,000 miles) from Oahu.

h. An observation screen even 665 miles from Oahu would require that our planes cover a perimeter of about 4,180 miles—an impossible task.

i. Lastly, it should be noted that, if the hostile carrier and her bombers approached from the northeast, with the trade wind, they would have the following advantages:

(1) The hostile sea and air speeds would be increased, whereas our air speeds would be reduced, and, in consequence, our observation screen would have to be still farther from Oahu than indicated above.

(2) The enemy would at all times be closer to Oahu than to Hawaii or to Kauai, because of the geographical configuration of the Hawaiian Archipelago. [2300]

(3) His bombers would approach Pearl Harbor from the most favorable direction, that over the Koolau Range, which is almost continually shrouded in a cloud bank.

j. The air bases on Hawaii and Kauai would be, respectively, 222 and 120 land miles from Pearl Harbor. It can be shown diagrammatically that should the hostile carriers approach Oahu from any point in a segment of 325° approximately from the northeast clockwise around to the north, these air bases would be of value, both in the maintenance of the observation screen and in the interception of the carriers by our bombers. But there would still remain a segment of 35° of possible hostile approach in which these air bases would be of no value, and a hostile approach from this segment would be materially aided by the prevailing trade wind.

k. For the above reasons it would appear that long-range bombardment based on Hawaii and Kauai, while of assistance in the defense of Oahu, would not solve the problem presented and, therefore, could not justify the great initial and continuing expenses involved in peace-time garrisons adequate to their ground defense in war.

[2301] I am sorry to interpose, but it seems that is pertinent to what you were reading.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is all right. Am I correct, General, in my understanding that these two documents just read into the record by counsel relate entirely to Hawaii?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The first document read was a memorandum from General Drum, the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department, covering his views and ideas with respect to the defense of Hawaii, and that memorandum was sent to the Hawaiian Department; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir; it was an official letter covering General Drum's ideas and desires with regard to the defense of Hawaii from an attack by Japanese planes based on carriers. That is to say, so much of the letter as has been read refers to that particular point.

The second letter the counsel read was the official reply of the War Department to the basic or original letter from General Drum in which the whole matter was thoroughly gone into from the War Department point of view. It should, of course, be noted that in early 1936 we were just beginning to build our big bombers and radar was unknown.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The second memorandum read into the record by counsel was the War Department's views and position [2302] with respect to the points raised in General Drum's memorandum to the War Department?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And all of it related to the possibility of an air attack from carriers by Japan upon Hawaii and Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, is it correct to assume that succeeding commanders of the Hawaiian Department had the benefit of this expression and information from the War Department on this point?

General MILES. I have every reason to believe that that important letter, correspondence, was on file in the Hawaiian Department.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And for practical purposes, that letter from the War Department to the Hawaiian Department amounted to a blueprint as to a defense to meet hostile air attack from carriers from Japan?

General MILES. It amounted to a discussion of that problem, Mr. Congressman. I cannot say it was a blueprint, because at that time we were not able to give General Drum, nor were we ever able to give the commanding general out there sufficient airplanes to cover this enormous perimeter.

It is a discussion of the problem as it existed in 1936 [2303] when, as I pointed out, radar was unknown.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, the fact that radar later existed, would be an additional advantage that the commander of the Hawaiian Department might utilize in furthering that defense program, was it not?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The fact is that everything the War Department told him in that letter or communication would still obtain, and if subsequent to that time radar or anything else that might contribute to a defense of Hawaii came into existence, why that would be that much additional that he might have to utilize for the purpose of defending Hawaii?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And of course the fact is that the actual attack on December 7, 1941, was made by Japan as an air attack from airplane carriers?

General MILES. So far as I know, sir, it was made almost exactly as we had worked it out with General Drum in 1935-36.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The actual attack occurred almost exactly as was worked out in this communication from General Drum and from the War Department back to the commander of the Hawaiian Department?

General MILES. So far as I know, from what has been published on the Japanese operation, the actual operation was [2304] very similar to what we had worked out with General Drum in 1935-36.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Then, General, I understood you to state that during the time you were stationed in Hawaii—I believe as an Operations Officer—

General MILES. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That war games were worked out and executed that involved an air attack by Japan on Hawaii at that time.

General MILES. Yes, sir. It was always assumed that no serious attack could be made on Hawaii without the use by Japan of strong air forces. It was always assumed, even in a landing attack, with no intent to bomb the fleet, it would have to be supported by very strong air forces.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, General, just a few other questions. I do not want to detain you too long because I know other members of the committee want to inquire of you.

Did you, as a general officer of the Army, and as G-2 of the Army General Staff, consider the message of the Chief of Staff of November 27, 1941, to the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department as sufficient warning to cause proper and necessary alerts to be put into effect?

General MILES. I did, sir, most definitely.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And then the following day, I believe [2405] November 28, you, as G-2 of the General Staff of the Army sent a message to G-2 of the Hawaiian Department?

General MILES. I did, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And you regarded that as a sufficient warning to cause an alert to be put into effect?

General MILES. I did not regard my message to the G-2 of the Hawaiian Department as one which in itself would have caused any action by the Commanding General. If I had so regarded it, I would not have sent it. My message of November 27 was supplementary to the message sent by General Marshall, Chief of Staff, so that in any warning to my opposite number in Hawaii, the G-2, I was simply carrying out a policy, a decision which had been made by my chief, the Chief of Staff of the Army.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, it would serve the purpose of further accentuating it, would it not?

General MILES. I understood so, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, isn't it true that after a sufficient warning was given to the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department, such as you considered the message from the Chief of Staff of November 27, 1941, to be, he was presumed to know what to do to defend Hawaii, and those under his command?

General MILES. I assure, sir, that he had no other [2306] purpose or reason for having that command than that.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. No other reason for them being there, was there?

General MILES. That was the essential reason, from the commanding general down to every last soldier who was on that island.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The commanding general of the Hawaiian Department at that time was a major general, wasn't he?

General MILES. He was a lieutenant general, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. A lieutenant general.

Well, of course, then, there was not any corporal or sergeant in command there, and a lieutenant general of the United States Army would be presumed to know what to do if somebody started shooting at him, would he not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

[2307] The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now one other question, if I may, General, with respect to these intercepted Japanese messages.

I, of course, expect to wait until the officers of the Signal Corps appear to ask them more in detail about it, but I understood you to say that the Signal Corps of the Army was under the Chief of Staff, or the chief signal officer of the Army reported to the Chief of Staff.

General MILES. Yes, sir. The heads of all branches of the Army were directly under the Chief of Staff.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And the Signal Corps did not come under G-2 or Army Intelligence?

General MILES. It did not come under G-2 or directly under any other branch of the General Staff.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, did the Quartermaster Corps, the Engineer Corps, and various other similar branches of the Army also come under the Chief of Staff and not under G-1, G-2, G-3, G-4, as the case might be?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. These intercepted messages had been received by you prior to the time about which I inquired the other day, had they not? The inquiries I addressed to you at the other session were with respect to the messages received and sent from November 24, 1941, to about December 6, 1941, but intercepted messages from Japan had been brought [2308] to your attention before that time, had they?

General MILES. Oh, yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Had your attention been attracted by unusual delay in the decoding and translation of those messages?

General MILES. No, sir. I remember that I knew and noted that the period of time between when the message was sent and when I saw it in English varied considerably with different messages, which I thought was perfectly natural, knowing something about the difficult science of cryptology, and the ability of all countries to change rapidly their ciphers although they could not change their codes very rapidly.

I thought at that time I had every reason to believe that the SIS section was doing everything possible to give us those messages as rapidly as they could, and I repeat, the amazing thing was that they could give them to us at all.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I could well appreciate that point, General, but the fact is that they did intercept them and that they did decode and translate them.

General MILES. Decrypt, decode and translate them.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And as shown by these exhibits to which attention has been invited, it took varying periods of time for that to be done.

General MILES. That is true, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, of course, the message was intercepted [2309] the day it was sent from Tokyo or from Honolulu, as the case might be, was it not?

General MILES. That was certainly true of all radio messages.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, would not any message have to be intercepted at the time it was being transmitted?

General MILES. By radio; yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes, by radio. So that the date that it was sent was the date that time began to run so far as the decoding and translating of that message was concerned?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, then, one other question, I believe, if I may, General.

Has it been the custom of the Army for a long time in peacetime to allow all personnel of the Army who can be spared from essential work to take week-ends off?

General MILES. If they can be spared, if the situation is such that they can be spared it was normally the custom that, in times of peace, the officers could leave their posts by permission of their commanding officers, yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. What I was endeavoring to get at, General, has not that been the practice, or the custom, for a long time when we were not at war for personnel of the Army to be given the opportunity to take week-ends off?

[2310] General MILES. Yes, sir; as long as I can remember. Of course that was under the limitation that you could not take too many of these. Somebody had to be back on the job.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I realize that, but I just happen to recall, at times when I visited, as an illustration, Walter Reed Army Hospital, or the Navy hospital at Bethesda, to visit friends on Saturday or Sunday, I was rather impressed with the very minimum number of people who were on duty, and that all the others were taking the week end off. Was my impression correct?

General MILES. I think that is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Did that same custom prevail through all branches of the Army?

General MILES. I think you were correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. So that just the very essential and what might be termed the minimum number of people were kept on duty, and all of the others were given an opportunity to be off during the week end?

General MILES. I think that is generally correct, sir. Of course the essential number depended on what the situation was, but in the piping times of peace it was usually reasonably easy to get the permission of your commanding officer to leave on Saturday, or perhaps from Saturday to Sunday.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, of course, whatever the situation [2311] may have been in Hawaii on that historic week end of December 7, 1941, it was under the control of the commanding general in command there?

General MILES. In the final analysis it was under the control of the commanding general; yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And if personnel did have the week end off, why, it had to be at his permission, or certainly in accord with his policy?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George.

Senator GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I have a memorandum which I neglected to bring with me this morning. I will pass at the present time. I want to ask a very few questions later.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Clark.

Mr. CLARK. General Miles, the term "alert" has been used frequently in the course of these hearings, the word "alert." Just what does that term fully signify in military parlance?

General MILES. "Alert" is a status of readiness. You alert a command, for instance, to be ready to receive an order to move. In the war plans for many years we had established a certain status of alert, 1, 2, 3, or A, B, C, each one being definitely directed to a certain situation, and the purpose of the alert was to see that the forces alerted were prepared [2312] to meet that situation.

Mr. CLARK. Now the terms "surprise" and "surprise attack" were also frequently mentioned in this record. Would you mind stating to the committee what your understanding, in a military sense, of that term "surprise" is?

General MILES. Well, I should define a surprise attack as one whose objective was to catch the enemy unprepared, unalerted to meet that attack. There is no hidden or technical meaning that I know of in that term. It means exactly what the English words convey.

Mr. CLARK. Well, there was a thought in my mind that coincides with your own, but I also considered whether or not a military attack without a previous declaration of war would be considered as a surprise attack.

General MILES. A surprise attack in the highest form of surprise, I would say.

Mr. CLARK. Now in the analysis and evaluation of the military situation in the Pacific, which you have already been asked about, you stated several alternatives that would be open to Japan, including movement into Indochina, attack on Hainan, and other things, the Philippine Islands. You did not in that evaluation anywhere touch upon the question of the possibility of a surprise attack. I was wondering why you did not go into that.

[2313] General MILES. Those were lines of action which we were trying to define as possible lines of action for Japan. We did not go into the question of how she would conduct tactically any attack which she made, and surprise is one of the tactical principles. We knew, from the characteristics of the Japanese people and from sound military doctrine, that they would, if they could, utilize the tactical principle of surprise. But we were not, in those estimates, referring to any tactical principles she might employ, we were looking at it from the broader point of view of the lines of action she would be apt to take.

Mr. CLARK. That was more or less the natural line of action, was it not?

General MILES. What we thought were the obvious actions. I would not say the natural actions, but the most obvious actions from all the information to the existing situation.

Mr. CLARK. Now at that time there had been a message from the Ambassador to Japan to which you have referred, suggesting a surprise attack on Hawaii, and I believe the Secretary of State had something to say about the possibility of a surprise attack after the 26th of November.

I notice in the messages released by the Chief of Naval Operations, I think Admiral Ingersoll, in which he speaks of a surprise aggressive attack. Now in reading your analysis [2314] and evaluation of the military situation in the Pacific, and in the light of the action by Japan, the question arose in my mind as to why you should not deal in that analysis with the element of surprise.

General MILES. The documents to which I think you refer, Mr. Congressman, were written for the Chief of Staff and other military officials covering a great many difficult subjects. We did not think it necessary, and I still fail to see why it should be necessary, for us to constantly repeat in such documents the obvious. All soldiers have been taught the principle of surprise; it is among the principles of war. I knew in my own mind, so far as Hawaii was concerned, we constantly thought of the element of surprise being in any form of attack that the Japanese might make, that it was a possibility or probability.

I think that is the answer, sir. We did not want to constantly repeat the obvious to the gentlemen who had a great deal to read, and we were asking them to read an awful lot anyway.

Mr. CLARK. I recollect your statement on your direct examination that you considered an attack on Hawaii as being inherent in the military situation.

General MILES. As the possibility or the probability of an attack on Hawaii I considered it inherent in any war with [2315] Japan we might have, no matter how that war started.

Mr. CLARK. Now, from a military standpoint and aside from the fact that the Hawaiian command was taken unawares, leaving that out of consideration, was the attack of December 7 a surprise attack?

General MILES. I fail to understand the question, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I am asking you, from a military standpoint strictly and in view of your statement that an attack there was inherent in the military situation, I am asking you whether in that sense the attack was a surprise attack.

General MILES. Surprise to me or to whom, sir?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; to you.

General MILES. I would like to expand on that question a little bit, sir. In estimating the situation, whether verbal or on paper, there are two principles that should be followed: One is never to lose sight of or ignore anything that the enemy may do which is within its capabilities whether you think it is wise for him to do that or not.

The second is to concede to your enemy the highest form of good sense and good judgment.

Now I think we have followed both of those principles. Now if you would like to ask me whether I thought it was a surprise, we never lost sight of the fact that Japan, if engaged in war, would very probably attack Hawaii, and we took action [2316] on November

27 in warning our outposts, "This situation for which you have been billeted is facing you."

Then we also followed, I think, the same principle. We did grant the Japanese the best of good sense. We did very much question whether he would attack Hawaii, because such an attack must result from two separate decisions on the part of the Japanese, one to make war against the United States, which we thought at that time in the long run would be suicidal, as has since transpired, and, two, to attack a very fortress and fleet, risking certain ships that he could not replace, and knowing that the success in that attack must rest very largely on that surprise being successful; in other words, finding that fortress and that fleet unprepared to meet the attack.

[2317] Mr. CLARK. Do you mean unprepared or unalerted?

General MILES. I mean both, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Well, cannot a command be prepared even if it is unalerted?

General MILES. Not if they were unalerted, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I mean aside from that. You said something about there being no proper element of surprise, that surprise is based on unpreparedness, or the failure to be alerted.

General MILES. Are you speaking, sir, of the military weapons and means available or of the personnel that handle those things? No gun will go off unless the man pulls the trigger, and if the man who is supposed to pull the trigger is not prepared to pull the trigger then that gun is unprepared.

Mr. CLARK. I am speaking of both, General, and asking you whether the success of that attack rested on the lack of the things you have just mentioned, the lack of alertness?

General MILES. I think, sir, it can safely be said that the success of that Japanese attack depended, in very large measure, on their catching the forces unalerted and therefore unprepared to meet that attack.

Mr. CLARK. Well, it comes down then to a question of not being on the alert, does it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

[2318] Mr. CLARK. I had in mind to ask you some questions about the delay in decoding and translating these messages, but in view of the counsel's statement that other witnesses will be called on that, I will waive that.

I would like to call your attention now to the message of General Marshall of November 27. I understood you to say on your direct examination that the mere fact that that message was signed by the Chief of Staff himself had a certain significance.

General MILES. Yes, sir; it had great significance.

Mr. CLARK. What was it?

General MILES. The messages commonly go out on the signature of the Adjutant General. Any assistant chief of staff could have directed the Adjutant General to send a message, or an assistant chief of staff could sign it himself. Very rarely was there a message signed by General Marshall.

Mr. CLARK. Let me interrupt you a moment just there. Messages were sent prior and subsequent to November 27 to the Hawaiian Command by the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. What is the significance of this particular message being signed by the Commander in Chief himself, or the Chief of Staff himself?

[2319] General MILES. Well, the significance lies in the fact that he was Chief of Staff, that he was doing something which is not ordinarily done, and by putting his name to that message, it carried to any military mind, I think—it certainly would to mine—a much greater significance than had it been signed “Adams,” or “Miles,” or “Gerow,” or anybody else.

Mr. CLARK. And that would be well understood by the commanders, the several commanders to whom it was sent?

General MILES. I think so, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Were any others of these numerous messages that we have examined signed by the Chief of Staff himself?

General MILES. I did not hear the first part of your question, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I say, were there any others of these numerous messages we have examined signed by the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. I recall none, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to direct your attention briefly to the language of this message. It says: You are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures you deem necessary. I understood you previously to say there were three methods of reconnaissance available: above the water, on the water, and under the water. Is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

[2320] Mr. CLARK. Now, what were the existing facilities in Hawaii at that time for reconnaissance generally?

General MILES. The Army Air Forces and radar.

Mr. CLARK. Could ships have been used for that purpose?

General MILES. I presume so; yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. The reason I asked you that question, I understood you to say the other day there were three methods open: By air, by surface operation, and by submarine operation. That is what I understood you to say.

General MILES. Yes, sir. Of course, the Army controls no submarines and very few surface ships.

Mr. CLARK. I was not speaking particularly of the Army, General. I mean all of the facilities at the command of the commanding general.

General MILES. You refer, Mr. Congressman, to that particular sentence in General Marshall's message to General Short?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

General MILES. That is why I was answering for the Army only, sir.

[2321] Mr. CLARK. This message also directed what should be done in the event of hostilities, that Rainbow No. Five should be put into operation insofar as the Japanese were concerned?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Now, there is a short sentence in this message consisting of three words “Report measures taken.” That was an order from the Chief of Staff, was it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Can you direct the committee's attention to any message that complies with that order?

General MILES. The committee has, I believe, before it, General Short's reply to General Marshall's message referring to General Marshall's message by its number. I did not see that message.

Mr. GESELL. That is the one that appears at page 12, I believe, Congressman, of exhibit 32.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Now, that message, dated November 28, from General Short, says, "Report department alerted to prevent sabotage. Liaison with Navy"—the next word I am not familiar with, "REURAD"—

General MILES. "Reference your."

Mr. CLARK. "Reference your 472 27th."

[2322] That "472 27th" was, of course, General Marshall's message of that date, was it not; General Miles?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Now, you have told the committee that in the preparation of that message of General Marshall, all reference to sabotage was eliminated; is that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Do you consider that message from General Short that I have just read, in any responsive to the message from General Marshall of the 27th?

General MILES. I certainly do not consider it an adequate reply, if that is what you have in mind, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Does it in any way refer at all to the Marshall message except by number, or to anything in the Marshall message?

General MILES. That is true, sir; the Marshall message did not mention sabotage, nor did it mention liaison with the Navy.

Mr. CLARK. Now, I am asking whether you, as a military man consider that message from General Short in any way responsive to the message from the Chief of Staff?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Did you at the time catch the fact that it was not responsive?

[2323] General MILES. I didn't see the message until the following month, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. CLARK. Whose business was it to see this message and ascertain whether it was responsive to the message of the Chief?

General MILES. The message was sent by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, and the Chief of the War Plans Division. I believe no other officers of the War Department.

Mr. CLARK. Now, that is the only message, is it not, from General Short that even purports to refer to General Marshall's message of the 27th?

General MILES. So far as I know, that is correct, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Well, doesn't it indicate to any military man who would examine it that the Hawaiian command had done no more than to go on an alert against sabotage?

General MILES. I would much prefer that that question be answered by one of the officers who did see the message, sir, at the time.

Mr. CLARK. Well; I don't want to press you, General, but it seems to me with your long and varied experience, you are well qualified to give the committee an opinion.

General MILES. Very well, sir.

My opinion is that that message itself was a totally inadequate reply to the message it purported to reply to. [2324] Although it did not say the department was alerted against sabotage only, there is certainly an inference that that was the fact. The next phrase about liaison with the Navy might or might not have implied that General Short was in consultation with the Navy regarding the measures which he would put into effect, and hence that a further reply might be expected from General Short, or might not.

Mr. CLARK. Well, now, the Marshall message, as you have already said, contained the one sentence order to report measures taken, and on the following day this short Short message came in. What I am asking is whether or not that doesn't disclose to a military man that he had taken no measures other than anti-sabotage?

General MILES. There was that inference which might very well be drawn from General Short's reply.

Mr. CLARK. What other inference would be possible from that reply?

General MILES. The further inference—the other inference was, or might have been, that a reference to liaison with the Navy meant that General Short was then in communication with the Navy regarding the measures which would be jointly put into effect and that a further reply from General Short might, therefore, be expected.

Mr. CLARK. Now, this same message, from the Chief of [2325] Staff of the 27th was sent, in substance, to the West Coast Command and the Philippine Command and the Panama Command, was it not?

General MILES. It was, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Now, I direct your attention to the action of the Philippine Command—it appears on page 11 of these messages, in which General MacArthur refers to the order from General Marshall, or the message from General Marshall, as to reconnaissance being extended and intensified in conjunction with the Navy:

Ground security measures have been taken. Within the limitations imposed by present state of development of this theatre of operations, every thing is in readiness for the conduct of a successful defense. Intimate liaison and cooperation and cordial relations exist between Army and Navy.

I should like also to direct your attention to the action taken by the Western Command, a rather long message of more than a page, in which the state of alert is mentioned, and the measures that are being taken are gone into in some detail. And then the message from the Panama Command, which sent a short message on the 29th saying that a full report was being made by mail which was followed by a letter of some three pages detailing all of the measures taken by that command in response to the message from the chief of November [2326] 26th. You are familiar with all of those?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Isn't there a very marked and noticeable difference between the response from these other commands and the response from the Hawaiian Command?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Doesn't it make, in fairness now—I am trying to get my own thinking straight, General; that is all I am after. I am not meaning to cross-examine you in the ordinary sense of that term—but doesn't it make the failure of the Hawaiian Command to respond specifically at a time which you have yourself referred to as a crisis conspicuously outstanding?

General MILES. Yes, sir; it reflects the very definite degree of alertness of those four commands you mention.

Mr. CLARK. Coming a little closer home, ought not somebody in the War Department to have detected and called attention to that difference?

General MILES. There again I would very much rather that question be answered by one of the gentlemen who did see that message.

Mr. CLARK. But with this conspicuous difference, and what I hope I am fair in terming a wholly unsatisfactory response from the Hawaiian Command, the records in the War [2327] Department remained in that condition from the 27th of November to the 7th of December, without any further report from the Hawaiian Command; that is correct?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. CLARK. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Lucas.

Senator LUCAS. General Miles, with respect to the testimony that you just gave to the Congressman from North Carolina, did you see any of these messages that were sent by the other commands other than the Hawaiian Command?

General MILES. I saw no others.

Senator LUCAS. You saw none of those messages until after the attack on Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Were any of those messages discussed with you by anyone in the Army previous to Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. I remember no discussion on those messages, sir.

Senator LUCAS. So, insofar as these important messages are concerned, you knew nothing about any of them until after the Pearl Harbor attack?

General MILES. That is correct, sir. They were not a responsibility of my division, and I did not know about those messages.

[2328] Senator LUCAS. Whose responsibility was it?

General MILES. The implementation of War Plans, war preparations, was the responsibility of the War Plans Division, General Staff.

Senator LUCAS. Who was the head of that?

General MILES. General Gerow.

Senator LUCAS. Did he ever discuss with you at any time, either before or after, these messages?

General MILES. No, sir; he did not.

Senator LUCAS. General Miles, in the early part of your testimony, you related to the committee that being in charge of G-2 of the General Staff, you reported the information assembled to the Chief of Staff, General Marshall.

Will you give the committee just a little more detailed information upon that phase of your responsibility?

General MILES. Providing information to General Marshall?

Senator LUCAS. That is right.

[2329] Can you elaborate just a little on what you did in the way of giving information to General Marshall, Chief of Staff. How often did you see him and what did you discuss when you gave him this information during this crisis?

General MILES. Well, sir, all of the magic, of course, was going directly to General Marshall through my own officers. I saw General Marshall from time to time when he sent for me. Largely I avoided going to see him on my own initiative unless I had something very important because he was an extremely busy man. I had the responsibility and did prepare certain memoranda giving him information on various points and it is all now before the committee.

Senator LUCAS. When you say General Marshall was an extremely busy man, would you care to elaborate just a little more on that for the record and tell the committee just what he was doing, say, a couple of weeks before this attack took place? What was his chief responsibility at that time?

General MILES. He was doing a herculean task. We were building an army. We weren't getting any too much support from the American people at that time. Looking back on it, we have had 4 years, nearly 4 years of war, when the Congress of the United States was giving us everything we asked for and the people were entirely behind us, but in those pre-Pearl Harbor days that did not exist. We were fighting [2330] to build an army of the United States. General Marshall had to appear before various committees of Congress on numerous occasions. He was doing a great deal of work himself in supervising the training, the maneuvers of the new army, the equipment of the new army, all sorts of problems were being presented to him. He was in direct communication with the higher policy-making officials of the Government: the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, of course, and the President, and the Secretary of the Navy. He was carrying an enormous burden, which later had to be very largely taken off of his shoulders by the complete reorganization of the War Department and the establishment of the Joint and Combined Chiefs of Staff.

But at that time he was not only directing the higher policy and strategy of the United States so far as the military strategy went, but building an army, literally building an army, and administering that army at the same time.

Senator LUCAS. In that important work that General Marshall was doing at that time it was obviously necessary that he depend upon subordinates for much vital information that went into making the final decision?

General MILES. It was, sir.

Senator LUCAS. G-1, G-2, G-3, and G-4 were the four important branches of the military government that was constantly furnishing him the information?

[2331] General MILES. Yes, sir; and he was even in more direct touch with War Plans Division.

Senator LUCAS. You also stated, General, that this same information that you gathered from time to time from various sources was disseminated to others, including the overseas departments.

Now, I want to deal with the Pearl Harbor disaster as an example in your giving military estimates to the overseas departments from time to time. Let me first ask you this question: With whom were you dealing in Hawaii at the time of the disaster and some weeks before?

General MILES. All the information we were sending to Hawaii went through the G-2 of the Hawaiian Department.

Senator LUCAS. And who was the officer in charge of G-2 in Hawaii?

General MILES. Colonel Fielder.

Senator LUCAS. Colonel Fielder?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Did General Short, who was commanding the Hawaiian Department, have complete control over the activities of Colonel Fielder in charge of Military Intelligence there?

General MILES. Yes, sir, Colonel Fielder occupied the same relation vis-a-vis General Short I occupied vis-a-vis [2332] General Marshall. Colonel Fielder was an Assistant Chief of Staff to General Short.

Senator LUCAS. What were your instructions to Colonel Fielder with respect to disseminating information you sent to him to General Short?

General MILES. I had no responsibility and took no action in that matter, sir. That was a matter entirely within the purview of the Commanding General or the Chief of Staff of the Hawaiian Department, how they wanted to run their own staff.

Senator LUCAS. In other words, after you sent information to G-2 in Hawaii that was the end of your responsibility?

General MILES. Yes, sir. It would have been absolutely and entirely out of my waters if I had attempted to lay down any rules or regulations as to how General Short's staff should be run.

Senator LUCAS. I understand that, but you being interested in sending out this information to G-2 in Hawaii, from the standpoint of Intelligence, did the colonel who was in that branch of the service in Hawaii and under the direct command of General Short report to you as to the receipt of this information or give you any evaluation upon it from his point of view?

General MILES. Yes; the G-2's of the overseas departments were sending to us information which they had received or [2333] evaluations of information which we were furnishing them from time to time, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Well, then, am I correct in my understanding that what you sent to G-2 in Hawaii was information only?

Colonel MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Insofar as the Intelligence Branch of the Government was concerned?

General MILES. Yes, sir; evaluated information.

Senator LUCAS. It was in no sense a directive and couldn't be under regulations?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Senator LUCAS. The only person who had the power to issue directives, as I understand it, to anybody in the Hawaiian Islands was General Marshall himself?

General MILES. Yes, sir; any directive that involved a tactical decision or implementation of war plans.

Senator LUCAS. And if no directive was sent by General Marshall, then the evaluation of any information that you sent from the Intelligence Branch of the service in Washington to Hawaii became solely a matter for General Short and his officers in Hawaii?

General MILES. Yes, sir; for whatever use they wanted to make of it.

Senator LUCAS. I think I asked you but I am not sure [2334] that I clearly understood you: Did you get reports from Colonel Fielder—was that his name?

General MILES. Fielder.

Senator LUCAS. Colonel Fielder. Did you get reports from Colonel Fielder upon the information that you sent to him?

General MILES. I remember no specific instance, Senator, but I do know that it was the common custom from time to time to receive from G-2 overseas departments their "come-backs" as we used to call them on information that we were sending them.

Senator LUCAS. Was there any regulation or order in the War Department which compelled Colonel Fielder to report back to you the receipt of this information and his evaluation of it in any way?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator LUCAS. In other words, whatever information you sent to G-2 in Hawaii, as far as the command there is concerned, they could completely ignore and you would have no way of knowing whether they acted intelligently on it or not?

General MILES. No, sir; that depended on the regulations or policies of the Hawaiian staff, as to how they wanted to use that information.

Senator LUCAS. Well, don't you believe that it would have been wise and judicious for the Chief of Naval Intelligence [2335] here in Washington to have known whether or not they were intelligently using this information, from your viewpoint?

General MILES. The Chief of Naval Intelligence?

Senator LUCAS. No, no. I am talking about the Intelligence Department in Hawaii in the command of General Short. I am merely asking you whether or not you don't believe it would have been valuable information for you to have been informed from time to time as to what they were doing with the information you were sending.

General MILES. It would have been valuable, and I think it was so understood. It was always valuable for Military Intelligence to receive what we called "come-backs" from our people in the field. But I want to make this point clear, that General Short's staff was General Short's staff.

Senator LUCAS. I understand.

General MILES. And neither G-2 or War Plans Division, or anybody else in the General Staff in Washington had or should have had authority to require any of General Short's staff officers to do anything.

It it came to a situation in which G-2, we will say, in Washington, thought that G-2 in Hawaii, or Manila, was completely falling down, his only recourse was to go to the Chief of Staff and say, "Will you please inform the commanding general in this place that we are not getting the proper response from his staff and he is not being properly served by his staff."

[2336] Senator LUCAS. Well, now, in addition to the intelligence officer in Hawaii on behalf of the Army, there was also an intelligence officer on Admiral Kimmel's staff?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Do you know what the agreement or what the regulations were with respect to these intelligence officers in Hawaii coordinating the information that they got from Washington and agreeing upon the effect of it?

General MILES. The policy that has always been in effect, so far as I know in the Hawaiian Department, was a complete exchange of information between the G-2 of the Hawaiian Department and the intelligence officer of the Fourteenth Naval District, or when the fleet was present, of the fleet.

Senator LUCAS. Well, did your G-2 officer report to you at any time that that was being done?

General MILES. No, sir; and he was not my G-2 officer. He was General Short's G-2 officer.

Senator LUCAS. Yes; that is correct, that is my error, but at the same time he is the individual to whom you were sending the information, and not General Short.

General MILES. I was sending it directly to the G-2; yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Now, I want to ask you this, General Miles: In making up these military estimates that have been [2337] referred to by counsel from time to time in the record here, what were the factors here in making those determinations, and how did you acquire them?

General MILES. How did we acquire the information?

Senator LUCAS. Yes; that is right. How did you acquire the information upon which you based these military estimates that you sent to overseas departments?

General MILES. We acquired information which eventually went into the estimate of, we will say, Japan in a great many different ways, Senator: Through our military attachés, through our observers, through the State Department and all of its ramifications, including its embassies, legations, and consulates, through contact with civilian firms and the press, through contact with the Office of Naval Intelligence, FBI, a great many different sources of information, and, as I testified, I was constantly trying to enlarge the scope of the information coming in by establishing close liaison with the other departments of the Government.

Senator LUCAS. Well, now, much discussion has centered around the intercepted messages sent out by the Japanese Government. I think you have testified that those intercepted messages were also included as one of the factors in making your determination as to what military estimates you would send to the departments. Is that correct?

[2338] General MILES. The estimates actually sent to the departments were estimates on different countries, sir.

Senator LUCAS. On different what?

General MILES. On different countries.

Senator LUCAS. Yes, sir; that is correct.

General MILES. Based on the running digests that we maintained on that country.

Senator LUCAS. Well, of course, I am confining these estimates primarily to the Japanese situation.

General MILES. Yes, sir. Magic gave us current information rather than static information as I have used the word, which formed the basis of the estimates that we sent out.

I have already gone into the fact that the information that we received from magic was not officially sent to the overseas department because of the great value of the secret that we were breaking the code.

Senator LUCAS. I appreciate that but I was wondering what weight you gave, if any, to these decoded messages that were received from time to time in making up your military estimates on the Japanese situation, or did you give them any consideration at all?

General MILES. Oh, yes, sir; we gave them great consideration, as far as the estimates that we were submitting to the Chief of Staff and to the President and to the Secretary of War, and so forth. [2339]

Senator LUCAS. Well, I understood you to say in answer to a question asked you by Senator Barkley—as I recall, the chairman, Senator Barkley, asked you this question:

Was there any particular difference in the relative importance given to these intercepted messages with respect to the Panama Canal, Hawaii, the Philippines, Southeast Asia or any other regions covered by these intercepted messages relative to the movement of ships?

General MILES. If I understand your question, Senator, these messages as a whole primarily indicated to us what we already knew or could very easily suspect, that the Japanese were doing everything they could to follow the movement of our warships, as I said yesterday, just as we were doing with regard to following the movement of Japanese warships.

And that was the answer that sort of led me to conclude that perhaps from your viewpoint this information was not considered so important because you say that it primarily indicated the things that you already knew.

General MILES. The intercepted magic on the movement of ships was not by the Military Intelligence Division considered of primary importance, it was primarily naval, and the messages taken as a whole indicated something that we [2340] already very strongly suspected, that they were following the movement of every one of our ships.

Senator LUCAS. Well, I believe, General Miles, that I agree with you, taking these messages as a whole, that they were dealing with the arrival and departure of warships, but I want to direct your attention, as counsel did, to the message that was sent from Tokyo to Honolulu on September the 24th, 1941, and interrogate you just briefly about that message.

That message was transmitted by the Army on November the 9th, 1941, some 15 days after it was intercepted.

Mr. MITCHELL. October.

Senator LUCAS. On October the 9th, that is right.

Now, as I understand, this was an Army intercept and came directly to you in due course. After it was intercepted and decoded and translated it came then into your hands?

General MILES. It came to me; yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Now, do you recall at the time of discussing this particular message with anyone when you received it?

General MILES. No, Senator, I do not recall any specific instance in which I discussed this particular message with anyone. Since this message has again been brought up I would like to point out that as we now see it, it looks very [2341] much like an indication of Japanese intent of some sort with regard to Pearl Harbor, but at that time also it meant, if you like, the interest of the Japanese as to whether or not and when the fleet was going in or out of Pearl Harbor.

Pearl Harbor is very narrow, has very restricted waters, and the position of those great ships there, as I understand it, particularly those that are tied up to the dock, would indicate to a naval mind something of the intent of the commanding Admiral of the Fleet to take his fleet to sea within a reasonable time or not, or it might indicate that the position of these ships was very much desired because of the Japanese intent to execute a submarine attack on these ships.

Senator LUCAS. Well, either of these versions, had you looked at it then as you look at it now, of course, would have given you serious concern, I take it.

General MILES. Well, you cannot take a message like that singly, Senator, and say that it is very serious when you know that back of this message there have been all sorts of other messages that we had intercepted regarding Japanese interest in our ships wherever they might be.

Senator LUCAS. Well, that is true, General, and I should like to direct your attention to the first message that is in this exhibit, which was received, decoded, and translated, [2342] dated December the 2d, 1940, and that message was sent from Honolulu to Tokyo and it tells about the ships that were observed in Pearl Harbor.

I don't know whether you know it or not, but from that time on, from December 2, 1940, until September the 24th, 1941, there were, as I understand from an examination of this exhibit, 17 messages sent between December 2, 1940, and September 26, 1941, from Honolulu to Tokyo and there wasn't a single message during that time that was sent from Tokyo to Honolulu.

Now, would that have any significance had you noticed that at the time in making up your military estimates on the Pearl Harbor situation?

General MILES. I do not think that that point came to my attention at that time, Senator. It was so obvious to me that Tokyo need say very little to Honolulu because Honolulu was in a position from those hills to look down on Pearl Harbor and to study the movement of every ship entering in and going out and her berth, and so forth, where she was berthed. It was obvious to us that we could not prevent the Japanese from reporting very accurately the movement of our ships in Pearl Harbor and its adjacent waters.

Senator LUCAS. Well, that may be, General, but I want to take a little more time with this. I want to talk a [2343] little about this message in paragraph—well, first, it comes from Tokyo (Toyoda)—I don't know how to pronounce that, but as I understand it he was the Foreign Minister of Japan at the time the message was sent and that was during the reign of the Konoye Cabinet.

Do you know whether or not Tojo was in the Konoye Cabinet?

General MILES. In which Konoye Cabinet, sir?

Senator LUCAS. Well, on October 16, 1941, when it fell; was Tojo connected with that cabinet in any way?

General MILES. I cannot tell at the moment.

Senator LUCAS. Well, anyhow, he became the Premier immediately following the fall of that cabinet.

Now, in paragraph 2 of this message it says:

With regard to warships and aircraft carriers, we would like to have you report on those at anchor.

Now, where did they anchor warships and aircraft carriers with respect to Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. Would you tell me what page you are reading from, Senator?

Senator LUCAS. Well, I am reading from exhibit 2 on page 12.

General MILES. Yes, I have that. Oh, yes.

[2344] Senator LUCAS. It says:

With regard to warships and aircraft carriers, we would like to have you report on those at anchor.

Then it says in parentheses:

these are not so important.

What does he mean by that?

General MILES. I think just what it says, sir, those anchored in Pearl Harbor and not tied up to wharves or in the docks.

Senator LUCAS. Why does he say that? What would be your reaction now when he says "these are not so important"? What does he mean by that?

General MILES. Well, obviously, I suppose—it is not so obvious. I would suppose that the ships tied up at wharves and in the dock, he meant the drydock, were not prepared for immediate sortie from the harbor or at least prepared to leave the harbor as soon as those which were anchored in the fairway.

Senator LUCAS. Well, I am glad to have your impression of what that means.

Then we go to the message, which proceeds to say:

If possible we would like to have you make mention of the fact when there are two or more vessels along side the same wharf.

[2345] Why should he want that information, in your opinion?

General MILES. I do not know, sir, of course, but I would assume that they wanted it because two or more vessels tied up at a wharf would mean that at least the inner one could not come out as quickly or as soon or did not expect to leave as soon as the outer one or the one anchored in the fairway.

Senator LUCAS. Well, now, it seems to me—I do not want to press the question unduly, but it seems to me that a careful reading of this one message at the time, with a fair analysis of it, would have indicated that something pretty serious and desperate was going to happen at Pearl Harbor because, as I understand this message, it does not talk about the arrival and departure of warships. They are asking and seeking to get definite information about Pearl Harbor and the ships that are in there.

General MILES. Well, there was a great fleet in that harbor and I think it was perfectly natural that the Japanese wanted to know the condition of that fleet as to its ability to leave that harbor or its intent to leave that harbor within a reasonable time. I have forgotten how long it took the fleet to actually sortie from the harbor, but it was some considerable time.

Senator LUCAS. Do the words "strictly secret" on [2346] that telegram indicate any unusual significance?

General MILES. I do not know what import that phrase had, sir. All of these, of course, were——

Senator LUCAS. Well, on all the telegrams that were sent from Honolulu to Tokyo the words "strictly secret" or "secret" does not appear and I wondered if that had any significance at all in view of all of the telegrams going from Honolulu to Tokyo avoiding the use of the words. Apparently it does not, in your opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, 12 o'clock having arrived the committee will suspend until 2 o'clock.

[2347]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Senator Lucas, you may resume your questioning of General Miles

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES (Resumed)

Senator LUCAS. General Miles, when we adjourned at noon we were discussing the message sent by the Tokyo Government to Honolulu on September 24 of 1941.

There is another question or two I desire to interrogate you upon with respect to that message.

You advised me this morning that this message was decoded and analyzed by the Army. I want to know what other members of your force in the Intelligence branch of the Government had an opportunity to examine and scrutinize that message or any others that came to your attention.

General MILES. That message, like all other messages of magic, was seen by Colonel Bratton and his small group of officers who were handling the Japanese intercepts. Aside from those few officers in the Far Eastern section of the Military Intelligence Division, no one except myself in the division saw those messages.

Senator LUCAS. Did Colonel Bratton see this particular message, the message that we are now discussing?

General MILES. Did he see it?

[2348] Senator LUCAS. Yes.

General MILES. I feel sure that he saw it; yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Do you remember having any discussion with him about it?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not.

Senator LUCAS. Now, I direct your attention to page 13 of exhibit 2, which is the reply message from Honolulu to Tokyo and also it seems as though they sent the same thing to Washington, D. C. Again they refer to the message as "strictly secret." Do you recall ever seeing that message in view of the fact that it was translated by the Navy?

General MILES. In all probability I saw that message. Senator, it made no difference whether the Navy translated it or the Army translated it so far as my seeing the particular message is concerned. If it was of importance I saw it.

Senator LUCAS. In other words, you had a liaison between the Navy Intelligence and the Army Intelligence whereby all of these messages that were intercepted, decoded, and translated were analyzed and examined by both branches?

General MILES. It was more than that, sir. The actual translation, of course, including the decrypting and decoding was a joint activity of the Signal Corps and Naval Communications.

Senator LUCAS. Thank you, sir.

Will you give to the committee those who were assigned to [2349] that joint mission of analyzing and taking care of these messages?

General MILES. The analyses of the messages were made by the Intelligence Service of the Army and Navy.

Senator LUCAS. Whom did that include? What I am trying to find out is the different people in the Army and the Navy who actually saw these messages which started coming from Tokyo on September 24, 1941.

General MILES. Within the Military Intelligence Department, as I have already testified, Senator, were Colonel Bratton and one or two of his subordinates who immediately handled messages, and myself. That was all in the Military Intelligence Division. Who saw them in the SIS of the Signal Corps I am not prepared to state but you will have witnesses who can testify on that.

Senator LUCAS. I am not going into that. You are not prepared to state who saw these messages or who analyzed them in Navy Intelligence, I take it?

General MILES. No, sir, I am not prepared to state that, in view of the other witnesses you will have.

Senator LUCAS. On that same page of exhibit 2 there is another message from Tokyo to Honolulu, dated November 15, 1941, No. 111, which reads as follows:

As relations between Japan and the United States [2350] are most critical, make your 'ships in harbor report' irregular, but at a rate of twice a week. Although you already are no doubt aware, please take extra care to maintain secrecy.

Do you understand that that message was referring to the message sent from Tokyo to Honolulu on September 24?

General MILES. I don't see any indication that it was directly—that it directly referred to the message of September 24, Senator.

Senator LUCAS. All right.

This message comes from Tojo, who was at that time at the head of the Military Government in Japan, was he not?

General MILES. On the 15th of November?

Senator LUCAS. That is right.

General MILES. This is "Togo". Not "Tojo".

Senator LUCAS. "Togo". Who was Togo?

General MILES. I think he was Foreign Minister but I am not positive.

Senator LUCAS. All right.

Now, do you recall having any discussion with any of the members of your staff with respect to that message or the message that I just previously read from Honolulu to Washington telling about the mooring of ships in the vicinity of Ford Island, the Navy dock in the Navy Yard, and other matters [2351] contained therein.

General MILES. I remember no specific instances, Senator, but I would like to point out that the message dividing Pearl Harbor into districts for espionage reports, like other messages concerning the fleet based on Pearl Harbor, were primarily within the responsibility of the Office of Naval Intelligence to evaluate. I knew that ONI regarded them as being a part of the Japanese espionage net covering all movements of United States warships and vessels everywhere they appeared. I am not competent to testify as to what ONI should have done or should not have done about messages directly concerning the fleet.

I can point out in the same book of messages items that might well indicate Japanese intentions to attack Panama and/or the Philippines. But what does all this come down to? We had known for many years that all three of those outposts would probably be subject to an attack in a Japanese war. That is why we had our forces on them and why the Chief of Staff warned them when he considered the time had arrived that hostile Japanese action was possible at any moment.

Senator LUCAS. Will you point out to me one message that went from Tokyo to Panama that indicates that they are going to attack the Panama Canal, that is now found in exhibit 2?

General MILES. On page 34 is a message in which is exhibited Japanese interests in maps and charts of the Panama [2352] Canal Zone.

Senator LUCAS. Page 34 of exhibit 2?

General MILES. Of this exhibit which we have before us.

Senator LUCAS. My exhibit reads "From Buenos Aires to Panama; Buenos Aires to Tokyo." Is that the one?

General MILES. From Buenos Aires to Panama.

Senator LUCAS. Yes.

General MILES. It was regarding a series of maps and charts which we were very much interested in getting ahold of. It was being passed around among the Japanese agencies.

Senator LUCAS. Of course, I am talking about messages that came from Tokyo to Panama; not from Panama to Tokyo. And that is because of the importance I attach to the first message that came from Tokyo to Hawaii on September 24, 1941.

General MILES. I do not find, Senator, any specific message from Tokyo to Panama in this respect, but the messages from Panama to Tokyo were along intelligence lines which might very well have indicated the interest of Japan in formulating plans for an attack on the Panama Canal.

[2353] Senator LUCAS. Well, as the head of G-2, did it make any difference from the standpoint of the importance of a message whether it came from the consul in Hawaii to Tokyo or the consul in Panama to Tokyo, or whether the message came from the War Minister in Tokyo to Panama or from the War Minister in Tokyo to Hawaii?

General MILES. I think, sir, that it was more the substance of the message which was important rather than the sender. A message from Tokyo to one of the Japanese spy agencies, if we may call them such, if it indicated the line of intelligence they wanted followed was, of course, of great significance but also the messages going the other way indicating what line of intelligence was being sent and apparently received with approval by Tokyo was also significant.

Senator LUCAS. I agree with you that both messages were significant but what I am trying to ascertain is what the intelligence branch of the military service considered more significant, whether a message coming from the War Minister of Japan to the consul or one from foreign countries to Japan or whether it makes any difference or not?

General MILES. I cannot say that it made any difference per se who sent that message. It was the substance of the message more than the sender.

[2354] Senator LUCAS. In other words, then, your conclusion is that a message going from Honolulu to Tokyo, sent by some spy or the Jap consul, or somebody interested in the Japanese Government, took on no more significance from the standpoint of military intelligence than a message coming direct from the Foreign Minister of Japan to Hawaii or Panama or some other point?

General MILES. No, sir. Both indicated an interest of the Japanese in the particular line of intelligence which the message contained or directed.

Senator LUCAS. Well, as I looked over these records, General Miles, I found that from August 2, 1941, to November 22, 1941, there were 24 messages going from Panama to Tokyo and there was only 1 message coming from Tokyo to Panama, and that was on August 2, 1941, which is the first message translated in exhibit 2; and as I examined these messages I hoped that I might even get the answer from you as to the real significance of messages going from foreign governments to the home government, or whether there was any significance, any different significance in the messages coming from the home government to the foreign government where consuls or their agents were located, and I hope that I am not wrong in my assumption that you say that there is very little difference.

[2355] General MILES. There is very little difference per se in the sender of the message. The substance of the message in both cases told us or indicated to us what the Japanese were interested in finding out about that particular place.

Senator LUCAS. And that is your conclusion notwithstanding the fact that every indication from September on was to the effect strained relations with Japan were getting worse and worse all the time?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Well, I direct your attention to another one of these messages found on page 15 of exhibit 2, and it is dated November 20, 1941, "Strictly secret." It says:

Please investigate comprehensively the fleet—bases in the neighborhood of the Hawaiian military reservation.

Then the last one from Tokyo to Honolulu, November 29, 1941, and which does not have the secrecy attached to it. It seems to me there is a reason for it because they ask for no particular information other than this:

We have been receiving reports from you on ship movements, but in future will you also report even when there are no movements.

that being transmitted by the Navy.

Now, with respect to the Philippines you stated that [2356] there were messages that you could pick out from the Philippines that were comparable to the one which I read, discussing and analyzing the blueprint for the bombing of Pearl Harbor. I would like to have you find that for me if you could.

General MILES. You wish one, sir, from Tokyo to Manila?

Senator LUCAS. That is right, Tokyo to Manila.

General MILES. On page 71 from Tokyo to Manila, October 4, 1941, from Tokyo (Toyoda); I believe he was a member of the cabinet at the time. [Reading:]

I want you to make a reconnaissance of the new defense works along the east, west, and southern coasts of the Island of Luzon, reporting on their progress, strength, etc. Also please investigate anything else which may seem of interest.

That was the first one I find; there may be others.

Senator LUCAS. And you think that message is just as significant as the one that was sent to Hawaii or Honolulu on September the 24?

General MILES. I cannot say that it has exactly the same significance, no, Senator. What I am saying is that there are messages in here like the one I have just read, indicating strong Japanese interest in obtaining information which might help them in an attack on the Philippines as well [2357] as on the fleet. The fleet, of course, was primarily a matter of responsibility of the Office of Naval Intelligence and I hesitate very much to give an estimate or an evaluation of a purely naval message.

Senator LUCAS. Well, you want the committee to understand that it is the responsibility, then, of the Naval Intelligence Service to evaluate these messages which went directly to Hawaii and the Philippines involving what seems to us now from what we know as a possible attack upon either Pearl Harbor or the Philippines?

General MILES. Those messages which had to do primarily with the United States Fleet then based in Pearl Harbor or near Pearl Harbor, yes, sir, that was primarily the responsibility of the Office of Naval Intelligence to put a naval evaluation on those messages.

To continue further, if you like, with messages from Tokyo to Manila, there is another one on page 82 in which it is stated [reading]:

The Naval General Staff has requested that investigation be made on the following items. Please arrange as you think best for the same:

These items in regard to each port of call:

(1) Conditions at airports on land.

(2) Types of planes at each, and number of planes.

[2358] (3) Warships; also machinery belonging to land forces.

(4) State of progress being made on all equipment and establishments.

Senator LUCAS. Was that a factor in the consideration of the evaluations that you made for Military Intelligence in connection with the overseas possessions?

General MILES. I did not quite understand you, sir.

Senator LUCAS. You just now read the message from Tokyo to Manila dated November 5, 1941. When you transmitted this military intelligence to overseas possessions did you take that into consideration?

General MILES. When we were estimating on the possibility or probability of Japanese lines of advantage we did take this message and other messages into consideration. We did not transmit any magic to the overseas departments.

Senator LUCAS. No; I understand you did not transmit any magic to overseas possessions. What I am asking you is whether or not when you were notifying the overseas possessions of the possibility of an attack on the Philippines by the Japs you took into consideration this particular message?

General MILES. Yes, sir. The Chief of Staff undoubtedly took all of these magic messages into consideration as I certainly did on the 27th of November when the Chief of Staff [2359] decided that the time had arrived to warn the overseas departments.

Senator LUCAS. General, that brings me to this conclusion: It is difficult for me to understand how you took this into consideration with respect to an attack on the Philippines and did not take into consideration the message of September the 24th and the following messages into real serious consideration with respect to the attack upon Pearl Harbor, because to me the messages with respect to Pearl Harbor were more clear in what they were attempting to do than the latter. That is my opinion and my own conclusion.

General MILES. Well, Senator, exactly the same warning message was sent by the Chief of Staff on November the 27th to all three of the overseas departments and the West coast. They all had the same warning and the warning was based on the fact that we had believed for many years that they would be all subject to attack in the event of a Japanese-American war. That was why they were there and the only reason in the case of Hawaii, at least, why they were there.

Senator LUCAS. I want to direct your attention to the testimony that you gave Friday on page 2244—no; I will strike that because I went over that this morning. That was the question that Senator Barkley asked you and which you answered and I think I have included that in the previous tes- [2360] timony.

But on the following page, 2245, Senator Barkley asked this question:

And the Hawaiian Islands. Somebody in each of these regions was reporting to Tokyo, or somebody who reported to Tokyo the movement of these ships over the various periods running from 1940, some period in 1940 up to and approaching the 7th of December 1941 and the question I would like to ask is whether the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department treated all of these intercepts, so far as you know, in the same way and with the same degree of importance, or whether they singled out this information from either the Panama Canal or from Hawaii or the Philippines or Southeast Asia for any special treatment in regard to precautionary measures which might be taken in any of these different regions?

And your answer is:

Well, they were primarily messages which concerned the Navy Intelligence rather than the Military. Obviously, Senator, we were more interested in the fact that the Japanese were following our ships in our own waters, Panama, Hawaii, and the Philippines, then we were the Dutch East Indies, or any other places headed here "miscellaneous."

[2361] And, as I understand it, your answer there, like the previous answers to my questions on all of these matters, was that it was your understanding that these messages primarily concerned the Naval Intelligence rather than the Military Intelligence for a correct analysis of what might or might not happen as a result of the information you were getting.

General MILES. Senator, the Chairman's question concerned the movement of ships and my answer is yes, sir, for all these messages concerning the movement of ships and particularly those which concerned directly the United States Fleet based in Pearl Harbor it was primarily the responsibility of Naval Intelligence to analyze and evaluate such messages.

Senator LUCAS. Well, of course, there you just talk about the movement of ships; but we have been talking all the way along about all of these intercepted messages regardless of whether or not they had anything to do with the movement of ships.

Your next statement below there on that same page [reading]:

Taking the messages as a whole, I do not think they indicated any particular place in which you could say the Japanese will attack there, or the most probable, that they will attack there, solely based on those [2362] messages.

Of course, that includes all of the messages that you received, I assume, upon which you based that statement.

General MILES. The latter reply does, sir, but the first reply at the top of that page was a direct reply to the Chairman's question concerning the movement of ships. [Reading:]

Somebody in each of these regions was reporting to Tokyo, or somebody who reported to Tokyo the movement of these ships over the various periods running from 1940, some period in 1940 to and approaching the 7th of December 1941 and the question I would like to ask—

all in one sentence—is whether the Military Intelligence Division of the War Department treated all of these intercepts, so far as you know, in the same way.

That clearly referred to the intercepts on the movement of ships. I am very sorry if I misunderstood the Chairman in making my answer.

Senator LUCAS. I may have misunderstood the question and answer and the General has explained.

Let me direct your attention now to page 2220 of the record where Mr. Gesell asked you this question—he was discussing there the question of the burning of the codes. [2363] There was a message sent out by Admiral Stark which states as follows—this was sent out on December the 6th, I think it is.

Mr. GESELL. December 3.

Senator LUCAS. December 3?

General MILES. December 3.

Senator LUCAS. (Reading):

Believe local consul has destroyed all but one system although presumably not included your eighteen double five of third.

Mr. Gesell, continuing, says:

My question, General Miles, is whether you knew at the time that the Navy was transmitting messages to their representatives in Hawaii advising Hawaii of the intercepted Japanese messages indicating code destruction?

General MILES. I did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. Were you consulted in connection with that?

General MILES. I believe that I was. I knew that—

General MILES. Senator, would you tell me the page again?

Senator LUCAS. I am sorry. It is 2220.

General MILES. 2220, all right.

[2364] Senator LUCAS. Beginning down past the middle of the page.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS (reading):

General MILES. I believe that I was. I know that I knew that those messages were going out.

Mr. GESELL. Did you know that a message had been received from Hawaii stating that they had knowledge there that the local consul was destroying his code?

General MILES. I believe that I did, sir.

Mr. GESELL. The Army did not send any messages to General Short in respect of code destruction, did it?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. GESELL. What is the explanation of that?

General MILES. The main reason was that the code experts apparently agreed, at least the Navy was particularly strong on the point, that their code was much more secure than ours. It was obviously, of course, of great importance in security that a message be sent in only one code and not two and we had every reason to believe, or thought we did, that a Navy message to Hawaii would be promptly transmitted to the Army authorities there.

Do you know, General Miles, whether or not that message [2365] was transmitted from the naval authorities to the Army authorities?

General MILES. I know now, sir and have testified to it, bringing in the affidavit of the officer in the G-2 office in Hawaii who saw those messages regarding the burning of the code.

Senator LUCAS. And it was transmitted then from the Navy to the Army?

General MILES. It was transmitted; they were transmitted.

Senator LUCAS. According to that affidavit.

General MILES. According to that affidavit; yes.

Senator LUCAS. You received no report on it at the time from anyone in Hawaii?

General MILES. I did not receive any report at the time.

Senator LUCAS. Was there any arrangement or any agreement between the Navy and the Army at that time which would definitely fix that question as to when a message so important as this was transmitted by the Navy that it would be ultimately transmitted on to the Army?

General MILES. Yes, sir; there was a long-standing agreement or policy of complete interchange of information between the Army and Navy (both in Hawaii and other places [2366] where we operated together.

I have testified, Senator, that not only was that so, but I knew the strong desire of the Chief of Staff for his subordinates of all ranks to keep in close contact with the Navy wherever we were operating together and I had received a letter from the G-2 of the Hawaiian Department stating specifically that his liaison with the Navy as well as with FBI was complete.

[2367] Senator LUCAS. Of course I am only taking your statement, which was made in answer to an inquiry of Mr. Gesell, that you had every reason to believe that the message would be promptly transmitted.

It occurred to me to ask why, when war was hanging in the balance, you relied upon the assumption at that particular time that an important message of this kind was to be transmitted by the Navy rather than the Army.

General MILES. Well, sir, the question of relying on an assumption, based, as I say, on their good knowledge of what had been laid down as a policy, and the letter from the responsible G-2 saying he had complete liaison, as against the risking of this secret of using the two codes, we were not ready to risk the secret if we could possibly avoid it.

Senator LUCAS. Of course you did use two codes to Hawaii.

General MILES. Never in sending the same message.

Senator LUCAS. What I am trying to determine in my own mind through these questions, General Miles, is as to the importance that you attached to obtaining a reply from General Short in connection with the burning of the codes, and what you did to follow it up, or whether you just trusted that the Navy would use its communication system, would do it for you?

General MILES. We trusted the Navy and the Army. Liaison [2368] is a two-way proposition, Senator.

Senator LUCAS. Yes; but the one-way proposition now is with the Navy, because that is the code which you fellows believed was the most secret.

General MILES. But it was equally the responsibility of the Army G-2 in Hawaii to see that we maintain a close liaison, that we should get such important information as the Navy collected, as it was the Navy's responsibility to give it to the Army.

Furthermore, let me say Hawaii had already been warned many days previous of the impending war by the Chief of Staff, and the burning of the codes was simply a strengthening of the information which the Chief of Staff, over his own signature, had given to Hawaii, that there might be a Japanese attack at any time.

Senator LUCAS. I certainly agree with you that the burning of the code would seem to any ordinary reasonably prudent man, whether he was in Washington or whether he was in Hawaii, as being about the last act before the happening of serious difficulties between the two nations.

I am not trying to defend anyone and I am not trying to offend anyone here. I am trying to ascertain what the facts really were with respect to knowledge and the importance attached to the burning of the code, and what you did with [2369] respect to it, or what the Navy did. That is my chief point, General Miles.

I wanted to direct your attention again to this page 2221 where Mr. Gesell asked you another question:

Did you give any instructions or directions to the Navy that action should be taken to see that these messages were made available to the Army authorities at Pearl Harbor?

General MILES. Any instructions to the Navy?

Mr. GESELL. To the Navy here that they should so transmit the messages that the Army would be certain to receive them.

General MILES. No, sir, that was not considered necessary.

I think you have already probably answered that question with the answer to my previous question that you did not consider it necessary.

Now that brings me to this question that I want to ask you. It may not be quite within the realm of this investigation, but in view of the fact that here was an important message that was to be sent by the Military Intelligence of the Army in Washington to the Military Intelligence of the Army in Hawaii, you depended primarily and solely upon another branch of the service to transmit that information for you at a critical [2370] period here in the history of our country. I am wondering whether or not you would care to make any statement as to what you think about having both of those branches, the Army and Navy Intelligence, under one command and one service, so that there could not be any question about you wondering whether or not the Navy, or assuming the Navy was going to transfer an important message of this kind?

General MILES. Senator, I believe thoroughly, and have believed for many years, in the unification of the services. I think that is one point that you have just brought out as an argument for unification.

Senator LUCAS. Of course I do not know what the Navy would say about that, but I wanted to get your opinion upon it.

Now there is one other question. General Miles, do you know General Grunert, General Russell, and General Frank, who made the investigation of the Pearl Harbor disaster in behalf of the Army?

General MILES. I do, sir.

Senator LUCAS. They make this statement in their report concerning the Military Intelligence Division:

The advantages accruing from this situation could have been calamitous. The Japanese Armed Forces knew everything about us. We knew little about them. This [2371] was a problem of all-out intelligence agencies. This should not come to pass again. Our intelligence service must be brought in line with the part which we are to play in world affairs.

Do you agree with that statement?

General MILES. I do not, sir. I think the documents before this committee show clearly we knew a great deal about the Japanese Military Forces. We certainly knew a great deal about the Japanese Army, the Japanese Air Forces, and the Navy knew a great deal about the Japanese Naval Forces.

Senator LUCAS. I only have before me the report. I never examined the testimony that was taken before the committee.

Do you know what they based that conclusion upon?

General MILES. I do not, sir. They did not ask me any questions which would have, to my mind, substantiated such a statement.

Senator LUCAS. Are these gentlemen who were selected to make this investigation retired officers or are they still active?

General MILES. They were all active at the time. General Grunert is now retired. I do not know whether General Russell and General Frank have been retired or not.

Senator LUCAS. They further said:

We must know as much about other major world [2372] powers as they know about us. This is an absolute condition precedent to intelligence planning by those charged with formulating our international policies and providing for our security. Our Intelligence Service should be second to none in its efficiency. It must not be inferred that this is the exclusive function of the M. I. D. It is a national problem.

In the past our Intelligence Service has suffered from lack of funds, lack of interest, and legal obstacles and regulations. Steps should be taken to correct all of these.

[2373] Now, in view of the fact that they were talking about you primarily as head of the Military Intelligence at that time at the time of this disaster, I wonder if you would care to elaborate upon any statement that they made, or to discuss it?

General MILES. To the extent that the Japanese knew more about us than we knew about them, that is true, sir. The Army and Navy had no money for espionage service. I do not think that the Congress of the United States, I do not think that the people of the United States would have been willing to appropriate the money through years and years which would have been necessary to build up an espionage service against the Japanese comparable to what we suspected and knew, and now know they had against us.

We have simply never gone into that. I think that to that extent the observations of the Grunert board are correct.

Senator LUCAS. Well, it is true that all major powers of the world, except this country, have had for a long time past permanent world-wide intelligence services, have they not?

General MILES. And we had permanent world-wide intelligence services, but greatly limited in personnel and expenditure, and we kept above board also. We were not spying.

Senator LUCAS. Did we have any foreign secret intelligence [2374] service prior to the war?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Do you believe, from what you know as an expert in military intelligence, that we should know, or that we should have that type and kind of service throughout the world, as other nations do?

General MILES. It depends on what you want, Senator.

Senator LUCAS. I want to protect my America.

General MILES. So do I, sir.

Senator LUCAS. National defense is all I am interested in in this country. I am asking that question for information of a man who is an expert upon this question.

General MILES. My answer then is decidedly "Yes." I consider a secret service, such as we eventually evolved in this war after we got into it, is a necessity for national defense at all times.

Senator LUCAS. Do you believe that if such a system was provided for by the Congress of the United States, it should be linked with the military and naval intelligence, or should it be set out as in independent agency of its own?

General MILES. It must be linked with military and naval intelligence, sir, for the simple reason that only the military and naval intelligence can tell the agents of the people as to what type of information is really desired.

[2375] The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to announce that the bell you heard is undoubtedly a roll-call vote on the Donnell amendment to the pending bill of the United Nations Organization.

While the Members of the Senate have been excused by the Senate from attending the proceedings of the Senate while these hearings are on, if any Senator wishes to vote on that, he is at liberty to do so. The Chair thinks he ought to know what it is about before he can exercise his own judgment.

Senator LUCAS. Can the Chair tell me whether it is going to be a close vote or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot. The Chair can only hope it will not be a close vote.

Senator LUCAS. Will the reporter read what General Miles said in his last answer?

(The answer was read by the reporter.)

Senator LUCAS. You believe that would be true whether we were in peace or in war?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. One other question.

Something has been said, General Miles, about the men on watch in Hawaii on the evening of the 5th, 6th, and 7th. [2376] I think it would be well to state just how your men operated at that particular time with respect to hours; that is, in Washington, D. C.

General MILES. On the night of the 6th?

Senator LUCAS. I was thinking of the 5th, 6th, and 7th, just previous to this attack, or anytime within a few days previous to Pearl Harbor.

The Vice CHAIRMAN. The 7th is when it happened.

Senator LUCAS. Yes, the 7th.

General MILES. The officers of the Far Eastern Section concerned with magic were on duty in the War Department all the afternoon and evening of the 6th. There was also on duty an officer of the division itself. I was there, of course, during the 6th. I do not know exactly when I left on the afternoon of the 6th. I do know I returned early on the morning of the 7th.

Do you wish me to go into a little more detail?

Senator LUCAS. I was trying to ascertain the number of men that you had on duty at that particular time, and what the hours were. Did they have a 24-hour watch at that particular time?

General MILES. I cannot answer that question without referring to the records, Senator, with any accuracy.

Senator LUCAS. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

[2377] The Vice CHAIRMAN. Mr. Murphy of Pennsylvania will inquire.

Mr. MURPHY. General, I notice on page 2216 of the record, that you make the statement, at the bottom of the page, speaking about whether or not any messages had been sent subsequent to November 28, you stated that General Marshall had sent a warning, and then you say, "Anything else was considered to be redundant."

Do you want to stand on that statement?

General MILES. What page?

Mr. MURPHY. 2216.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Do you consider messages about the codes being burned by the Navy to be redundant?

General MILES. Redundant to the warning, yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. By "redundant" you mean unnecessary, don't you? Isn't that what redundant would mean?

General MILES. Desirable, but unnecessary, I would say, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, it is redundant then, to tell them that the codes are being burned throughout the world?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. You feel then, it was a waste of time to do it, do you?

[2378] General MILES. No, sir, I agree entirely with this message.

Mr. MURPHY. If it were up to you in your department, those messages would not have been sent to Hawaii, is that right?

General MILES. No, sir, that is not right.

Mr. MURPHY. If you felt it was redundant, would you do it?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Why did not you do it?

General MILES. Because it was desirable to send those particular messages through naval channels. The command had been warned by the Chief of Staff and we had every reason to believe they were on their toes. We, however, did send, were glad to send, through naval channels a message still further strengthening the information which the Chief of Staff had already given the Hawaiian Command.

Mr. MURPHY. You feel that the message of December 2, the two messages of December 3, the message of December 4, three messages, the message of December 6, two messages, were all redundant, do you?

General MILES. Which messages are those, Mr. Congressman?

Mr. MURPHY. You said everything after the 28th was redundant up to the 7th. I am now speaking of exhibit 37, [2379] page 39, December 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. Your answer is, as I understand it, they are all redundant.

Mr. GESELL. General, we have just handed you a set of those.

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I think it only fair to look at my answer on page 2216 and the use of the word "redundant."

Mr. MURPHY. Let me read it for you, if you will, please. I am quoting now from the record, at the bottom of the page:

But these things were known in Hawaii. That fortress, like a sentinel on post, had been warned of the danger which was its sole reason for being. Anything else was considered to be redundant.

Now, the interpretation I gather from that is you feel that these messages from the 28th to the 7th were redundant.

General MILES. Redundant in the sense of warning that command, yes, sir. That is what I am speaking about, the warning of the danger.

Mr. MURPHY. You realize that the Navy sent them. I take it if they were here now in your office they would not have been sent.

General MILES. No, sir; that is not true.

Mr. MURPHY. Then why did not you send them?

General MILES. You do not have to tell a commanding [2380] general but once that a danger faces him. You may, however, see fit to give him further information as to the situation he faces.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, at any rate, your office did not send any of them, did it?

General MILES. My office did not send any of them for reasons I have given.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, then, you also say it was inherent in the situation that there would be the possibility, probability and likelihood of an attack on Hawaii. Was it inherent in the situation that war would be commenced that way?

General MILES. Not necessarily.

Mr. MURPHY. I understood you to say that the reason why you did not put in your message of December 5, and other messages, something about a possible surprise attack on Hawaii, was the fact you did not want to, in effect, explain the obvious.

General MILES. Did not want to what, sir?

Mr. MURPHY. Explain the obvious.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Was not that the purport of your testimony as to why you did not include that in the note of December 5?

General MILES. The note of December 5?

[2381] Mr. MURPHY. Yes, or the report of December 5. I will give it to you.

Mr. GESELL. Exhibit 33.

General MILES. Memorandum of December 5 to the Chief of Staff? Is that the one you refer to, Mr. Congressman?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes, sir. Do you have that?

General MILES. I have the memorandum.

Mr. MURPHY. On the 5th you spoke of all the likelihoods, you spoke about the possibility of an attack on Russia to the north, you spoke about an attack possibly on Indochina; you spoke about the possibilities to the south, and you spoke about the possibilities to the Philippines, but you did not say anything about Pearl Harbor.

I understand you, on many occasions throughout the record, say it was inherent in the situation about an unexpected attack there, and I am wondering why it would not also be inherent in the situation to expect an attack on the Philippines at the very time you gave the report, that you would include the Philippines in one or two paragraphs, but you never mentioned Hawaii?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, in the document to which we refer, we were trying to evaluate the lines of action which the Japanese might take at that particular time, or in the period which we were trying to cover. Now, one of [2382] those lines of action which we thought very probable was a southern expansion, which might involve the Philippines and that was why the Philippines was mentioned, but since it was inherent in the situation if we went to war with Japan that Hawaii and Panama particularly might very well be attacked, because of the great advantage which Japan might accrue from a successful attack on those places, it was not necessary to repeat in that particular paper this obvious fact, known to military men.

The sole reason for the garrison on Hawaii was the defense of a naval base in a Japanese war.

Mr. MURPHY. What was the reason for the garrison at Manila, if it was not for the same purpose?

General MILES. Primarily for the same purpose.

Mr. MURPHY. Then why make a distinction in one and not in the other?

General MILES. We did not make a distinction as to the probability of Japanese attack, sir. We simply said one of the lines of advance might involve the Philippines.

Mr. MURPHY. The thing that disturbs me, General, is that throughout your testimony I certainly get the inference that you were probably the only person in Washington who expected the attack at Pearl Harbor, simply from your testimony, because each time you go back to say how obvious it was, and [2383] how inherent it was in the situation, and yet I have read these reports of yours through from cover to cover and I have not seen it mentioned once. Apparently people at Hawaii did not think it was so obvious because they were taken by surprise, and apparently the others in Washington did not think it was so obvious because they were taken by surprise.

I am wondering if it is a fair inference to take from your testimony that you thought there was at least a great likelihood that there was going to be an attack on Pearl Harbor, and that, by the way, commenced the war? I think that is a fair inference from what you have been saying throughout this hearing.

General MILES. I am very glad to answer that question if that is your inference, Mr. Congressman. It comes down to what I have already testified on these two principles which follow in making an estimate. I did not ignore any action of the Japanese which was within their capability. I knew they were capable of making an attack on Hawaii just as I knew they were capable of making an attack on the Philippines or Panama.

I did not believe, up to a very late date, that it was probable that they would make that attack at the outbreak of war, for the reason that I have already stated, that such [2384] an attack as was actually made had to result from two separate decisions of the Japanese; one to take on a war with a great naval power, and presumably with the two great naval powers, a very risky proposition in the long run as has transpired; and second, to start that war, or at least make this attack on a great fortress and fleet, which inherently jeopardized the Japanese ships making the attack to some extent, and which rested almost solely for success on the unpredictable circumstance that they would find that fortress and that fleet unprepared to meet that attack.

The Grunert board make a statement that before Pearl Harbor everybody in Washington expected the attack on Pearl Harbor, and afterward everybody was surprised except the Secretary of War.

Mr. MURPHY. I think, judging from your testimony, that there was at least a likelihood of an attack. That is what troubles me.

General MILES. That is the difference between what you know is possible for the enemy to do, and what you are rather surprised at what he is doing, because you have given him credit for the best good common sense. I think "surprise" even in that sense is too strong a word. You did not think it probable that he would make that particular attack.

Mr. MURPHY. General, I notice on your report of [2385] December 5, section 28 of exhibit No. 33, on the second page of that report, the following—and this is as of December 5, 1941—

The anti-Axis powers will have a period of at least four months in which they may strengthen their position in one or more of the four important theatres of war, and in which they may decide upon a regrouping of forces, subject to certain physical limitations, consonant with their chosen long-range strategy for the defeat of the Nazis.

Do you think that was an accurate statement on December 5, 1941?

General MILES. That is at page 2?

Mr. MURPHY. That is on the second page, under tab 28.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. The last paragraph on the bottom of the page.

I assume you include in there the United States, and you make the statement that the anti-Nazi nations would have 4 months in which to strengthen their position, and that was 2 days before Pearl Harbor.

General MILES. I was not referring to the United States, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. You were leaving the United States out [2386] when you spoke of the anti-Axis powers?

General MILES. Yes, sir. The anti-Axis powers were those powers then in war against the Axis powers.

Mr. MURPHY. You did include Japan then under the theory that she was one of them under the Tripartite Alliance?

General MILES. She was an Axis power.

Mr. MURPHY. And we were not an anti-Axis power at that time?

General MILES. We were not anti-Axis; we were neutral at that time.

Mr. MURPHY. In view of what we were doing in the Atlantic to aid in the defeat of Germany, we were not at war, but would you not call us an anti-Axis power at that time?

General MILES. My use of the term "anti-Axis" in this paper referred to those nations actually at war with the Axis powers.

Mr. MURPHY. All right.

Now, then, I ask you to turn over to the page at which you mention the Far Eastern theater under your subheading 6. Have you got the page?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. You state there, on December 5:

The most probable line of action for Japan is the [2387] occupation of Thailand.

Now, were you speaking only in the event she went south, or were you speaking of the next move when you said that?

General MILES. I did not quite understand that.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the reporter read that?

(The question was read by the reporter.)

Mr. MURPHY. Let me make it clearer. Under the subheading 6, you said:

Here the initiative rests with Japan in spite of her military over-extension. She has the following lines of action open to her:

And then you list a, b, c, d, e, f, g, h, and i, and then you say:

The most probable line of action for Japan is the occupation of Thailand.

Was that the action you expected Japan to take on December 5, 1941?

General MILES. That was the line of action we expected her to take as the most probable.

Mr. MURPHY. You certainly were not looking forward to an attack on Hawaii as the most probable thing they were going to do at that date, were you?

[2388] General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, then, you state that the fleet was primarily a problem for naval intelligence while it was in the port at Pearl Harbor, and there has been time and time again through the reports I have read something to the effect that while the fleet was in port, its protection was the responsibility normally of the Army.

Would that change your answer? At sea the fleet takes care of itself, but while in port the fleet is supposed to be protected by the Army; is that true?

General MILES. Yes; that is true. My reply, however, is that the evaluation of those messages that primarily concerned the fleet was the primary responsibility of the ONI.

Mr. MURPHY. It normally would be, General, but if there were going to be a bombing of Pearl Harbor, it was the prime responsibility of the Army to protect the fleet while it was in the harbor. That would be shifting quite a good bit of the responsibility on your shoulders, would it not, in the evaluation of the report?

General MILES. Oh, yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. I notice at page 2189, General, at the bottom of the page:

Military intelligence was specifically concerned, and this is General Miles speaking— [2389] particularly concerned, and practically solely concerned so far as the General Staff went, with antisubversive precautions and operations.

Is not that a very strong statement, in view of the fact that you were also obliged to give reports from time to time as to the situation of the armies throughout the world as viewed in the eyes of the Army, and what the enemy was doing?

General MILES. I see now, Mr. Congressman, that is an ambiguous answer. What I meant to say was that so far as the General Staff was concerned, we were the division primarily, particularly and almost solely charged with looking into antisubversive activities.

Mr. MURPHY. That was one of your functions, but certainly not the sole purpose.

General MILES. No, sir; not in the least one of my main functions.

Mr. MURPHY. You were one of the General Staff who was to look after antisubversive activities?

General MILES. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. You would not let your answer stand that "military intelligence was specifically concerned, particularly concerned, and practically solely concerned so far as the General Staff went with antisubversive precautions and [2390] operations"?

You mean by that that you on the General Staff, that that was one branch to take care of that, but not to the exclusion of your other duties?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. I notice on page 2197, as well as in many other places throughout the record, that you did not see General Short's reply until the early part of January 1942, and I am wondering why or how it could happen that there was a message sent out on the 27th of November which would seem to indicate that war was coming, and your responsibility in G-2 was to find it out, and I cannot understand how it could be that your department would not know of the reply from the war theater, from November 27 to January 1942, when the very purpose that you were created for was to be advised and to be advising on what had taken place throughout the world, as well as in our own army.

General MILES. No, sir. Military Intelligence had no responsibility as to the measures taken.

Mr. MURPHY. I did not mean that. But you were to advise. You were advising all of these people on this list about what was happening in Russia, what was happening in Germany, in the Middle East, and why you would not also want to advise what was happening in our own theaters?

[2391] General MILES. Mr. Congressman, please note that General Marshall's message of November 27 directed General Short, General MacArthur, and the other generals to report measures taken, I believe, is the phrase used. The answer then was presumably just that report of measures taken by one of the major divisions of the United States Army, and on that subject Military Intelligence had no responsibility.

Mr. MURPHY. It take it that it was part of Military Intelligence Division's responsibility to follow the movements of the Germans and Russians, and to follow the movements of the British Army and to follow the movements of the Dutch armies, but not to follow the movements of the United States armies.

General MILES. It was no responsibility of Military Intelligence to follow the movements of the United States armies. Generally, I knew, as did all officers of the Army, particularly those stationed in Washington, of the main movements, the maneuvers of the United States armies as a matter of interest, but it was no responsibility of Military Intelligence Division to follow those movements or any measures taken as the result of the warning message of General Marshall.

Mr. MURPHY. I am talking about generally throughout the war. Did not Military Intelligence throughout the war follow [2392] the progress of the American armies and did not they have to write reports on what progress we were making, how the enemy was disposed, and how the American Army was disposed; would not that be the function of Military Intelligence?

General MILES. No, sir: that is the function of operations.

Mr. MURPHY. The Military Intelligence did not stop working when the war started, did it?

General MILES. They did not what?

Mr. MURPHY. They did not stop working when the war started?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. They followed only the enemy movements rather than following our own forces; is that right?

General MILES. I did not get that.

Mr. MURPHY. They went only to the enemy instead of following our own forces in their movements?

General MILES. Yes, sir. Military Intelligence is charged with informing Operations and the Command as to what they think the enemy is doing or what they think the enemy is about to do, and not to follow our own forces.

Mr. MURPHY. At any rate, you did not see the Short telegram, or know of its existence until January of 1942, [2393] or some 6 or 7 weeks after November 27, 1941?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. I notice in all of these reports you have made, exhibit 33, that you have signed your name as the acting head of G-2. Were you not the actual head, or were you just acting temporarily?

General MILES. I was the actual head, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Why did you sign it "Acting"? Did Marshall sign his name as the acting Chief of Staff?

General MILES. No, sir. That "acting" was due to the fact that my previous service with troops in the 6 years preceding my detail as G-2 had not been sufficient to enable the Chief of Staff to make me a member of the General Staff, so he made me the acting Chief of Staff, G-2. For all practical purposes, I was Chief of Staff, G-2.

[2394] Mr. MURPHY. Now, were you the only member of the staff, of the General Staff, who signed his name "Acting"?

General MILES. I believe I was, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. I notice it is brigadier general on December 5, and I notice now you have the rank of major general. That was subsequent to December 5, was it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir; that was, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. I also notice, General, throughout the record, that you first state that so far as the consular officials, the Intelligence, they were directly responsible to you; that would be our military attaché at Tokyo, he would be directly responsible to you, would he not?

General MILES. In the military hierarchy, yes. Of course, he was also a member of the ambassador's staff.

Mr. MURPHY. Right. G-2 at Hawaii you would reach ordinarily through General Short?

General MILES. The G-2 of any overseas department was an officer directly responsible to the commanding general of that overseas department selected by him.

Mr. MURPHY. Then this question of intercepts, as to whether or not you would send the intercept, you stated quite clearly that you did not convey the intercept as such because of security reasons. You then stated, however, that you did not—at least several times in the record—that you did not [2395] convey any of the substance of the intercepts, and, apparently, because of the reason that the chief of staff, General Marshall, was responsible for that happening. There was one place in the record, however, where you do say that from time to time you did send some of the substance of intercepts. At other places you say you didn't send it because of security reasons.

My question is would there be anything to prevent you from sending the substance of the intercepts without ascribing the origin to the intercept itself and thereby give the theater commander the benefit of information you were getting?

General MILES. Only the same security reason which prevented our sending the text of the message. In other words, if the Japanese found by breaking our code—we didn't know whether they were doing it or not—that we were sending information to Hawaii or anywhere else you like which we could have gotten only from magic it would have divulged the secret just as much as if we had sent the text of the message.

Mr. MURPHY. Didn't the Navy do exactly that between December 2, 1941, and December 6, 1941?

General MILES. In certain cases they did.

Mr. MURPHY. But the Army never did; is that what you mean?

General MILES. I am not prepared to state offhand without examining the record if the Army ever did.

[2396] Mr. MURPHY. Wouldn't it have been difficult in writing your appraisal of the situation from time to time to rule out of your mind the fact that you had these different impressions gained from a reading of the intercepts and weren't you giving the Command the benefit of the knowledge that you had from the intercepts in your reports?

General MILES. I don't quite get the question.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, you wrote reports from time to time to the general staff. The general staff would send out messages to the theater commander. Do you follow me so far?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, then; in order for you to write your report to the general staff you based that upon certain information, some of which information you obtained from the intercepted messages; isn't that right?

General MILES. That is right; yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. So that in effect in giving your reports based upon all the knowledge you had at the time to the general staff and then having that go out to the field you were in effect passing on the substance of what you had learned in the intercepted messages; weren't you?

General MILES. To that extent; yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Throughout the record you have created the impression, to me, at least, that the responsibility for the [2397] substance of this information not going to the field was General Marshall's responsibility apart from any wishes you might have had in the matter.

Did you mean to create that inference?

General MILES. I think I said, sir, that the responsibility for any message, whether it came from magic or otherwise, which caused the implementation of war plans, or any other major tactical decision by a major unit of the United States Army, should emanate from General Marshall or his principal assistant for war planning operations.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, supposing it weren't up to the point of implementing the war plans, but was a very vital piece of information which the Commanding Officer ought to have. Was there anything said to you by General Marshall that prevented you from seeing that it went out to G-2?

General MILES. The magic had to be safeguarded.

Mr. MURPHY. You could give the substance of it. The Navy did.

General MILES. We could have, if we thought it necessary, give the substance of that message, but we were closing on that secret as much as possible.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, then, at page 2188 of the record—I just want to lay the ground for what is to come. As I understand it, there is an absolute difference between you and [2398] General Gerow as to what part you took, if any, in the preparation of the message of November 27?

General MILES. Page 2188?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it General Gerow's feeling that you did have something to do with that message?

General MILES. It is, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. As I understand it, you say you never saw that message except some weeks afterward?

General MILES. I stated in my memorandum of January 30 that I was not sure that I had seen the actual text, but I knew the substance.

Mr. MURPHY. I am wondering why you and several generals would sit around a table and discuss the adequacy or inadequacy of a message, as to whether or not it should be supplemented, without having a look at the message itself. You sat down with General Bryden and others and talked to them about warning the Air Corps group at Hawaii and elsewhere. Then you yourself sent a subsequent message and/or an additional message against subversive activities. That would have you participating in the sending of two additional messages. Do I understand that you sent the two additional messages without having looked at the original message itself?

[2399] General MILES. Yes, sir. The two additional messages sent on November 28 had nothing directly to do with General Marshall's warning message of November 27. My message of November 27 to the G-2 did, however, and I knew, I must have known at that time, at the time I sent it, that antisubversive warnings had not been contained in General Marshall's message.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, wouldn't it have been a good idea to look at the message to see what it did say when sending out supplemental messages? What was wrong with looking at that message of the 27th? Why didn't you?

General MILES. I don't remember that I saw the text of that message but I did know its contents. Why I didn't actually go over to War Plans Division and insist on seeing the textual message I don't know sir.

Mr. MURPHY. G-2 wasn't interested in the contents sufficiently to have a copy in its files?

General MILES. No, sir; we would not have kept a copy of so secret a message in our files. It belonged in War Plans Division files.

Mr. MURPHY. G-2 wouldn't have anything in their files to show the substance of that message in order to follow the progress of future events?

General MILES. Not in G-2 files; no, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it General Gerow's opinion that you did [2400] have some participation in the formulation of the message of the 27th of November?

General MILES. I believe it is, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, at page 2079 of the record you spoke about your accomplishments in setting up a Joint Intelligence Committee. You said that that committee had its first meeting on October 11, 1941. You also stated that you felt that a crisis was developing about the middle of November.

Why didn't you call a meeting, why didn't somebody call a meeting of that Joint Intelligence Committee instead of waiting until after the war started?

General MILES. That, Mr. Congressman, is one of the best examples that I know of of the need of unification of the services. It actually took from July 14 to December 8, in those critical days, to integrate and establish a committee for intelligence within the Joint Army-Navy Board, which was the high policy-making agency of the armed forces.

Mr. MURPHY. But you have already said, at page 2079, that you already had a meeting on October 11. Why didn't you call a meeting between then and December 7 or 8? What efforts did you make to have a meeting? Whom did you consult about it?

Here is a working organization formed on October 11, 1941, and a crisis is developing and there are no meetings until the day after the war started. Why not?

[2401] General MILES. I regret to say, Mr. Congressman, there were still discussions and difficulties going on between the War and Navy Departments as to just what the functions of that committee would be, where it would sit, what rooms it would have, what secretary it would be allowed, et cetera.

Mr. MURPHY. Did you personally, as acting head of G-2 of the Army, make any effort to have a meeting of the Joint Intelligence Committee after the middle of November and prior to December 7, 1941?

General MILES. I pressed several times for the establishment and operation of that committee.

Mr. MURPHY. Will you state exactly what you did between November 15 and December 7, 1941; to whom did you talk and to whom did you protest and with whom did you press?

General MILES. I went several times, I am sure, to General Gerow, who was the War Department representative on the Joint Planning Committee, the Joint Board, urging action in that matter.

Mr. MURPHY. Will you give the date, as best you can?

General MILES. I cannot give the dates from memory of any discussion of this matter. I only know that during that period I was constantly pressing for an establishment, which I myself had initiated, in which I was very much interested.

Mr. MURPHY. Turning to page 2079 of the record I want [2402] to quote you exactly:

The Joint Intelligence Committee members had their first meeting on the 11th of October, 1941, but did not actually function until the 8th or 9th of December.

I ask you this question: Was General Gerow a member of the Joint Intelligence Committee?

General MILES. He was not.

Mr. MURPHY. Why would you go to him to have your own committee meet? Who was the head of it? Who was the head of the Joint Intelligence Committee?

General MILES. The Joint Intelligence Committee was to consist of the head of Military Intelligence, myself, and the head of Naval Intelligence.

Mr. MURPHY. Why would you ask General Gerow to hold a meeting?

General MILES. Because, sir, the whole proposition of the Joint Intelligence Committee had to be processed first through the Joint Planning Committee of the Joint Board and then receive the approval of the Joint Board. There was great difficulty with the Joint Planning Committee as to how we would work with them, where we would work. General Gerow was the representative on that committee with whom I was dealing.

Mr. MURPHY. Were there any minutes taken at the meeting of October 11, 1941?

[2403] General MILES. Any what, sir?

Mr. MURPHY. Any minutes, notes?

General MILES. That I do not know, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Is there anything in writing that will tell what the functions of that committee were and why it was set up?

The record shows, while you are looking it up, that the establishment of the committee was approved by the Secretary of the Navy on the 1st of October and by the Secretary of War on the 29th of September, and that appropriate orders were issued.

That is your testimony at page 2079.

General MILES. In looking up this matter, Mr. Congressman, I consulted Colonel Montague, who was then one of my officers, and a former secretary to the Joint Army-Navy Intelligence Committee. I think he was the first secretary. He has given me a memorandum dated the 2d of November this year on this matter.

Mr. MURPHY. Is there any official document we might call for that would show us the function of that committee and its purpose and what had been done to formulate it up to December 7, 1941, and why it didn't meet?

General MILES. The memorandum from Colonel Montague states this:

* * * there are in the file rough drafts of J. B. 329 (Serial 710) by General Gerow and Admiral Turner re- [2404] spectively. These papers indicate a controversy between them as to the scope of the functions of the proposed J. A. N. I. C.

Joint Army-Navy Intelligence Committee.

General Gerow wished the committee to collate, analyze and interpret information with its implications, to estimate hostile capabilities and probably intentions. Admiral Turner wished to limit it to presentation of such factual evidence as might be available, but to make no estimate or other form of prediction. In J. B. 329 (Serial 710) Admiral Turner won.

It also makes a statement here which sounds rather ridiculous in these days, but that was what was going on:

The Joint Army-Navy Intelligence Committee was not fully activated until 1941 because until then the head of the foreign branch office of Naval Intelligence was unable to obtain agreement within the Navy Department as to the office space to be provided. Except for this difficulty the committee might have been activated by the first of December.

Mr. MURPHY. There were only two members. Wouldn't you be able to have a meeting at your office, with war coming on and a crisis developing?

General MILES. No, sir; we did not meet until we could [2405] finally get actually to work on it. The personnel of that committee, the actual working personnel of that committee were not, I think, the heads of G-2 and ONI, but subordinate officers detailed by them. We were then to review their work.

Mr. MURPHY. I am going to ask counsel, Mr. Chairman, to go into this matter more thoroughly. I think we ought to have brought before us somebody who can tell us the detail of why this committee didn't function and a survey of the whole picture.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Counsel will take note of that request.

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Congressman, I think, on the request of why the committee didn't function, on the Army side General Miles is the best witness.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, General, as I take it, your answer on the record is that the reason you and the Admiral did not meet during the crisis from November 15 to December 7 was as contained in your answer which you read from the paper, a statement of Colonel Montague to the effect that the Navy man was having difficulty in getting an office in which you were to meet, you two men?

General MILES. No, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. That is what you read; that is the way the statement read. What was the reason you didn't meet?

General MILES. Admiral Turner, Admiral Wilkinson, and [2406] I met frequently during that period. The actual Joint Intelligence Committee, as such, as part of the Joint Board, was having a great deal of difficulty in getting established, a difficulty which I think would be largely eradicated if we had had a unified department of national defense.

Mr. MURPHY. I will come to that, but you do say, however, at page 2079 of the record:

The Joint Intelligence Committee members had their first meeting on the 11th of October 1941 but did not actually function until the 8th or 9th of December.

At any rate, that is a fact.

General MILES. That is factual so far as the meeting is concerned; yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. You talk about a unification of the services, and I am not going to get into that, but will ask this: If you felt the messages from the 27th of November to the 6th of December were redundant and the Army was the head of this board what would have happened to those messages?

General MILES. They would have been sent.

Mr. MURPHY. By whom? Who was going to settle your differences?

General MILES. I thought they should be sent and have repeatedly so testified.

Mr. MURPHY. You may interpret "redundant" a little. [2407] differently than I do.

General MILES. They were redundant to the warnings of which I was speaking when I used the word "redundant."

Mr. MURPHY. Now, let me ask this question, General:

I see in exhibit 37 a number of messages sent to all of the commands between the 27th of November and the 6th of December about destroying codes and machines, but I don't see any message from either the Army or the Navy to Hawaii as to what to do. Do you know of any such messages?

General MILES. No, sir; we didn't want them to destroy their codes.

Mr. MURPHY. At Hawaii?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. You thought that was a very likely place to be attacked?

General MILES. Surely.

Mr. MURPHY. You have them destroying the codes every place else in the world except one of the places where an attack was quite probable.

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, the Army and Navy and State Department ordered the destruction of codes only in places in which those codes could be immediately seized by a foreign power.

Mr. MURPHY. If they had ships that day they might have [2408] been; I mean on the 7th of December.

General MILES. What did you say?

Mr. MURPHY. They might have been, isn't that so? God forbid, but they might have been.

General MILES. I think the authority in Hawaii would at least had time to destroy their codes. Even if they landed on Hawaii we did expect considerable resistance to be given to the Japanese.

Mr. MURPHY. At any rate, I see a message from the Navy, none from the Army, but a message from the Navy, to Alusna Tokyo Alusna Bankok, Astalusna Peiping, Astalusna Shanghai, I see another for the co mardet Peiping, co mardet Tientsin, I see another for Navsta Guam. But I see nothing about Hawaii.

At any rate, neither the Army nor Navy told them at Hawaii to destroy their machines or codes?

General MILES. No, sir, we did not want those machines destroyed for any reason we could then foresee. We expected Hawaii, at least, to put up a very good fight and allow time to destroy codes and anything else.

[2409] Mr. MURPHY. And that notwithstanding the fact that a message came from Hawaii on December the 6th that the Japanese at Hawaii were destroying their codes.

General MILES. Yes, sir; but our police at any time after war was declared could have jumped that consulate and taken those codes but they could not jump our headquarters.

Mr. MURPHY. General Miles, as I understand it—and I wish you would correct me if I am wrong—in your predictions of what might happen you expected a possible attack on the Maritime Provinces to the north, which would be Russia, or an attack to the south, which would be the Malay Peninsula or Thailand or the Dutch East Indies and that the Japs would probably—not probably, but might—attack the Philippines so as to prevent the Philippines being on their flank, isn't that right?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes. And then the other step, that if they were going to attack the Philippines because they did not want a flank movement they might take the other step and go on and get the fleet and stop that from being another flank, to protect them in their march to the south, isn't that right?

General MILES. That is correct, sir. The minute they became involved with the United States they might take Hawaii, Panama, or anything else.

[2410] Mr. MURPHY. But, as I understand it, no one of responsibility in Washington or elsewhere anticipated that the Japs would take the move to attack the fleet before they attacked the Philippines, to remove any subsequent attack on their flank; isn't that right, so far as you know?

General MILES. If by the word "anticipate" you mean that they thought it the most probable thing or even a probable thing, I think you are right, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. That is exactly what I meant, as the possible thing and the most likely at the beginning of the war.

General MILES. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. All right. I was wondering, General: Over at page 2177 there was a joint dispatch on economic sanctions and there was not a joint dispatch about the possible likelihood of war beginning.

General MILES. 21—

Mr. MURPHY. On page 2177 there is a joint dispatch stating that economic sanctions would be placed in effect but there is a separate message about the likelihood of war.

Mr. GESELL. That joint dispatch is also in the exhibit, is it not, Congressman, exhibit 32?

Mr. MURPHY. I think I have it here.

Mr. GESELL. At page—

Mr. MURPHY. Dated July 25, 1941.

Mr. GESELL. That is right.

General MILES. What was the question, Mr. Congressman?

Mr. MURPHY. My question is why did they have a joint, or why did you, the Army and the Navy, have a joint dispatch dealing with or telling about the likelihood of economic sanctions and a separate dispatch on November 27, 1941 about the likelihood of war?

General MILES. I am not able to answer that question, Mr. Congressman. I do not remember that I had any part in the drafting of the dispatch of July 25, which you refer to as the joint dispatch on economics, and I have already testified that I do not remember of having had any part in the dispatch on November 27.

Mr. MURPHY. Did you have any part in the dispatch of November 24th on page 2184 of the record?

Chances of favorable outcome of negotiations with Japan very doubtful.

Mr. MITCHELL. Page 5 of Exhibit 32.

General MILES. No, sir, I do not remember of having had any part in the drafting of that dispatch.

Mr. MURPHY. I have no other questions, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Brewster would be the next in [2412] order but he advises the Chair that he is unavoidably absent this afternoon and Congressman Gearhart will now proceed to inquire of General Miles.

Mr. GEARHART. General Miles, Hideko Tojo was the Premier of Japan and I am told that there was a Foreign Minister of Japan by the name of Togo. Now, that name Togo in Japan is just about the counterpart of the names of Jones, Smith, and Johnson in the United States. In view of that I wonder whether or not the name Togo which is signed to these telegrams which were sent to Honolulu inquiring about the disposition of ships was, in fact, the Foreign Minister or somebody else in the government who was assigned to carry on that particular inquiry. Do you know?

General MILES. I do not know, sir. I do not think it was the Foreign Minister, but I did not raise that point when I was being asked.

Mr. GEARHART. I don't think so either for the reason that he does not sign the similar notes of inquiry to Panama and to Manila.

I have been very interested in your testimony in respect to assuming that the attack might come at Hawaii, especially interested in view of the fact that that assumption is not reflected in any of the papers that I have seen that have been offered in evidence in this case. In fact, from the papers [2413] the contrary would seem to the case.

As a matter of fact, wasn't there a widespread opinion in Navy and military circles that the mighty fortress of Pearl Harbor was beyond even thought of attack, as was the mighty British bastion down at Singapore?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not think there was any widespread—I never heard of any opinion that Hawaii or any other of our overseas departments were invulnerable to attack.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, then, how do you account for the fact that the exhibits that have been introduced here practically ignore the possibility, as far as writing is concerned, of an attack upon either Singapore or upon Hawaii?

General MILES. Well, they did not ignore it, sir. The messages, the warning message of November 27 very definitely did warn Hawaii. Now, if you are referring to my estimates of the situation or other papers prepared for the General Staff it is, I have repeatedly said, true that I did not burden that very busy gentleman with what I knew that he knew.

Mr. GEARHART. Will you point out one message which warned Hawaii which was not one of a series of messages sent to all of our overseas commanders?

General MILES. I know of no message sent particularly to Hawaii and not to any other overseas command warning them.

[2414] Mr. GEARHART. Well, then, that does not answer my question, does it, that Hawaii was considered by everybody all of the time as being a place that was within danger during the last week of November and the first week of December of 1941?

General MILES. Yes; definitely I think, sir, that the message which went to Hawaii as well as the other overseas departments—

Mr. GEARHART. Now, you said there was no message which was sent to Hawaii which was not also sent to the other outlying departments.

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, there is one that was sent to Hawaii which was sent to Hawaii which was not also sent to the other outlying departments.

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, there is one that was sent to Hawaii which was not sent to the others, is that not true?

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman, I think the witness said he knew of no messages sent to Hawaii that were not sent to others. He said that he knew of no such messages.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, I do not want to put any words in the mouth of the witness.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Yes; I understand.

Mr. GEARHART. So I will ask you to answer the question yourself, General.

The CHAIRMAN. The question that the Congressman asked you was whether any other message was sent to Hawaii which was not sent to other stations and your answer was that you [2415] knew of no such messages.

General MILES. I knew of no warning message which was sent to other overseas departments.

Mr. GEARHART. Then to refresh your memory I will call your attention to the message that General Marshall sent on the 7th day of December 1941. Was that sent to all of the other outlying bastions?

General MILES. Yes, sir; it was.

Mr. GEARHART. The same message was sent to Manila that was sent to Hawaii?

General MILES. It was.

Mr. GEARHART. The copy which appears among the other papers of this particular exhibit, the small one in the pink binding, does not indicate it; but do you know, as a matter of fact, that that message was sent to the Philippines and to Panama, other places?

General MILES. I do, sir, of my own knowledge know that that was the Chief of Staff's direction.

Mr. GEARHART. That appears very clearly from the other messages but it does not appear clearly from the copy of this particular message.

Why were not copies that were sent to the others included in this book, or if different ones were sent why were not they set forth, or if the same one was sent why doesn't [2416] it appear in this book? Are you sure of it? That is what I want to know.

General MILES. I am absolutely sure that the message of December 7 was by direction of the Chief of Staff sent to Hawaii, Panama, the Philippines and the West coast.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes. What did you think should have happened in the Hawaiian Islands when they received their message of November 27?

General MILES. I thought that they would go on full alert prepared for any eventuality that might happen to them in a Japanese war.

Mr. GEARHART. Did you see the report that General Short made in reply to that order or that direction that he received on November 27?

General MILES. Not until the following month.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, his reply was:

Report Department alerted to prevent sabotage.

Liaison with Navy re your radio 472 27th. Short.

Do you know whether or not that message was received by General Marshall?

General MILES. I know now that it was received by General Marshall.

Mr. GEARHART. You know now that it was not received by him?

[2417] General MILES. I know now that it was received by General Marshall.

Mr. GEARHART. That it was received by General Marshall.

You also know, as one who keep in touch with these papers, that General Marshall did not voice or telegraph any objections to the precautions that General Short had taken as reported in the telegram that I have just read?

General MILES. I do, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. It must have been satisfactory; is that not a correct conclusion to draw from that situation?

General MILES. I would prefer, Mr. Congressman, that General Marshall answer that question. He is to appear before you this week.

Mr. GEARHART. I will draw your attention that a similar telegram was sent on the 27th to General MacArthur in Manila and in order to emphasize the difference in the reports I am going to read from the MacArthur report and then I will ask you how do you account for the difference. General MacArthur says in his report:

Pursuant to instructions contained in your radio 624, air reconnaissance has been extended and intensified in conjunction with the Navy. Ground security measures have been taken. Within the limitations imposed by present state of development in this theater of operations everything is in readiness for the conduct of a successful defense. Intimate liaison and cooperation and cordial relations exist between the Army and the Navy. MACARTHUR.

Now, how do you account for the fact that these two gentlemen, officers of the United States, replied so differently? How do you explain it?

General MILES. I can only account for that, Mr. Congressman, by the assumption that those two commanding Generals viewed General Marshall's message, a similar message sent to the two of them, in a totally different way.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, isn't it a fact that the telegram that was sent to MacArthur was different from the telegram that was sent to General Short and it was that difference which brought forth those differences in replies? Is that not correct?

General MILES. I do not remember, Mr. Congressman, that there was any material difference between the message sent to General MacArthur and that sent to General Short.

General MILES. I do not remember, Mr. Congressman, that there was any material difference between the message sent to General MacArthur and that sent to General Short.

Mr. GEARHART. There is a very material difference and it consists of just this sentence which is contained in the message to Short but is not in the message that was sent to MacArthur [reading]:

Suggest reconnaissance and other measure as you may deem necessary, but these measures should be carried out so as not, repeat not, to alarm civilian population or disclose intent.

Now, it is that omission of that phrase in the telegram to MacArthur that probably accounts for the difference in the two replies, is that not correct?

General MILES. I do not think that is correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. All right. Let me hear what you think about it.

General MILES. The prohibition against disturbing the civilian population in this way applied far more at Hawaii, American territory, than to the Philippines, in which there was a much smaller number of American citizens, but the essential thing, Mr. Congressman, it seems to me, is that the prohibition was as old as the United States Army. We have always attempted to do our job without unnecessarily disturbing or alarming or alerting the civilian population. I think, since you asked me, that it had practically no effect in that very important war-warning message.

Mr. GEARHART. Then why did you prepare a different telegram, one containing it and the other not containing it? That is not your practice, is it, when you send joint telegrams all over the different departments that we have in the United States? You send the same telegram. Here you gave General Short definite instructions not to do something, [2420] whereas you did not give General MacArthur the instructions not to do the same thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Congressman, may I interrupt? This witness had nothing to do with it. He did not give these instructions.

Mr. GEARHART. I thought this witness testified that he had a part in the writing of this telegram of November 27.

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

General MILES. I testified exactly the opposite, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. You did not have anything to do with it? Then you cannot account for the differences in those two telegrams?

General MILES. I cannot state that of my own knowledge.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, then, as a military expert could General Short have sent airplanes all up into the air on reconnaissance and establish a reconnaissance all over those islands without exciting the people?

General MILES. I believe he could, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Could he have alerted the island under a No. 3 Army alert without apprising the people of some intent behind it?

General MILES. I had seen exactly that situation in the Island of Oahu under the guise of maneuvers, and I do not remember that the civilian population was very much disturbed. [2421] The preceding general, as we know, had them out on the No. 3 alert for several weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. General, have you completed your answer to that last question?

General MILES. Have I what?

The CHAIRMAN. Did you complete your answer to the last question?

General MILES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, unless the Congressman is practically through we will recess here.

Mr. GEARHART. No; I am not practically through.

The CHAIRMAN. We will recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow. General, you be back at that time.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

(Whereupon, at 4 p. m., Monday, December 3, 1945, an adjournment was taken until 10 a. m., Tuesday, December 4, 1945,)

[2422]

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 319), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senator Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[2423] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

When we recessed, Congressman Gearhart was examining General Miles. You may proceed, Congressman.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES (Resumed)

Mr. GEARHART. General Miles, since our interrogation of yesterday I have ascertained to my satisfaction that the message of December 7 was sent in identical form to the usual points of distribution throughout the world in identical language. That seems to be established as a fact.

Now I am directing your attention to your message of November 27, 1941. As it appears in the pamphlet of copies of messages which has been furnished us, nothing would indicate that I can see that that message was sent to all of the distributing departments in outlying bases of the United States. The message that I refer to is the one reading as follows:

Japanese negotiations have come to practically a stalemate. Hostilities may ensue. Subversive activities may be expected. Inform Commanding General and Chief of Staff only. MILES.

General MILES. Yes, sir; that message went to Hawaii, Panama, and all nine corps areas in the United States; that is including the West Coast Command, of course.

[2424] Mr. GEARHART. Then as a rule, or would you say it was a rule, that all messages of this type that were sent out were sent out in identical form to all of the overseas outlying posts, such as Hawaii, Panama?

General MILES. As a rule, that is correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. That brings me to the point of inquiring again for the purpose of clarity, why was the Marshall message of November 27th sent out in different forms, one form to Hawaii and another one to Manila?

General MILES. I regret, sir, that I cannot answer that question. I had no part in the drafting of those messages.

Mr. GEARHART. Have you any information or have you any way of telling or have you as a military expert an inference which would explain the fact that General MacArthur and General Short acted differently on those different messages?

General MILES. I have no knowledge or information bearing on that, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Don't you think it was just as important not to alarm the people of the Philippines as it was not to alarm the people of Hawaii?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I would very much rather that that question be answered by the two gentlemen who will succeed me in this witness stand and who did have a very direct hand in preparing those messages. I feel myself incompetent to [2425] answer.

Mr. GEARHART. Then you prefer not to comment upon this additional phrase that was put in the message to General Short:

But these measures should be carried out so as not to alarm the civil population or disclose intent.

You prefer that that comment be left to General Marshall?

General MILES. I would, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. And still as head of Military Intelligence you are supposed to understand these messages and keep yourself abreast of the reasons of the whys and wherefores of these distinctions, are you not?

General MILES. I did know the substance of that message so that I was informed of the substance, at least, of that message pretty thoroughly I think.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, you testified yesterday that you have not observed the distinction in these two messages.

General MILES. What is that, sir?

Mr. GEARHART. I say you testified yesterday that you have not observed the distinction in these two messages.

General MILES. I think I testified, sir, that I did not at that time, yesterday, remember this particular distinction that you were drawing up, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, I have reminded you now. Do you have any further comment to make now?

[2426] General MILES. I would very much rather not comment on the Chief of Staff's message because it was the Chief of Staff's message and because I had no part in its drafting, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact isn't it true that in Washington and the Washington Naval and Army circles there was a fixed belief that Singapore and Hawaii were so impregnable and so invincible as fortresses that they would not be attacked?

General MILES. I never heard that opinion expressed in Washington circles, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, it was up to you to keep in contact with the policies and philosophy of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, was it not?

General MILES. No, sir. I had nothing to do with what might be called the Joint Strategical Staff unless and except when I was informed by the Chief of Staff or by his direction through General Gerow what was going on. I commonly had no part in any of the activities of the—I think you call it the Joint Strategical Board.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, directing your attention to the message that was sent to the President by General Marshall and by Admiral Stark under date of November 27, I will read you the first paragraph:

[2427] If the current negotiations end without agreement, Japan may attack: The Burma Road; Thailand, Malaya; the Netherlands East Indies; the Philippines; the Russian Maritime Provinces.

Can you account or do you know why absolutely no mention is made of Singapore or of Hawaii?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not. I had no part in the drawing up of that particular document.

Mr. GEARHART. Wouldn't you say it was a legitimate inference that a possible attack upon those two bastions was not within the contemplation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and of the Army and Navy high authorities of the United States?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I would rather not pass on the implications of a paper signed by the Chief of Staff or Chief of Naval Operations in which I had no part in drawing it up.

Mr. GEARHART. All right, get back to your own personal self.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Will you cite me one document which you have yourself signed in which you spoke of the possible attack that might occur upon Hawaii?

General MILES. I do not think there was any document in those particular days which I signed in which the possible [2428] attack on Hawaii was mentioned because it was an obvious concomitant, if you like, result, an obvious possibility in any war in which we might become involved with Japan, so obvious that it would be known to all military men.

Mr. GEARHART. It was a possibility but did the Army and Navy regard it as a probability?

General MILES. I think they did, sir, regard it as probable for reasons that I have already testified, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. And still it is not mentioned in this tremendous volume of literature that has been placed upon the desks of the committeemen anywhere, that there was a possibility, a probability that Hawaii singled out alone would be the object of attack?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. But there is plenty in all of this literature, an abundance, which points out the possibility of attack in the Philippines, in the Kra Peninsula, in Thailand, in Indochina, everywhere except on those two very great fortresses at Singapore and Hawaii.

General MILES. No, sir; not everywhere except. I do not think you will find any mention of the obvious fact that in a war with Japan the Panama Canal might be attacked, the Island of Guam might be attacked, the Island of Samoa might be attacked, Midway, and so forth, and so forth.

[2429] Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

General MILES. Those things were quite obvious as possibilities in a war with Japan.

Mr. GEARHART. They are all mentioned over and over again in this literature that has been laid on our desks, except Singapore and Hawaii. Singapore has been spoken of as possibly being menaced by an invasion of the Kra Peninsula but that is as far as any of this literature has gone in respect to Singapore and it has not gone that far in respect to Hawaii anywhere along the line. If I am mistaken in that will you point it out?

General MILES. I do not know what documents you are referring to, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. GEARHART. I am referring to every document that has been laid before us.

General MILES. Well, I cannot very well answer about that but I think you are mistaken, sir. I do not remember any document of importance which specifically mentions the possibility or probability of attack on Panama, Guam, Midway, Samoa.

Mr. GEARHART. Why, there has been specific mention of Guam as an object of attack, there has been specific mention of Panama, of the Philippines, specific mention of Indochina, the Kra Peninsula, but never a specific mention of the Hawaiian [2430] Islands. If you have anything to the contrary I would like to have you point it out and if you find one document among all of these I will be surprised.

Why, even on the 27th, after Mr. Hull had handed his final statement to the Japanese, a letter was written by the Joint Chiefs of Staff in which they point out all of these other places as possible objectives of Jap attack, and Hawaii is not mentioned even then.

General MILES. Do they point out Panama or Guam?

Mr. GEARHART. No.

General MILES. Or Samoa?

Mr. GEARHART. No; but they point out the Burma Road, Thailand, Malay, Netherlands East Indies, the Philippines, the Russian Maritime Provinces, and discuss each one on the basis of the paper later on.

But, General Miles, things happened on the 6th of December which suddenly centered your attention upon Hawaii as a possible object of attack, did there not?

General MILES. Things happened on the morning of the 7th of December, sir, which centered my attention on the probable Japanese attack somewhere coincident with the delivery of the Japanese reply at 1 o'clock that day.

[2431] Mr. GEARHART. You are familiar with the so-called 14-part Japanese reply to the Hull message of November 26, are you not?

General MILES. I am, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. When they speak of it as the 14-part message they are referring to the method the Japanese used in transmitting that message, are they not?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. It came in in installments, in other words, rather than in a solid typed coded message; is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Thirteen parts of that message were received in Washington on the 6th day of December, were they not?

General MILES. On the late evening of the 6th they were received, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. When did they start coming in, and when was the thirteenth part finally received?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I cannot answer that question with any degree of certainty. You will have witnesses before you who can answer that, sir; witnesses who handled that particular activity.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I will yield.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I just want to see if I am right about it. I understood General Miles was supposed to return [2432] at another time and a special inquiry would be made along that line. Is that correct, Mr. Gesell?

Mr. GESELL. That is correct, Congressman Cooper. The procedure called for having here at one time all witnesses concerned with those messages so that we could get a composite and detailed investigation into that.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. GEARHART. I will yield.

Senator FERGUSON. Just for a question of the chairman. As I understand it now, Mr. Chairman, the plan is to call General Marshall on Thursday morning. I am just inquiring as to how we might proceed with General Marshall on the particular items that we are omitting from General Miles, such as the wind message.

Mr. GESELL. I think we indicated—if I may answer that—we indicated in the memorandum distributed to the committee that we felt, under the circumstances, an exception should be made to our procedure as to General Marshall, and that General Marshall should be questioned concerning the wind message and questioned concerning the events of the sixth and seventh, inasmuch as he may not be available again for some time to appear before the committee.

Our thought was there should be no division of his testimony, [2433] that all subjects should be covered with him while he is on the stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair might say in that connection that the exigencies of General Marshall's departure have made it necessary to rearrange, if not disarrange, the order of witnesses, because of the necessity for him to leave before the time when he would be regularly reached.

Now, inasmuch as he will be away, the Chair understands he will be asked about all matters within his knowledge, just as if he had not come on the stand until he had been reached in the regular course of the schedule.

Mr. GESELL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, that is not the inquiry I am making this morning. My inquiry is along this line: If we are to properly examine General Marshall on these points it appears to me evident that the men who dealt with him on those points, such as General Miles, General Gerow, should be questioned on those points first, so there will be no necessity of calling General Marshall back to try to get information from him after he leaves, because we haven't any idea what these gentlemen are going to say as to their dealings with him in relation to these particular messages.

The CHAIRMAN. The plan is to put General Gerow on prior to General Marshall's appearance, if we get through with [2434] General Miles in time.

Senator FERGUSON. That does not answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know whether he can answer your question or not. The Chair cannot control questions that will be asked the witnesses by members of the committee.

Senator FERGUSON. That is perfectly all right, if that is the rule.

Mr. GEARHART. I might say, Mr. Chairman, I am fully aware of the understanding we had with reference to grouping all the witnesses on this question and interrogating them at a subsequent meeting of this committee, but in view of the change in the program that has been made, it becomes incumbent now to go into this question with this witness, who is one of the actors with respect to what was done.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead. We will probably save time by going into it now to such an extent as the gentleman may be able to testify about it.

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Chairman, if that is to be the procedure we will, of course, want to present certain documentary material concerning those events, so there can be the fullest kind of examination. We did not cover it in our examination at all, as the committee is aware, for the reasons I have indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the counsel will understand that the change of the program by the necessity of calling General Marshall [2435] as soon as possible may make it necessary to change the collateral program surrounding his testimony and his activities.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, just a point of inquiry. The program that has been outlined is entirely possible, as I would conceive it. General Miles may not have with him certain documents and records that he might want to refer to. In fairness that ought to be borne in mind.

General MILES. I am prepared to answer any questions, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We can probably find out about that by going ahead.

Mr. GEARHART. I do not intend to ask any questions that will require the revealing of a lot of documents, but I do want to ask these questions now in order to prepare myself, as I hope other members of the committee will, in their examination of General Marshall when he appears.

Now you have told us that the 13 parts arrived on the 6th. That is correct, is it not?

General MILES. On the evening of the 6th; yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you know when the last one was received on the evening of the 6th, the thirteenth part?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not know accurately the hour in which that was received, but you will have witnesses before you who can testify to that, which is more than I am able to do.

[2436] Mr. GEARHART. Do you know when the fourteenth part was received on the 7th of December?

General MILES. I understand that that was received fairly early on the morning of the 7th, at 7 or 8 o'clock. Again I am not able to testify as to the accurate hour.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you know when the so-called parallel 1 o'clock directive was received and decoded?

General MILES. That also was received on the morning of the 7th, but I am unable to identify the hour.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you know whether it came before or after the fourteenth part of the reply to Mr. Hull was received?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not of my own knowledge know that.

Mr. GEARHART. As soon as those several parts were received they were immediately delivered to the usual recipients of that kind of information, is that not correct?

General MILES. I again would much prefer that question be answered by the officers who actually did it and will be witnesses before this committee.

[2437] Mr. GEARHART. That was a matter peculiarly within your jurisdiction, was it not?

General MILES. It was a function of my department to make those deliveries from my officers to the Secretary of War, Chief of Staff, Chief of War Plans Division, G-2, and Secretary of State.

Mr. GEARHART. And the President?

General MILES. No, sir; not the President.

Mr. GEARHART. You did not make those deliveries to the President?

General MILES. Not at that time; no, sir. That was done by Navy.

Mr. GEARHART. You were impressed with the importance of that fourteenth part of the message, were you not?

General MILES. When I read it, I was very much impressed with the fourteenth part.

Mr. GEARHART. Did you make any out-of-the-ordinary directions in reference to its immediate delivery to the ones that were entitled to receive copies from an emissary from your division?

General MILES. It had been delivered to the recipients about coincidental with its delivery to me, with the exception of General Marshall with whom I was in touch either directly or through Colonel Bratton to get this information to him.

[2438] Mr. GEARHART. Did you make any special effort, by telephone or otherwise, or by calling at his office, to inform General Marshall of the receipt of that fourteenth part of the message?

General MILES. I did, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Were you successful in contacting him?

General MILES. I was, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. When did you inform him of the fourteenth part of the message?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I have written notes on my activities on the 6th and 7th which, perhaps for clarity and saving time, I might read.

My wife and I dined at the house of Admiral Theodore Wilkinson, then Chief of ONI. We were there from 8 p. m., until about 11 p. m. Shortly before we left, I think about 10:30 p. m., Commander Kramer came to the house, bringing with him a summary, I think, although it may have been the full translation of the first 13 parts of the Japanese reply to our note of November 26. This was the first knowledge I had that these 13 parts were in.

These 13 parts had little military significance. They concluded only with a Japanese refusal to accept the American proposal of November 26 as a basis of negotiation—a result which had been expected and discounted for some time. [2439] I, therefore, contented myself that night by calling Colonel Bratton at his home about 11:30 p. m., and assuring myself that the full reply would be disseminated the next morning on Sunday, and that he and I would be in our offices then.

Mr. KEEFE. May I interrupt, Mr. Chairman, to ask the counsel whether or not we have received the first 13 parts as they came in? I have the full message, but in the form that it was received and delivered that night, have we been furnished the first available copies of those 13 parts?

Mr. GESELL. Yes. Of course, the first 13 parts are printed in exhibit 1.

Mr. KEEFE. I see.

Mr. GESELL. By parts. Congressman Keefe, when you were absent yesterday, we stated we were building up documentation on these crucial messages, and it had been our plan to present that to the committee in connection with General Marshall's testimony. We are a little ahead of that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that General Miles be permitted to complete his recital as he started out to do, so that we may have that in the record in regular form.

Go ahead, General.

General MILES. Early on the morning of the 7th, Colonel Bratton called me at my house, told me that important information was in and that he was trying to get in touch [2440] with General Marshall. I asked Colonel Bratton to tell General Marshall that I would come out to Fort Myer to see him if he desired. Either Colonel Bratton or I called General Gerow. These telephone messages were designed to effect a meeting of the Chief of Staff with General Gerow, Colonel Bratton, and myself, which subsequently took place in General Marshall's office.

I then went to my office. There I saw the full Japanese reply, and the 1 p. m. delivery message, and discussed them with Colonel Bratton. The latter message and the fourteenth part of the Japanese reply struck me immediately.

Some arrangement had been made for us to be notified when General Marshall arrived. When so notified, I went to General Marshall's office. What took place in his office is best recalled by me in a memorandum I prepared for the Chief of Staff, dated December 15, 1941, subject: "Sunday Morning, December 7, 1941."

This is the memorandum that I refer to, as my recollection of what occurred.

Mr. GESELL. May I interpose there?

The memorandum that General Miles is now reading we are just distributing to the committee. I sent for it as soon as this change in program developed. It is included in a series of memoranda, some prepared by General Gerow, [2441] one by General Miles, and some by other officers, all recording events that took place on the 6th and 7th. I feel it will be of advantage to the committee to have all these memoranda in the record as a basis for this examination.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you desire to read the memorandum of December 15, 1941, at this time?

Mr. GESELL. Well, General Miles is starting to read his memorandum of December 15. I thought perhaps all of them should be introduced as an exhibit, since they all relate to the same subject matter.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GEARHART. What number will it bear?

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. One at a time, please.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. So that the record may be clear, I want to know when these papers that have just been handed to us were prepared and as to why we could not have them earlier; I want you to explain that on the record.

Mr. GESELL. You are asking me?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. GESELL. These documents relate to a phase of the case which we had anticipated would come on several weeks [2442] from now. I think they were prepared and put in our hands a day or two ago. We had not distributed them because we did not think they were a matter to come immediately before the committee.

Senator FERGUSON. I find, Mr. Chairman, I received papers this morning that are on my desk here, that are material to the committee's examination, and I wondered why I had not received them before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not in a position to explain why any document that comes to us did not come sooner. I suppose counsel are making every diligent effort to get the documents to us as soon as possible.

Mr. GESELL. What documents are you referring to?

Senator FERGUSON. I am talking about the one signed by L. T. Gerow, brigadier general, dated November 27, 1941, placed before me this morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. GESELL. That is right. That was placed there this morning. We were going to introduce that in connection with General Gerow's testimony. It is his memorandum.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think it has no connection with General Miles whatever?

Mr. GESELL. I do not know whether it has any connection with him.

Senator FERGUSON. Isn't it connected directly with [2443] General Miles' testimony? I understand he was the intelligence officer, and I assume he had all matters pertaining to intelligence under his jurisdiction, and therefore he should be questioned on it.

The CHAIRMAN. This seems to be a paper prepared for the Chief of Staff by General Gerow on November 27. It does not seem to mention General Miles in any way. It is presented by General Gerow and directed to the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GESELL. This is General Gerow's memorandum concerning the message of November 27.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that, but we were talking yesterday with General Miles about the the information that was known in the Philippines, and he was telling us what he knew was known in the Philippines. This memorandum would indicate some things in relation to knowledge in the Philippines. There is attached to it an instrument, "H. R. Stark, 26 November 1941, G. L. Tucker," indicating that certain messages were going to the High Commissioner of the Philippines from the President.

My inquiry is why we could not have these at the time they were received, rather than to have them placed on our desk here at the opening of this morning's session, when we are examining the witness.

[2444] Mr. GEARHART. I think I can answer that question myself. The reason is, the members of this committee are not supposed to have before them, or consider any evidence whatsoever, until it is offered to us by the counsel of the committee. That is the policy which has changed this committee from an investigatory body into a judicial body.

The CHAIRMAN. That statement is without the slightest foundation in fact or theory, or even suspicion. Documents have been filed before us so voluminous—

Mr. GEARHART (interposing). I will point out I have received about 4 feet high of typewritten matter, any part of which could have been served upon me within the previous 2 months that we were waiting for these hearings to commence, brought to me and given to me at a time when it was utterly impossible for any human being to read it, and at the same time keep up the proceedings in this committee room.

Now, of course, I would not say for one moment that anybody planned it this way, but the result of it is—and there is no escaping this conclusion—that we are now sitting here listening to testimony, listening to the reading of documents which we have had no chance to contemplate or evaluate before these hearings commenced. That is a judicial proceeding. We are sitting as judges on the bench listening to evidence as it is fed to us, spoon-fed to us, [2445] if you please.

We have been denied the right to personally investigate and to personally have the papers before they were dumped in our laps in this hearing.

That is what I have objected to all along the line, and that I will constantly object to as long as there is breath in my body.

[2446] The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes that we could go ahead with the witness. The comment about whether we are being fed with a spoon is not very relevant. If the member is not satisfied with that instrument maybe we could get a scoop.

Mr. GEARHART. Undoubtedly other things of the same kind which will contain evidence that ought to be a scoop for the newspapers.

The CHAIRMAN. Let us proceed.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Counsel offered as an exhibit these documents here. I request that they be received and we be given the number.

Mr. GESELL. Exhibit 39, I believe, Congressman.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 39.")

Senator LUCAS. I would like to make one observation—

Mr. GEARHART. I do not wish to yield. My cross-examination has been interrupted for the last 15 minutes.

Senator LUCAS. I am very sorry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will try to protect the member from interruption. The Chair understood that he had yielded.

Mr. GEARHART. I had yielded and I think my yieldings to date have been very helpful.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The witness was in the act of reading his memorandum. Do you want him to complete that?

[2447] Mr. GEARHART. Yes; I would like to have that completed, if possible.

Will you go on with your memorandum, General Miles?

General MILES. [Reading exhibit No. 39:]

DECEMBER 15, 1941.

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

Subject: Sunday morning, December 7, 1941.

1. My recollection of what occurred in your office on that morning is as follows:

I found you alone in your office at about 11:25 a. m. We were almost immediately joined by Colonel Bratton, who brought in the Japanese reply and the Japanese directive that the reply be given to Secretary Hull at 1:00 p. m. that day.

You then read aloud the Japanese reply, which was of considerable length. You then asked what Colonel Bratton and I thought should be done about it, or what it signified. We said that we believed there was important significance in the time of the delivery of the reply—1:00 p. m.—an indication that some military action would be undertaken by the Japanese at that time. We thought it probable that the Japanese line of action would be into Thailand, but it might be any one or more of a number of other areas.

I urged that the Philippines, Hawaii, Panama and [2448] the West Coast be informed immediately that the Japanese reply would be delivered at one o'clock that afternoon, and to be on the alert. You then picked up the telephone and got Admiral Stark. You told him you thought we should send out warning as indicated above. After Admiral Stark replied, you put down the telephone and said that the Admiral did not think any further warnings necessary, since all the forces had already been several times alerted. Colonel Bratton and I nevertheless urged that warnings be sent.

You then wrote out the warnings message. There was some discussion as to whether the Philippines should be included or not, but I am not quite clear exactly when this discussion occurred. You again got Admiral Stark on the telephone and read the message to him. He apparently concurred, and asked that the naval forces be informed. You added that at the bottom of the message.

At about this time General Gerow and Colonel Bundy arrived. You asked us in succession, beginning with me, what we thought the Japanese reply and timing meant. I said that I thought it probably meant Thailand, but that the timing had some significance and warning messages should be sent. General Gerow and Colonels Bratton and Bundy concurred. The message in your [2449] handwriting was then given to Colonel Bratton to take immediately to the Message Center. (There was a little discussion here as to whether it should go to General Gerow's office for typing first, but time was then pressing and I gave it to Bratton for immediate delivery. General Gerow said as Bratton was leaving, "Tell them to give first priority to the Philippines if there is a question of priority" or something to that effect.) Bratton returned in a few moments and you directed him to find out how long it would take for the delivery of those messages. Again he went to the Message Center and returned and reported to you that they would have them encoded in three minutes, on the air in eight, and in the hands of the recipients in (I think) twenty.

Colonel Bratton states that he looked at his watch on delivering your message to the Signal Corps, and the time was 11:50 a. m. He further states that the Message Center gave him no intimation that all four messages would not go over Army radio direct to the four Army Headquarters.

Signed by me.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you remember when you first saw the full message of the 14 parts?

General MILES. I cannot identify the hour exactly, sir. [2450] I only know that I got down there to the office fairly early after this telephone conversation with Colonel Bratton, and I think that General Gerow, although of that I am not quite certain, and that I had considerable time to read the message and discuss it with Colonel Bratton before the arrival of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. GEARHART. Who else was at that dinner party with you at Admiral Wilkinson's?

General MILES. It is my recollection that Admiral Beardall, the naval aide to the President, was there, but as Admiral Wilkinson will appear before you I think he could give you more accurate information.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, when you left the office from day to day at nighttime and General Marshall left his office from day to day at nighttime, did you always leave word as to where you could be found and did he always leave word as to where you could find him if you wished?

General MILES. I don't know, sir. I don't believe that we had that in effect in those days. It has always been in effect since. But I should doubt if we had it in effect at that time, although I am not sure.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, you had a lot of discussions about the 1 o'clock directive, didn't you, when that was decoded and laid on your desk?

[2451] General MILES. Yes, sir; I discussed that with Colonel Bratton and, of course, as I testified, with General Marshall.

Mr. GEARHART. Various interpretations as to the possible meaning of that message were given by the various persons you talked with?

General MILES. I don't remember any details of the discussion, sir, except that it obviously, we thought, fitted into the time schedule of the Japanese somewhere.

Mr. GEARHART. And, as a matter of fact, didn't the officers that you talked with, all of the trained officers, immediately reach the conclusion that that meant an attack upon Hawaii, and that 1 o'clock in Washington mean dawn there?

General MILES. I don't remember that that point was expressed, sir. We weren't trying to guess where it was coming. We wanted to warn the overseas departments that something probably would come at that time somewhere.

Mr. GEARHART. But the very use of 1 o'clock by the Japanese Government in directing their Ambassador and Envoy to present that at that hour certainly excited in the minds of every officer who saw that message much comment in respect to its possible meaning, did it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir. It was a very unusual request to make on a Secretary of State of a foreign power, that he receive a message at 1 o'clock on a Sunday afternoon.

[2452] Mr. GEARHART. And isn't it true that the opinion among those with whom you were in consultation was unanimous that it meant trouble in Hawaii?

General MILES. No, sir; I have no such recollection.

Mr. GEARHART. Was there anything said by any of the officers with whom you discussed this message that all previous maneuvers at Hawaii had all contemplated an attack at the dawn if the attack were to be an attack from the air?

General MILES. I don't remember that those maneuvers were discussed at that time, sir.

[2453] Mr. GEARHART. Well, you wouldn't forget what was discussed in respect to a matter of such tremendous importance, would you?

General MILES. I do not clearly remember the details of the discussion. My clear recollection is of the urgency of getting warnings out.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, you have—

General MILES. At the last we knew something about a time, although we didn't know anything about a place.

Mr. GEARHART. You have already testified that you regarded that 1 o'clock directive as highly significant of something. Now you tell me that you don't remember what anybody said about it that they thought was significant.

General MILES. No, sir. If I have given that impression. I have not clearly expressed myself. We all thought it was extremely significant as a time factor. We were guessing in the dark if we tried to determine where the operations, which were to be coincident with the delivery of the reply, 1 o'clock Washington time, would take place.

Mr. GEARHART. You contemplated what 1 o'clock would be at Hawaii, what 1 o'clock in Washington would be at Manila, what 1 o'clock in Washington would be at Indochina, didn't you?

General MILES. I am trying to remember, Mr. Congressman [2454] but I do not remember that any of those places specifically were discussed, or that we related the 1 o'clock in Washington to any specific place. We thought the line of action would be Thailand, still thought it that morning, but we wanted our overseas departments and the west coast alerted, and it was an awful urgency about it.

Mr. GEARHART. All right. What did 1 o'clock in Washington mean in Hawaii?

General MILES. One o'clock, as we now know, meant about 7 o'clock, I think, in Hawaii.

Mr. GEARHART. Why did you put that phrase in your answer "as we now know"?

General MILES. Because I have testified——

Mr. GEARHART. Didn't you know it then?

General MILES. I don't remember the point being discussed on the day in question, the 7th of December 1941.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, at 7 o'clock in the morning is a likely time of attack upon the islands, under all of the opinions of the experts in yesteryears who had under consideration the possibility of an attack on Hawaii; isn't that correct?

General MILES. That was a likely time; not the only time.

Mr. GEARHART. What time was that, 1 o'clock in Washington, [2455] in Manila?

General MILES. I wouldn't be able to say offhand, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. It was the middle of the night, in round figures; is that not correct?

General MILES. I would not be able to say offhand.

Mr. GEARHART. Is the middle of the night a likely time to attack anywhere?

General MILES. It depends entirely upon what kind of an attack. Landing attacks have been made at night. There have always been two schools as to whether a landing attack should be made under cover of night, or at dawn when you have the advantage of a little light.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, night fighting was developed in World War II for the first time as an important factor in attacks; is that not correct?

General MILES. No, sir. There was a great deal of night fighting in the first World War.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

General MILES. The landing at Gallipoli, one of them, was made under cover of darkness.

Mr. GEARHART. Early morning darkness, though, wasn't it? The idea was to put the attacking force on the ground as the dawn broke; is that not correct?

[2456] General MILES. I wouldn't be able to testify offhand without looking that up. I do know there were two definite schools of thought as to an overseas landing attack. Do you want to use the cover of darkness, or do you want to use the light of early morning.

Mr. GEARHART. Have you completed?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Three times I thought you had.

Now, as a matter of fact, prior to World War I, a dawn attack was considered about the best kind of attack that could be made because it would catch the enemy usually just before they got up, and it would give the attacking force the benefit of the first light to make their attack; isn't that correct?

General MILES. I am trying to project my mind back to what we knew or thought in those days, sir. I don't really remember. I expect you are correct.

Mr. GEARHART. Generally speaking. I know there are exceptions.

General MILES. I don't want to argue the point. I think you are right. The consensus of military opinion would be that dawn was a very good hour to make a landing attack. Certainly before the First World War.

Mr. GEARHART. I know that night attacks have been made. [2457] We haven't forgotten the crossing of the Delaware on Christmas Eve when everybody was having Christmas parties. But it was a very unusual thing, and only because of very unusual circumstances that night attacks were ever undertaken.

So a dawn attack was within the range of probabilities; a night attack was merely within the range of possibility in the conception of military and naval leaders prior to World War II; isn't that correct?

General MILES. I think that is substantially correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. When you consider air attack, it is especially advantageous to the attacking force to ride in on the rays of the sun, so to speak; is that not correct?

General MILES. I believe that is substantially correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. That was the conclusion all military and naval experts had arrived at after studying for 50 years the island known as Oahu?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I think I can clear your line of questioning very easily by saying that on that rather hectic morning of the 7th of December, we probably didn't stop to figure out what hour in the different parts of the world would coincide with 1 o'clock in Washington. [2458]

What we all wanted to do was to get out warnings to all of the four vital areas and tell them the hour we feared something was going to happen. They knew in Hawaii what hour that was in their time. They knew in Manila. They knew in Panama. The main thing was to get the warning out and do it fast.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you mean to tell me that the 1 o'clock directive was not the principal thing discussed when General Marshall sent this message worded as it is? Doesn't it reflect the very fact that 1 o'clock was the one topic of discussion, the one subject that was giving you very much concern at that time?

General MILES. That was one of the two main subjects. The other was the fourteenth part of the Japanese reply which, couched in the language that was used, meant very serious trouble, we thought. But, yes, sir, you are right. We wanted to get the hour out to the overseas departments and let them translate it into their own time.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, it was the use of 1 o'clock Washington time that directed your attention forcibly to the possibility, yea, probability of an attack upon Hawaii, for the first time. Isn't that correct?

General MILES. No, sir, I am sorry, I cannot agree.

Mr. GEARHART. Let's refresh your memory by reading the [2459] message General Marshall sent out on that day:

Japanese are presenting at one p. m. Eastern Standard Time today what amounts to an ultimatum. Also they are under orders to destroy their code machines immediately. Just what significance the hour set may have we do not know but we are alert accordingly. Inform naval authorities of this communication.

So General Marshall thought that the important idea was to tell everybody in the field that 1 o'clock was a significant thing?

General MILES. That is just what I have testified, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes, but it was particularly significant in its application to Hawaii, wasn't it?

General MILES. Yes, sir. We know that now, looking back on the event.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you want to say and commit yourself as a military expert that it was not significant to you then?

General MILES. It was very significant to me then that this meant the possibility of attack on any one of our vulnerable points. I did not conceive the idea of an attack on Hawaii for the first time through reading that message. I had always thought an attack on Hawaii, as I have repeatedly [2460] stated, was possible if not probable, if we got into a war with Japan.

These two messages we had, the fourteenth part of the reply and the 1 o'clock, meant two things: (1) That war is very likely because of the language used by the Japanese, and (2) something is going to happen coincident with 1 o'clock Washington time. That is all we knew. That is what we sent out. But the main thing was to get it out.

Mr. GEARHART. What time did you meet General Marshall in his office on that fateful Sunday morning?

General MILES. I wrote on the 15th of December 1941, which was 8 days after Pearl Harbor, that I found General Marshall alone in his office at about 11:25 a. m., on Sunday morning.

Mr. GEARHART. When was the conference completed insofar as the determination to send a message was concerned?

General MILES. I wrote on that same day, December 15, that Colonel Bratton looked at his watch on delivering General Marshall's message to the Signal Corps, and the time was 11:50 a. m.

Mr. GEARHART. 11:50?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Was the message at that time encoded, or did it have to be encoded after 11:50?

[2461] General MILES. It was in General Marshall's handwriting, in plain English, and had to be encoded by the Signal Corps.

Mr. GEARHART. How long did it take them to encode the message, if you know?

General MILES. I do not know, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. When was the message sent? When was it on the wires? Or in the air—which was it?

General MILES. The message to Hawaii went by Western Union, I understand, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. That means it went by wire to San Francisco, and by cable to Hawaii?

General MILES. That is correct.

Mr. GEARHART. The wire and cable were commercial wire and cable?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, as you sat in General Marshall's office, he writing the message, were there any other and faster methods of conveying information such as you were sending out that were available?

General MILES. Radio is about the fastest method that probably could have been used. There was, of course, the telephone and had that been used, it might have been faster. That depends on getting the communication, the connection in [2462] Hawaii. We also had a scrambler on the telephone in those days, and that could have been put on and a message sent that way.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, how many radios were available for the sending of that message?

General MILES. Mr. Congressman, I am not prepared to testify as to the technical details of signal communication. You will have witnesses before you who will testify on that.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, now, as a matter of fact, the FBI had a short-wave radio to Hawaii, and that was available to the use of the Army, if you had desired to use it; is that not correct?

General MILES. I have heard that statement made, sir. I don't know of my own personal knowledge.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact the Navy had a short-wave radio that could have been used to transmit this message to Hawaii: is that not correct?

General MILES. I have heard that also, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. And right on General Marshall's desk was a telephone that he could have used to call Hawaii commercially, if he had so desired; is that not correct?

General MILES. There was a telephone on his desk.

Mr. GEARHART. And also, there was a scrambler apparatus that could have been attached to the telephone had he desired [2463] to use the telephone; is that not correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir. There was, as I remember it, a scrambler apparatus in a neighboring room.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, when you had decided to send the message, and General Marshall had written it out, was there any discussion among those present at that time as to what method of transmission should be utilized?

General MILES. No, sir; I remember no such discussion. It was a very important message, an urgent message, in the Chief of Staff's own handwriting. The Signal Corps had the responsibility of sending such a message by the fastest available means, and I don't think it occurred to anyone in the room to discuss that question or decide as to how the Signal Corps would handle their own affair.

Mr. GEARHART. You had in mind the difference in time in Washington and the time in Hawaii, the time in Manila and the time in Panama, and still the slowest method was selected without any comment from any of the high-ranking Army officers who were then and there present?

General MILES. I did not know what method was selected for the sending of the Hawaiian message until several days later and I am quite sure that neither General Marshall nor General Gerow knew what method was selected. But I would like to point out that General Marshall was so anxious to [2464] get this message out as rapidly as possible, that after Colonel Bratton had delivered it he directed Colonel Bratton to return and find out exactly how long it would take to send it to the recipients.

Colonel Bratton came back and made that report as to what he had been told by the Signal Corps.

Mr. GEARHART. And later you learned that it arrived in Hawaii just 22 minutes before the first bomb fell, and that it was not decoded and delivered until some two hours after the last bomb had exploded?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

I discovered that later.

Mr. GEARHART. I would like to have you tell us, General Miles, just where you were all day Saturday, up to Saturday night, until you went to bed and where you were all the time on Sunday until you went to bed.

General MILES. I am afraid I can't, sir. I can only identify in my memory two occasions on Saturday. Undoubtedly I was in my office most of the day, but I don't remember anything significant that occurred in the office that I can pin on Saturday, December 6. I do remember lunching with Admiral Kincaid, who was leaving that afternoon to take command of his ships. I do remember Admiral Wilkinson's dinner and what transpired that evening. I do remember telephoning [2465] Colonel Bratton when I returned home that evening. I do remember what I have testified to, and what I wrote out 8 days after Pearl Harbor as to what happened on Sunday morning. Beyond that I cannot recall.

Of course, I do recall, if you want to go into that, what happened when the announcement came over the radio that Pearl Harbor was being attacked, and I rushed back to my office. I had returned home for lunch. And I spent the rest of the day, and I think that night, in my office.

Mr. GEARHART. Do you know why General Marshall was delayed in getting to the office that Sunday morning?

General MILES. I believe that he was out horseback riding that morning, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. You know that he was informed of this message by telephone by Colonel Bratton, and he said that he would be in.

General MILES. I know he was informed of this message by Colonel Bratton; yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. And he was informed quite early in the morning, while he was still out getting his exercise, horseback riding?

General MILES. I cannot identify the hour, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. But he did not present himself at the office until the time you mentioned, around 11 o'clock?

[2466] General MILES. So far as I know, he came in about 11 : 25.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, a very eminent ambassador arrived in Washington by air that day, did he not?

General MILES. Not that I remember, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, I am not sure about it, but didn't Ambassador Maxim Litvinoff arrive from Russia on the morning of the 7th?

General MILES. If he did, I have no recollection of it at all, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, I may be in error, but I am informed that he was met by General Marshall on that morning; is that correct? Do you know?

General MILES. I have never heard that before, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, there is very much more I might go into, but I have consumed altogether too much time, so I will reserve any further cross-examination until you reappear when we go into these other messages in detail.

Thank you very much.

Mr. GESELL. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the committee, in view of the Congressman's statement, whether it is expected that General Miles will be recalled on that subject?

Mr. GEARHART. From the statement made by counsel, yes.

[2467] Mr. GESELL. We would like direction from the committee on that.

Mr. GEARHART. I understand that you are going to devote special time to a discussion of certain messages, such as the wind message. If you are going to do that, it will be necessary to recall General Miles.

Furthermore, I think that a witness who had such intimate contact with what was transpiring should stand by available for recall at any time his appearance may be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it is difficult for the committee to say at this moment whether General Miles will be wanted back again.

The Chair assumed from what counsel said that when you went into these wind messages, and other messages, that General Miles was to be recalled to testify about that. Whether General Marshall's appearance earlier than expected will interfere or make that unnecessary, I don't know that the committee could determine at this time.

Mr. GESELL. My only question is, if we are to examine General Miles concerning the events of the 6th and 7th and the winds message now, there are a substantial number of questions in addition to those the Congressman has asked which should be asked. If he is to be recalled for that [2468] examination, we can defer that examination on those questions until that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only express his view, that in view of the more or less superficial result of the inquiry of General Miles on that subject today, it might be well to hold him in reserve for further examination when we reach that phase of the question.

[2469] Mr. GEARHART. I might say to counsel that my cross-examination of this witness was directed to two specific ideas which I wanted to develop. One was the significance of the 1 o'clock message. The other the effect it had upon the minds of those who learned of it and what transpired in the sending of the warning message. That is as far as I wanted to go at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to counsel, for whatever it is worth, in view of the fact that that phase is to be dealt with later, the Chair sees no necessity for laying the foundation at this time for examination of General Miles on that subject which would be gone into at a later date.

Mr. GESELL. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George, we passed you.

Senator GEORGE. No questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator FERGUSON. General Miles, since the question of the 6th and the 7th has been brought up this morning, I want to ask you some questions on those dates.

Was there any discussion in General Marshall's office at the time that message was drafted or after, up until the message left the room, as to how the message would or could be sent?

As I understand it, when you arrived there it was 11:25. That gave you an hour and 35 minutes up to 1 o'clock.

[2470] Senator FERGUSON. Is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there any discussion as to how that message would be sent?

General MILES. I remember no discussion as to what means the Signal Corps would employ in sending that message. The only clear idea conveyed to Colonel Bratton was to get this off as soon as possible. We didn't even stop to have it typed or anything.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there anything said about the Army radio being out of order?

General MILES. I never knew that the Army radio was out of order until some time later, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You knew that the Navy had a high-powered radio that you could have reached Hawaii with?

General MILES. I think I did; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you only think that you knew that? Didn't you know that?

General MILES. I can't say positively that I knew it, but I am very sure that it was within my knowledge at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Well now, had you ever used the telephone, the scrambler telephone, to Hawaii?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you didn't know how long it would [2471] take to do that?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there anything said to the effect that the Army wouldn't be up at 7 o'clock in the morning and therefore you would send it by commercial radio?

General MILES. No, sir; I remember nothing like that.

Senator FERGUSON. Was anything said about that?

General MILES. I remember no such discussion, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, this was a Sunday in Hawaii, was it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you anticipate that the commercial radio, at 7 o'clock in the morning in Hawaii—it would be before 7—would be functioning so that it could deliver immediately a message to the Army?

General MILES. You mean, Senator, the commercial cable?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Did you consider that at the time of this meeting, that Sunday morning, before 7 o'clock, a commercial institution may not be functioning at that time?

General MILES. No, sir; I didn't consider that, Senator, because the question of the use of commercial cable never arose. I didn't know they were going to use commercial cable. I didn't know they had used it until several days later.

Senator FERGUSON. General Miles, no more important message [2472] ever went over the wires or by communication between these two points, in your opinion; isn't that correct?

No more important message ever was sent between these two points than this particular message?

General MILES. I think that is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. And speed was of the essence because it was 11:25 when you got together that morning, although you had had the message from 7 o'clock; is that correct?

General MILES. I cannot identify the hour when I first saw this message. I am quite sure it was not as early as 7.

Senator FERGUSON. What time was it?

General MILES. I cannot identify the hour. I can only tell you I think reasonably early. I think between 7 and 8 I had this telephone call with Colonel Bratton and then went to the office.

Senator FERGUSON. What time did you get to the office?

General MILES. I don't know, sir. I wish I did. I think I got down to the office before 9 o'clock but I can't identify the hour.

[2473] Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, would you say that you arrived there before 9 o'clock, or what time would you say Bratton called you and told you that the message was in, the 1 o'clock message?

General MILES. Certainly some time before that.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, how long before?

General MILES. Senator, I wish I could answer your question, sir, but I cannot. I remember only that there was a telephone conversation with Colonel Bratton and I was trying to insure that I could meet General Marshall and General Gerow. I did not care whether I went to Fort Myer or went to the Munitions Building. I wanted to meet them, I wanted to see them.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, General Miles, you were the Intelligence officer?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And the purpose of Intelligence is to anticipate what the opposition or the enemy is going to do, isn't that correct?

General MILES. That is the ideal, sir; that we strive to attain.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the purpose then, the use to which you could put this message was to anticipate what the Japs were going to do on Sunday, isn't that correct?

[2474] General MILES. That is true, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then do you tell us that, as the chief Intelligence officer, it took you from 9 o'clock to 11:20 to get the only man that had the right to act upon this message, and that was General Marshall? Is that what you want to convey to this committee—that it took you 2 hours and 25 minutes to get this message to General Marshall?

General MILES. I cannot state the exact time that it took me, but I think you are substantially correct, sir. I do not know when I first saw those messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir. Now, will you explain why it took from 7 o'clock, if the message was in the office at 7, until 9 to get you, the only man that could act? It took 2 hours to get you and then 2 hours and 25 minutes for you to reach the man that could act, General Marshall, which is 4 hours and 25 minutes, to act on this important message. Will you give us an explanation on that?

General MILES. You are assuming, Senator, that the message came in or was known to Colonel Bratton at 7 o'clock. Accepting that assumption—I cannot deny it because I do not know the hour, but accepting that assumption—Colonel Bratton first attempted to get General Marshall. He then called me up and I asked him to convey to General [2475] Marshall when he did get him that I would be glad to go out to Fort Myer, Colonel Bratton having told me that he had important information, as I remember it, but I do not think he told me what it was, but I was looking for important information.

Senator FERGUSON. Just a moment. Will you read the last part of the answer? You were looking for important information?

General MILES. Yes, sir; definitely; the Japanese reply.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. I then went down to my office. Whether I stopped to have a bite of breakfast, whether I was fully dressed or shaved when Colonel Bratton called me, how long it took me to get my car out and get down to the office I do not know. I would assume that I got down to the office about 9 o'clock, perhaps a little before, perhaps a little later, but I cannot identify the hour.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever known a soldier to go to his duty without shaving? This was important that morning, wasn't it?

General MILES. I do not know whether I shaved that morning or not, Senator, if you press me.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, you just told us that that is what you did.

[2476] Mr. GESELL. No; he has not said that.

Senator GEORGE. He did not say that. He said he did not remember whether he shaved or not.

Senator FERGUSON. What did you say about shaving?

General MILES. I said I did not remember whether I was dressed and shaved when Colonel Bratton called me on the telephone, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you know if you shaved before you went?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. How far do you live from your office, I mean at that particular time?

General MILES. At that particular time?

Senator FERGUSON. At that particular time; I am talking about that time.

General MILES. I lived at that time at 1761 N Street.

Senator FERGUSON. How far would that be in miles?

General MILES. Well, at 10 blocks to a mile it was a little over a mile down to the Munitions Building.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have a car?

General MILES. I had a car, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, do you know what time you got the message from Colonel Bratton that the message was in?

General MILES. No, sir; I cannot identify that hour, [2477] Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, the night before you were at Admiral Wilkinson's and he was your opposite?

General MILES. My opposite number; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. In the Navy?

General MILES. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. You had 13 parts in this message and from those 13 parts you could tell that relations were going to be broken off, there was sufficient in those parts?

General MILES. That that diplomatic conference was going to be broken was a clear assumption.

Senator FERGUSON. That is correct. Well, now, did you and Admiral Wilkinson—he was an admiral at that time, was he not, or was he a captain?

General MILES. Captain, I think, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. He was a captain?

General MILES. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you discuss that message that night?

General MILES. Not in great detail. I remember that we discussed the——

Senator FERGUSON. You expected the next morning that you would have to act on it. How does it come that you did [2478] not discuss it or go over it in detail that night that you got it?

General MILES. I think I only saw a summary of it that night but in any event, Senator, please note that the thirteenth part of that message only results or concludes with the statement that the Japanese Government regrets that it cannot accept the proposal, that is of November 26, as a basis of negotiation.

Mr. GESELL. That is the fourteenth part, isn't it?

General MILES. That is the thirteenth part.

Senator FERGUSON. So that gave you an inkling as to what was going to happen.

General MILES. That had already been discounted. We were thoroughly prepared and had been for some days to receive an unfavorable reply to the message of November 26.

I would like also to invite your attention, Senator, to the fact that we had received a message and decoded it from Tokyo to the Japanese Ambassador in Washington directing him to put this Japanese reply in the safe when he received it and wait for further instructions on delivery.

Senator FERGUSON. I am familiar with that and I want to call to your attention now on page 238 of these messages, "Re my 844a," from Tokyo to Washington December the 6th—will you read that—indicating that on the night that you [2479] were with Admiral Wilkinson, then Captain Wilkinson, that you knew or expected there would be a delivery time. Will you read that?

General MILES. Yes, sir. Read the whole message?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. (Reading:)

The Government has deliberated deeply on the American proposal of the 26th of November and as a result we have drawn up a memorandum for the United States contained in my separate message #902b (in English).

This separate message is a very long one. I will send it in 14 parts and I imagine you will receive it tomorrow. However, I am not sure. The situation is extremely delicate, and when you receive it I want you to please keep it secret for the time being.

Concerning the time of presenting this memorandum to the United States, I will wire you in a separate message. However, I want you in the meantime to put it in nicely drafted form and make every preparation to present it to the Americans just as soon as you receive instructions.

That was decoded on the sixth. It indicates very clearly that the message was not to be delivered automatically when received but that the Japanese Ambassador was to keep [2480] it secret until he received further instructions and in the meanwhile, although he had been told that was a very long message, he was to put it in nicely drafted form which should have taken some time.

I submit, sir, that that message would not indicate that the Japanese reply was likely to be delivered to the American government on Sunday the 7th of December.

Senator FERGUSON. General Miles, it is a typographical error on page 239 saying that this translation was 1/26/41. It was 12/6/41.

General MILES. That is what I have testified, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Do you know what time this message was translated on the 6th?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. What time did you know of it?

General MILES. My impression is very strong that I knew of that message on the evening of December 6. I certainly knew it—

Senator FERGUSON. Before you went home?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now I will ask you what arrangement was made at the Army for the receipt of the fourteenth part? Isn't it true they stayed up all night to get this and got it some time early in the morning and translated it?

[2481] General MILES. I believe that is true, sir, but I can not testify as to the mechanics of handling that message.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, who delivered the message to you at the Wilkinson home?

General MILES. No one delivered the message to me at the Wilkinson home.

Senator FERGUSON. Who delivered it to Wilkinson?

General MILES. Commander Kramer of the Navy is my recollection.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate to you that it at that time was being delivered to the White House and to the Secretary of State because they were in charge of that delivery?

General MILES. The Navy was in charge of delivering it to the White House.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

General MILES. We were in charge of delivering it to the Secretary of State, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you know whether or not it was delivered that night to the Secretary of State? Did you know that?

General MILES. I called Colonel Bratton and I am sure that I asked him what was the place of delivery of those messages.

[2482] Senator FERGUSON. What did he tell you that night?

General MILES. I do not remember, sir, exactly what he told me but he satisfied me that the messages were being delivered or would be delivered early the next morning when the complete message was in.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do I understand then that the Navy was delivering 13 parts and you in charge of the delivery of the 13 parts to the Army decided with Bratton that you would not deliver those 13 parts until morning, is that correct?

General MILES. I do not remember, sir, exactly what was decided between Colonel Bratton and myself that night. I called him for the purpose of—

Senator FERGUSON. Why did you call him?

General MILES. May I finish, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. I called him for the purpose of finding out what had been done, what was going to be done with these first 13 parts, but I wish to call your attention, Senator, to the fact that the first 13 parts as such was not of great military significance. We had already discounted through many days the fact that in all probability the Japanese reply to our note of November 26 would be unfavorable and that was all that the first 13 parts [2483] told us. When we got the fourteenth part we saw quite a different picture, when we got the 1 p. m. message we saw quite a different picture, but there was no reason for alerting or waking up the Chief of Staff, we will say, or certainly Secretary Hull, on the night of December 6 that I could see.

Senator FERGUSON. So, then, is it your opinion now that you told Bratton it would be all right to wait and deliver the remaining sections in the morning?

General MILES. I think that is probably what happened, sir. When the total message was in he was to see that it was promptly delivered, but I am not sure.

Senator FERGUSON. That is your best judgment at the present time?

General MILES. Yes, sir; that is my best recollection at the present time.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did Wilkinson call Admiral Stark that evening when you were at his home?

General MILES. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you discuss with Wilkinson about calling Admiral Stark?

General MILES. Not that I remember, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you see Admiral Wilkinson, then Captain Wilkinson, on the morning of the 7th?

General MILES. No, sir; I did not.

[2484] Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that the message was going to Hawaii on the 7th, that is, the message of the 7th, by commercial radio?

General MILES. No, sir; I did not.

Senator FERGUSON. That was not discussed, as far as you were concerned?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to read certain parts of the 13- or 14-part message and see whether or not it did not indicate what the fourteenth part would be. Page 240 [reading]:

While manifesting thus an obviously hostile attitude, these countries have strengthened their military preparations perfecting an encirclement of Japan, and have brought about a situation which endangers the very existence of the empire.

Will you see on page 240? I am reading the last sentence out of the one part, part 2 it is. It starts out [reading]:

However, both the United States and Great Britain have resorted to every possible measure to assist the Chungking regime so as to obstruct the establishment of a general peace between Japan and China, interfering with Japan's constructive endeavors toward the stabilization [2485] of East Asia, and so forth.

Was that significant to you, those sentences, or the change of tone of these messages?

General MILES. It signified to me that this Japanese reply was unfavorable and it was going to be unfavorable, just as we had rather expected that it would be, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the part 2, then, carried out just what you had in mind, that the negotiations would end, is that correct?

General MILES. There is no clear indication that I can see in the first 13 parts that the negotiations as such are definitely ruptured. That comes in the fourteenth part. The 13 parts, as I see them, Senator, are a rehash of Japanese arguments which they have put up in this negotiation time and time again, ending with the conclusion that they could not accept our message of November 26 as a basis of negotiation. That did not mean even that they were going to rupture the conference per se, although it indicated that it probably would.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, did you know at the time of the delivery of the message of the 26th that Japan had treated it as an ultimatum and said that the negotiations were de facto broken off?

General MILES. Yes, sir; we knew that Japan was, or [2486] certain Japanese officials regarded our message of November 26 as a last word or ultimatum in the diplomatic negotiations in Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you personally try to reach General Marshall on the morning of the 7th before he went to his office?

General MILES. I did, sir, through Colonel Bratton.

Senator FERGUSON. Pardon me?

General MILES. I did, sir, through Colonel Bratton.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you tell us your conversation with Colonel Bratton in relation to trying to reach General Marshall and what did he say to you?

General MILES. Again I would like to refer, sir, to my memorandum which I wrote.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you prepare that memorandum?

General MILES. I prepared this part of the memorandum, Senator, last week. I thought for a moment that you were referring to something that was contained in my memorandum of December 15, 1941, but I was wrong.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you prepare a memorandum with Colonel Bratton on the 10th of December 1941?

General MILES. I prepared a memorandum which I read over to the Chief of Staff on the 15th.

Senator FERGUSON. That was not my question. Did you [2487] prepare with Colonel Bratton or for him a memorandum on the 10th of December 1941?

Senator LUCAS. On what?

Senator FERGUSON. Any kind of a memorandum, the one that he testified from later.

General MILES. I do not recall it at this time, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Colonel Bratton says on page 80 of Top Secret (B) [reading]:

Colonel BRATTON. On or about the 10th of December 1941 I would say, sir, that was prepared by General Miles with my assistance as a memorandum for the record of what happened.

What memorandum was that?

General MILES. I think that is the memorandum which I read into the record of December 15, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. You haven't clearly identified the paper you are reading from.

Senator FERGUSON. I identified it as Top Secret Testimony (B), page 80.

Mr. MURPHY. That is better.

Senator FERGUSON. You think that that is——

General MILES. I remember only one memorandum written [2488] at that time and that was the one written at the specific request of the Chief of Staff for a memorandum of my recollection of what had happened in his office on the 7th of December and that has been written into the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you just refresh your memory on when the so-called pilot message or the one saying that it would have a delivery time coming, that it came in on the morning of the 6th? You indicated you did not know about that message until the evening of the 6th.

Mr. GESELL. No; he did not say that.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you—now, is counsel telling the witness what he did say or are you trying to tell me?

Mr. GESELL. I am trying to tell you, Senator, that he did not testify.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, then, why don't you come and tell me?

General MILES. Senator, I think personally——

Senator FERGUSON. Just a moment until I get counsel straightened out. What does counsel want to tell me?

Mr. GESELL. I want to tell you that my recollection is that General Miles did not testify that he saw the 1 o'clock message, or that it came in on the 6th.

Senator FERGUSON. Wait. Now, I am talking about the [2489] pilot message, the one that indicated there would be a delivery time. If counsel had been listening he would have got that from the question.

General MILES. May I answer, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, you understand the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, go ahead and answer the question. Please do.

[2490] General MILES. I cannot identify the hour in which I saw that pilot message. I believe that I saw it on the afternoon of Saturday, the 6th, or I may have seen it on the morning of Sunday, the 7th.

Senator FERGUSON. Now when you were with Admiral Wilkinson on the night of the 6th, at his dinner, you mean to tell the committee you did not know there was to be a time for the delivery of this message coming in in 14 parts?

General MILES. I do not remember whether I knew it at that time or whether I did not know it until the morning of the 7th. I think I knew it on the afternoon of the 6th, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The pilot message tells you that it will be in 14 parts, isn't that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir, that is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. So that you knew on the evening, the night of the 6th, that there was only one remaining part to come in?

General MILES. I think that is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you and Admiral Wilkinson discuss that at all, that there would be only one more part coming in?

General MILES. I do not remember any discussion of that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What time did you go home that night, do you recall?

[2491] General MILES. I think I left Admiral Wilkinson's house between 10:30 and 11, probably nearer 10:30.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you communicate with Wilkinson after 10:30 until after the attack?

General MILES. No, sir, I do not remember to have done so, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, as I understand it, there was no collaboration between your office and the Navy in relation to this 14-point message or this 1 o'clock delivery time?

General MILES. So far as I can remember there was not, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The Board was not functioning at that time?

General MILES. The what, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. The Board that Congressman Murphy talked about yesterday.

General MILES. The Joint Intelligence Committee?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How do you account for the fact that you did not confer with the Navy on this important matter? You were the Intelligence officer and Wilkinson was the Intelligence officer and, as I understand it, Intelligence is to anticipate what the enemy is going to do. Now how do you account for the fact that you and Wilkinson did not confer [2492] on this important matter, which could indicate what the enemy was going to do?

General MILES. I do not remember to have conferred with Admiral Wilkinson probably because I saw no particular reason. I wanted to confer definitely with the Army authorities, the Chief of Staff and Chief of War Plans Division and get a warning message out.

Senator FERGUSON. What did you do to get in touch with the War Plans Division on Sunday or Saturday night?

General MILES. I testified, sir, it was my recollection that either I or Colonel Bratton did call up General Gerow that morning.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you reach him?

General MILES. I remember very definitely that it was my desire to have this conference as soon as possible with General Marshall and General Gerow.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you reach Gerow before you went to General Marshall's office?

General MILES. Either Colonel Bratton or I, whoever telephoned him, did reach General Gerow before we went in to see General Marshall.

Senator FERGUSON. You say you did reach him?

General MILES. We did reach him.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you talk to him about this message?

[2493] General MILES. No, sir, we were not talking over the public telephone about this message.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

General MILES. I think if I personally talked to General Gerow I probably said, "G, we have got something important. Will you come down to your office?"

Senator FERGUSON. Down to his office? Is that what you say?

General MILES. To his office; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now did he come to his office and did you meet him there?

General MILES. General Gerow, I have every reason to believe, did go to his office. I did not actually meet him in his office, I first met him in General Marshall's office.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you attempt to meet General Gerow in his office?

General MILES. I do not remember to have done so, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you at General Marshall's office before General Gerow came in?

General MILES. I was, sir, as far as I remember.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you had no conversation whatever with the War Plans Division about this message prior to going into General Marshall's office?

General MILES. That is my recollection, sir.

[2494] Senator FERGUSON. They would be in control of putting war plans into effect, would they not?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they have any exact knowledge of this message prior to going into General Marshall's office?

General MILES. Well, General Gerow was on the list of those who were to receive these magic messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether he received this magic message on the night of the 6th or the morning of the 7th, or did he have it at all prior to the time that you met him in General Marshall's office?

General MILES. My recollection is I knew at that time that he had received the magic messages before going to General Marshall's office. I do not believe that he received them on the night of December 6.

Senator FERGUSON. And that would be due to the fact that you had discussed with Bratton the fact that it would not be important to deliver those messages on the night of the 6th?

General MILES. Presumably; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now I want to take up the subject in relation to the British Intelligence. You knew, did you not, that the British were intercepting and decoding the Jap messages the same as you were?

General MILES. I did, sir.

[2495] Senator FERGUSON. And when did you first learn that the British were decoding these messages?

General MILES. I think it was sometime in January of 1941 that they were given the means of decoding these messages.

Senator FERGUSON. And after December 1941 the British, in your opinion, had access to all of the so-called magic messages; is that true?

General MILES. All that they could intercept; yes, sir. I do not remember whether they always had the same messages that we had.

Senator FERGUSON. Now did you have a committee with the British on this question?

General MILES. Did I have what?

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have a committee, or board, liaison, or joint committee between the British and the Americans on this question of intercepting these messages, or did you just give them the means of intercepting? You told us you gave them the means of intercepting and decoding.

General MILES. We gave them the means of intercepting, and I also had some discussions during that year 1941 with the British military attaché and Canadian military attaché, because certain of these messages were being intercepted by Canada, but not any other part of the British Empire. The Canadians did not have the means of breaking them nor did they [2496] know anything about the technical details of decoding. We were very anxious, however, to get from them any messages that they could pick up out of the air which, for any reason, we could not or the British could not.

Senator FERGUSON. Where was the means of the so-called tracking the code, so far as the British were concerned; was it in London?

General MILES. I believe it was in London, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did not they have a means of picking it up in Singapore?

General MILES. I imagine they did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You just imagine it. Don't you know it as an intelligence officer?

General MILES. I know nothing now. I might have at the time, but I know nothing now about the details of where the British intercepting stations were, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now after you gave them the means of decoding and intercepting and getting the information in January, 1941, did you ever get from the British any information that they obtained from Japan by means of decoding?

General MILES. I cannot answer that question, Senator, offhand. I would have to look up the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Why cannot you answer?

General MILES. Because my memory is not sufficiently good [2497] to allow me to say "yes" or "no".

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any files of any memoranda or any evidence that you have received information from the British?

General MILES. I doubt if we made those matters a matter of record. The whole question was treated with great secrecy, and these conversations I spoke of between the British and Canadian Military Attaché and myself were always verbal conversations, not reduced to writing.

Senator FERGUSON. That is not what I am talking about. I want to know, after you gave Britain the means of getting these communications, decoding the messages, receiving the messages, whether or not they ever gave you any of the evidence, as intelligence officer, that they received? That is a clear question, isn't it?

General MILES. It is a very clear question, Senator. I wish my memory were sufficiently clear to enable me to give you a clear answer. Unfortunately it is not.

Senator FERGUSON. Now you told us yesterday that Congress would not give to the Army enough money for intelligence work, and you told us about the money, as I recall, that England was spending, that it had a much bigger staff, and so forth.

That is true, isn't it?

General MILES. On the secret service; yes, sir.

[2498] Senator FERGUSON. And you delivered to them—that is, our Government, delivered to them the means of decoding these messages and after we gave them the means in January 1941, we never received any information from them until we were struck at Pearl Harbor? Is that what you want to tell this committee?

General MILES. No, sir; that is not what I want to tell this committee.

[2499] Senator FERGUSON. What do you want to tell the committee?

General MILES. I want to tell the committee that I cannot answer your question from my memory, Senator. I would, if you like, attempt to find the records, or other means of arriving at an answer to that question, but I would not do it purely from memory.

Senator FERGUSON. I will ask counsel, have we any files given to us by the Army showing that Britain did give us this intelligence service, that we enabled them to get, or cooperate with us in giving us what they received so we could compare it with what we received?

Mr. GESELL. We have no information, Senator, as to whether the British did or did not give us any results of their interceptions of magic. We can inquire about that if you wish.

Senator FERGUSON. Now going back to General Miles, where do you think, General, that you will find information as to whether or not the British were giving up this intelligence?

General MILES. I should look into the records of the far eastern section of the Military Intelligence Division and also in the SIS, the Signal Corps.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether any other agency [2500] was getting this information? Have you ever heard of any other agency getting it? Now, I am talking about agencies such as the Secretary of State, the White House, executive branch, the Navy the Air Corps, the FBI.

General MILES. No, sir; I do not remember ever having heard of any other branch or division of the Government receiving such information.

Senator FERGUSON. Then I will ask you why we gave this means to the British if it was not to help us, if that was not one of the purposes.

General MILES. Senator, you phrase one of your questions "The United States Government gave this means," and you phrase the several others that I gave this means. I prefer the former one. I did not personally give the means, of course.

Senator FERGUSON. Explain how it got there. You were the intelligence officer, and I assume you had full control and full knowledge of all intelligence. Is that correct?

General MILES. I did not have any control whatever over the SIS of the Signal Corps, from which these means were found when it was decided to give them to the British Government.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, the SIS, the Signal Corps, would not be interested in looking over all of the [2501] intelligence, analyzing it, and determining what it means, would it?

General MILES. No, sir; that was the function of Military Intelligence.

Senator FERGUSON. And that was your function?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Then you would be interested, and not SIS, in what the British were giving to us, in what messages they picked up; isn't that correct?

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you now have absolutely no memory of ever receiving any information from the British?

General MILES. I have no recollection of any specific information we received from the British, coming from magic.

Senator FERGUSON. But you will look that up. Can you do that at noon, General? Can you do that at noon so I can have it?

General MILES. I doubt very much that I can get an answer during the noon hour, but I will try, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Colonel Bratton is sitting right behind you, so you can confer with him, and so we can go into this matter.

General MILES. Do you wish me to confer with him now, sir?

[2502] Senator FERGUSON. No. We only have 5 minutes, and after that you can confer with him.

General MILES. Very well, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to go into what means of intercepting we had on the Philippines. As an intelligence officer, do you know what means of intercepting we had on the Philippines?

General MILES. I think I knew that we had a radio station capable of intercepting wireless in the Philippines. I am pretty sure of that, but that again did not come under my responsibility of jurisdiction.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that in the Philippines they had a means of decoding these diplomatic messages?

General MILES. No, sir; I did not.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you now be surprised to learn that they did have that means and gave all the messages to General MacArthur?

General MILES. I would, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, how could you evaluate what General MacArthur knew unless you knew what he was receiving? Tell us, as an intelligence officer, how you could evaluate that unless you knew what he was receiving?

General MILES. I knew what he was receiving from us. I thought that he was not receiving any magic directly from [2503] any facilities that we had available in the Philippines.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, if I told you from the Hewitt report—

General MILES. From the what?

Senator FERGUSON. From the Hewitt report. Did you ever hear from the Hewitt report?

General MILES. Admiral Hewitt; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. If I tell you that he was giving these messages, would that make any difference in your testimony?

General MILES. It would make no difference in my testimony, sir. I am testifying and have been testifying to what I remember, and what I thought I knew at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. This will be along the line of cooperation—

Mr. MURPHY (interposing). Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. You have in your files there an affidavit from General MacArthur, himself, as to what he received.

Senator FERGUSON. And I have testimony before me showing what he did receive.

Mr. MURPHY. The affidavit is in the Clausen report, which you have.

Senator FERGUSON. I have other testimony in the Hewitt [2504] Report indicating what he did receive. I will produce it this afternoon.

I want to know whether or not you knew about this message. This is a message of H. R. Stark, OPNAV, November 26, 1941, G. L. Tucker, from the President, for the High Commissioner, Philippines. I will ask you to look at it and see whether you ever knew about it? You were in the Intelligence Branch.

General MILES. Will you pass it over; please, sir?

(The document was handed to General Miles.)

General MILES. I have no recollection of ever having seen that dispatch until this moment.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read it into the record? It may refresh your memory.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair inquire what exhibit this paper appears in?

Mr. GESELL. This is the dispatch that was laid on the committee table this morning, and will be the subject, or part of the testimony of General Gerow when he follows General Miles, and will also be part of the testimony of General Marshall.

[2505] Mr. MURPHY. Part of exhibit 39?

Mr. GESELL. It is not an exhibit as yet.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read it, General?

General MILES (reading):

From: The President.

For: High Commissioner Philippines.

A copy of a dispatch will be delivered to you by Admiral Hart which, with my approval, the CNO and COS addressed to the Senior Army and Navy Commanders in the Philippines. In addition you are advised that the Japanese are strongly reinforcing their garrison and naval forces in the mandates in a manner which indicates they are preparing this region as quickly as possible against a possible attack on them by U. S. forces. However I am more particularly concerned over increasing opposition of Japanese leaders and by current southward troop movements from Shanghai and Japan to the Formosa area. Preparations are becoming apparent in China, Formosa and Indochina for an early aggressive movement of some character although as yet there are no clear indications as to its strength or whether it will be directed against the Burma Road, Thailand, Malay Peninsula, Netherlands East Indies or the Philippines. Advance against Thailand seems the most probable. I [2506] consider it possible that this next Japanese aggression might cause an outbreak of hostilities between the U. S. and Japan. I desire that after further informing yourself as to the situation and the general outlines of naval and military plans through consultation with Admiral Hart and General MacArthur, you shall, in great confidence, present my views to the President of the Philippine Commonwealth and inform him that as always I am relying upon the full cooperation of his Government and his people. Please impress upon him the desirability of avoiding public pronouncement or action since that might make the situation more difficult.

There is apparently no signature.

The CHAIRMAN. It is 12 o'clock. We will recess until 2 o'clock. (Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, the committee recessed until 2 p. m. of the same day.)

[2507]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Senator FERGUSON. You were examining General Miles. You may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. GEN. SHERMAN MILES (Resumed)

General MILES. Senator, I am happy to report, sir, that Colonel Bratton has called to my mind a circumstance that enables me to state of my own knowledge that shortly after the British were given the means of deciphering the intercepted Japanese messages the Signal Corps, that is to say, the SIS, arranged with the British a simple code by which we could mutually assure ourselves that both got the same messages. If we failed to get one through that code, the British supplied us with that message, and vice versa.

I am also glad to know from Colonel Bratton that he has much more distinct information, specific information, as to the times of arrival and the sending of telephone messages, and so forth, on the evening of the 6th and the morning of the 7th than I was able to give you and no doubt he will be able to give you that information when he comes before you.

Senator FERGUSON. General, you were over Colonel Bratton at that time? He was under you?

[2508] General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You understood the question?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How did you learn about our negotiation with the British in relation to the codes? Who told you about the agreement that had been made in January of 1941?

General MILES. Undoubtedly the Signal Corps told me that, sir. I was in close relation at that time with General Maughborne, the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, who was principally responsible, I think, for that magnificent work of breaking those codes.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do I understand that only because of Colonel Bratton's statement to you that you recall that we were getting messages from Bratton?

General MILES. Senator, the matter was a blank in my mind this morning. I was trying to remember. In a few words he recalled something that I now clearly remember. That very often happens I think, sir, after 4 years.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you examined the book known as exhibit 1?

General MILES. The magic messages?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

[2509] Senator FERGUSON. I note that on page 178 that the message that is coming through is 836.

General MILES. Page 178, sir? Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; page 178. Do you have that?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And that is a message from Tokyo to Washington?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That is about the time that we were delivering the message of the 26th, is it not?

General MILES. That was sent on the same day that we delivered the note of the 26th.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, if you will note, there is no other message from Tokyo to Washington in this book until you get to page 185 and the number of the message is 841. Do you have that?

General MILES. 841; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you know whether or not these numbers were the Japanese numbers or our numbers that are being used on these messages?

General MILES. I understand the number that follows immediately the date is the Japanese number. Our number is to be found at the bottom of the message.

Senator FERGUSON. And apparently they were using consecutive numbers to the messages sent here, is that true? [2510]

General MILES. I imagine that was true; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you know whether or not we intercepted the messages between 836 and 841?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not know that point.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I would like to ask, does counsel know whether we did or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. This is not a complete series. It was not intended to be in this book. There are messages that came in, administrative messages, visa messages, messages about shipping Japs home, and things of that kind that we left out of the compilation. They are available.

Senator FERGUSON. My question to counsel is whether those numbers are available?

Mr. MITCHELL. I assume they are.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you check that?

Mr. MITCHELL. We cannot tell till we look it up.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, would you check that?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. I will just pass this then for the time being.

Mr. MITCHELL. Between those dates?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; between those numbers, 836 to 841.

[2511] Mr. MITCHELL. All right.¹

Senator FERGUSON. We may have to have this witness back.

I wanted to question you now and bring out that these numbers were Japanese numbers and they indicated that they were sending them in consecutive numbers to the embassy here. Is that correct?

General MILES. That is correct to the best of my knowledge, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you will note that if they sent a message to Honolulu it had another number, did it not? I don't think there is any in this particular book. Is that your recollection whether or not it did have another number?

General MILES. I think that is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, getting back to what you knew, and that is what I am interested in, what you knew that General MacArthur knew.

You say that you did not know about the message that I had you read into the record from the President—No—Yes; it is from the President to the High Commissioner of the Philippines.

General MILES. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did you know whether or not when a message was sent like that from Stark through the Navy if the Army would get it in the Philippines?

[2512] General MILES. From an examination of that message which I have seen only today, I would suppose that that would not be turned over to the Army. It was from the President to a definite High Commissioner. The message does, however, say something about Admiral Hart, but I see nothing to indicate that it would be turned over to the Army.

Senator FERGUSON. Here is what it says [reading]:

I desire that after further informing yourself as to the situation in the general outline of naval and military plans through consultation with Admiral Hart and General MacArthur you shall in great confidence present my views to the President of the Philippines.

This message indicated that it was to be taken up with General MacArthur, did it not, before he conferred with the President?

General MILES. It directed the High Commissioner to consult General MacArthur and Admiral Hart before he, the High Commissioner, spoke to the President of the Philippine Government.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, as an intelligence officer, would you draw the conclusion that General MacArthur had seen this instrument?

General MILES. I should think it very likely that the High Commissioner in discussing the—in giving General Mac- [2513] Arthur some reason for his discussing with General MacArthur the Army data that he was told to discuss, would have shown him a copy of that message from the President.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you know whether there was close liaison between the Army and Navy and the Philippines?

General MILES. I have every reason to believe there was a close liaison, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then I show you this instrument, and ask you to read it.

(The document was handed to General Miles.)

The CHAIRMAN. Would you mind identifying that instrument, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. Could we have an exhibit number given to it? Will you show it to counsel?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a typed copy of a message from the commander in chief of the Asiatic Forces to the Chief of Naval Operations, information copy to the commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet, dated December 7, 1941.

The CHAIRMAN. Has that been filed as an exhibit, or is it a part of any exhibit that has been filed?

Mr. GESELL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It was just received through counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. Read it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It reads this way:

[2514] Learn from Singapore we have assured Britain Armed support under three or four eventualities. Have received no corresponding instructions from you.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. From whom to whom?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is from Hart of the Asiatic Fleet to the Chief of Naval Operations in Washington, information copy, it says to the commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the date of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. December 1941. I do not see a date on it.

Senator FERGUSON. December 7. They strike out the number that is not used, and leave the one that is used.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would not know about that. That identifies the message. Do you want it numbered as an exhibit?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Exhibit 40 is used on that document.

(The document referred to was marked exhibit No. 40.)

Senator FERGUSON. Now, will you read it into the record, General?

General MILES. Very well, sir. [Reading exhibit No. 40:]

[2515] Classification: Secret—confidential—restricted.

No indication which one it is.

From: Commander in Chief, Asiatic Fleet.

To: OPNAV.

Information: Commander in Chief, Pacific Fleet.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be from Admiral Hart, would it not? He was the Commander in Chief of the Asiatic Fleet?

General MILES. Yes, sir. "To OPNAV."

Senator FERGUSON. That is to whom?

General MILES. To Admiral Stark.

Senator FERGUSON. Admiral Stark, who was head of the Naval Operations here in Washington?

General MILES. Yes. And for information of Admiral Kimmel of the Pacific Fleet.

Learn from Singapore we have assured Britain armed support under three or four eventualities. Have received no corresponding instructions from you.

And at the bottom is "TOP SECRET."

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did you ever know about that message?

General MILES. To the best of my knowledge and belief this is the first time I ever saw that message, or heard of it.

[2516] Senator FERGUSON. Would it be material to evaluate the evidence as to what was going on? Would that have been material?

General MILES. Yes, sir; it would have been very material. It would have been checked and found to be correct, if we had made such promises to the British.

Senator FERGUSON. I am going to come to that again a little bit later on so that would be an item that was known in the Pacific, and with close liaison between the two, General MacArthur would have known about that?

General MILES. I should think he would, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You assume that he would.

Now, I call to your attention the basic exhibit of dispatches. Has that an exhibit number? Is that exhibit 37?

Mr. GESELL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Exhibit 37, page 39.

By the way, going back to that other exhibit, the 7th in the Philippines is the 6th here, is it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You would assume then that that came in here on the 6th? Is that correct, General?

General MILES. I did not quite hear.

Senator FERGUSON. You would assume it was received here at Washington on the 6th?

[2517] General MILES. It was sent from Manila on the 7th; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And that would be on the 6th here. Have you got page 39 of that exhibit?

General MILES. I have, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read that into the record, sir?

General MILES (reading from exhibit No. 37):

TOP SECRET

2 December 1941

From: OPNAV

Action: CINCAF.

That is from Naval Operations to the commander in chief, Asiatic Fleet.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you interpret those? That is from Admiral Stark to Admiral Hart?

General MILES. From Admiral Stark to Admiral Hart.

PRESIDENT DIRECTS THAT THE FOLLOWING BE DONE AS SOON AS POSSIBLE AND WITHIN TWO DAYS IF POSSIBLE AFTER RECEIPT THIS DISPATCH. CHARTER 3 SMALL VESSELS TO FORM A "DEFENSIVE INFORMATION PATROL". MINIMUM REQUIREMENTS TO ESTABLISH IDENTITY AS U. S. MEN-OF-WAR ARE COMMAND BY A NAVAL OFFICER AND TO MOUNT A SMALL GUN AND 1 MACHINE GUN WOULD SUFFICE. FILIPINO CREWS MAY BE [2518] EMPLOYED WITH MINIMUM NUMBER NAVAL RATINGS TO ACCOMPLISH PURPOSE WHICH IS TO OBSERVE AND REPORT BY RADIO JAPANESE MOVEMENTS IN WEST CHINA SEA AND GULF OF SIAM. 1 VESSEL TO BE STATIONED BETWEEN HAINAN AND HUE ONE VESSEL OFF THE INDO-CHINA COAST BETWEEN CAMRANH BAY AND CAPE ST. JAMES AND ONE VESSEL OFF POINTE DE CAMAU. USE OF ISABEL AUTHORIZED BY PRESIDENT AS ONE OF THE THREE BUT NOT OTHER NAVAL VESSELS. REPORT MEASURES TAKEN TO CARRY OUT PRESIDENT'S VIEWS. AT SAME TIME INFORM ME AS TO WHAT RECONNAISSANCE MEASURES ARE BEING REGULARLY PERFORMED AT SEA BY BOTH ARMY AND NAVY WHETHER BY AIR SURFACE VESSELS OR SUBMARINES AND YOUR OPINION AS TO THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THESE LATTER MEASURES.

Senator FERGUSON. General, did you ever know about that message?

General MILES. To the best of my knowledge and belief, this is the first time I have ever seen that message.

Senator FERGUSON. That indicates that that was sent from Admiral Stark to Admiral Hart under the direction of the President?

General MILES. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. On the 2d of December 1941?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would that message have been of [2519] value to you in the evaluation of your information?

General MILES. It would have informed me that a small reconnaissance patrol was being established as per this dispatch.

Senator FERGUSON. Would not the fact of the source of the instrument be of value to you? Would not that place more value on it than ordinarily?

General MILES. You mean that it came from the President?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. That would have meant to me simply that the President was very definitely interested in the establishment of this naval patrol.

Senator FERGUSON. And that he must have had certain things in mind, and you can read from the instrument what he had in mind, could you not?

General MILES. That he wished the Navy to pick up, if possible, movements of presumably Japanese ships or convoys in the waters mentioned.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, you would assume that that went to General MacArthur, would you not?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I would have supposed that the Army and Navy in Manila, Admiral Hart and General MacArthur were maintaining so close liaison that an important message like that from the President would be communicated [2520] from Admiral Hart to General MacArthur.

Senator FERGUSON. Are you through?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Let us analyze it and see whether or not it would have been of value to you.

The first thing was that they were to have "three small vessels to form a defensive information patrol."

Then it says:

Minimum requirements to establish identity as U. S. Men-of-War.

Now, as an intelligence officer, what would you say that meant?

General MILES. That "minimum requirements" business?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. That was for the protection, undoubtedly, of the personnel, had they been captured by an enemy.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, if they had been captured by the enemy, they could not be treated as spies; is that correct? They would have to be treated as prisoners of war?

General MILES. That is true, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What does that signify to you?

General MILES. That signifies to me only what we knew at the time, that there was a strong possibility of a clash of arms, or an outbreak of war with Japan in some other [2521] form.

Senator FERGUSON. And this was a message directly from the Commander-in-Chief, the President?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I notice that it says "to mount a small gun and one machine gun would suffice." Would that make it a man-of-war?

General MILES. I am not competent to answer that question, Senator. It is purely a naval question.

Senator FERGUSON. You are not familiar with that?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Let us go to the next sentence:

Filipino crews may be employed with minimum number naval ratings to accomplish purpose which is to observe and report by radio—that assumes, does it not, that there would be radio on the small boat?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "Japanese movements in West China Sea and Gulf of Siam."

The next one I better read:

1 vessel to be stationed between Hainan and Hue,— do we have a Navy man here that can put a map up with these places on it?

Commander BAECHE. We have some Navy men here.

[2522] Senator FERGUSON. We have a Navy man here, but could he handle a map?

Is there anyone here that could get us a map and show us where these places are located?

I would like to get them on record.

Commander BAECHE. We could supply that kind of information.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

[2523] Mr. MURPHY. You have already been furnished such a map. It is in your file. It is in the Navy folder.

Senator FERGUSON. Has the Congressman got his map here?

Mr. MURPHY. No.

Senator FERGUSON. I haven't mine here.

Mr. MURPHY. I say you have been furnished it. (A map was put on the easel.)

Senator FERGUSON. Apparently it is not on that map. Will you try to place in the record where this vessel would be if stationed between Hainan and Hue? Do you know where that would be?

General MILES. I know the Island of Hainan but I do not know Hue.

Senator FERGUSON. Would it be from Hainan over to the Philippines or would it be toward the China coast?

General MILES. I cannot say, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

One vessel off the Indo China Coast between Camranh Bay and Cape St. Jacques.

Do you know where that would be?

General MILES. I know Camranh but I don't know Cape S. Jaques.

Senator FERGUSON. Where is Camranh Bay?

General MILES. Camranh Bay, if I remember correctly, is in that bulge of Indochina. Indochina comes out in a distinct [2524] bulge to the eastward and it is right in there. It was the bay that Admiral Roztrvezvsky took refuge in before the battle with Japan, and also Admiral Dewey before the battle of Manila.

Senator FERGUSON. Would it be up in the Gulf of Siam?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I notice it starts out with "Japanese movements in West China Sea and Gulf of Siam".

General MILES. I think Camranh faces on West China Sea.

Senator FERGUSON. Where would the next vessel be? It says, "One vessel off Pointedecamau."

General MILES. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Could these vessels be scouting for transports, or Japanese men-of-war coming for the Philippines? How far would these points be from the Philippines?

General MILES. Well, as I remember, sir, quite some distance. It is very difficult to testify without even a map before you, Senator. They are on the other side of the water, the Chinese side.

Senator FERGUSON. How many hundred miles? Do you have any idea?

General MILES. I should guess six or eight hundred miles. That is a pretty wild guess.

The CHAIRMAN. Don't make it too wild.

[2525] Senator FERGUSON. Now it is said in here that the "use of Isabel"—that would be the name of a ship, would it not?

General MILES. Isabel, as I remember, was a small gunboat.

Senator FERGUSON:

Use of Isabel authorized by President as one of the three but not other naval vessels.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know what was in mind there, that we could use one naval vessel but the other two were not to be naval vessels?

General MILES. I should imagine that we did not want to reduce Admiral Hart's slim forces by more than the detachment of the Isabel.

[2526] Senator FERGUSON. Now the next sentence, "Report measures taken to carry out President's views." Did you ever see a report coming back as to what had been done in relation to this message?

General MILES. I have no recollection of ever having seen such a report, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then going on:

At same time inform me as to what reconnaissance measures are being regularly performed at sea, by both Army and Navy, whether by air, surface vessels or submarines, and your opinion as to the effectiveness of these latter measures.

Did you ever get such a message, as to what reconnaissance was being used at sea, whether by air, by both the Army and Navy? It says:

whether by air, surface vessels or submarines and your opinion as to the effectiveness of these latter measures.

General MILES. I do not remember, Senator, ever having seen any report on the reconnaissance, or types of reconnaissance being conducted by Army and Navy in the Philippines at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Now if you were having close liaison between Admiral Wilkinson and yourself, being the opposite, one in the Army and one in the Navy, how do you account for not getting this original message and not getting the replies, if there were any replies?

[227] General MILES. Senator, I had very close contact with the Office of Naval Intelligence. I had no contact nor was I expected to have any contact with the Office of Naval Operations. I do not ever remember seeing, or being called into any consultation or handling in any way any message to or from Naval Operations. I do not want to appear to—

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to now call attention—

Senator LUCAS. Had you finished, General Miles?

Senator FERGUSON. I thought you had finished, General. Go ahead if you have not.

General MILES. I don't want to appear to avoid any line of questioning, but it might help if I would state frankly now that I did not know, I was not in the group consulted generally, and I think I can say always, as to Naval Operations' messages or deliberations between the Chief of Staff, the Chief of Naval Operations, and the Secretary of State or the President. All of those things were above my level, we will say, if you like to put it that way. I was not called into that group at all.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to show you an affidavit made by General MacArthur.

Would counsel let me have the exhibit—it may not be in an exhibit.

It is the Clausen report, which has an affidavit of [2528] General MacArthur.

Mr. MURPHY. Senator Barkley has it.

The CHAIRMAN. I was just reading it.

Senator FERGUSON. I just want him to read it into the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the one dated—

Senator FERGUSON. Sometime in 1945.

The CHAIRMAN. May 1945.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Will you read that, General, because I want to ask some questions about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Read it, General, so we can all hear it.

General MILES (reading) :

Top Secret. Affidavit of General of the Army Douglas MacArthur.

General of the Army, Douglas MacArthur, presently Supreme Commander, Southwest Pacific Area, being first duly sworn and informed of the investigation by Lieutenant Colonel Henry C. Clausen, JAGD, for the Secretary of War, supplementary to the proceedings of the Army Pearl Harbor Board, and that top secrecy is required, deposes and says :

Immediately before 7 December 1941, I was Commanding General, USAFFE.

The CHAIRMAN. What does that mean?

[2529] General MILES. United States Army Forces, Far East.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

General MILES (reading) :

I have been shown what Colonel Clausen has designated as Top Secret Exhibit "B" consisting of a file of intercepts of Japanese diplomatic messages. I have no recollection of having seen any of these before. I did not see the messages described as the "Winds Code", nor any activating or implementing message. I believe I saw every ultra message that was delivered to the Hq. USAFFE.

I have not previously seen the British SIS messages, dated 27 November 1941 and 3 December 1941. I have no knowledge as to the basis or source of this intelligence, and I did not know that these or similar messages were being transmitted to persons at Honolulu, T. H.

The Signal Intelligence Service, United States Army, operated an intercept station at Fort McKinley, immediately before 7 December 1941. Diplomatic messages in purple code, intercepted by this SIS were delivered to the Navy at Corregidor where they were decrypted and translated. Some or all of these messages decrypted and translated, were delivered to the SIS officer who delivered them to the Hq. USAFFE. The decrypting and translating of these messages was a function of the [2530] Navy. The Army SIS monitored some circuits and turned the material over to the Navy for decryption and translation. The Navy had facilities and personnel, not possessed by the Army, for such processing of this intelligence. Whether all messages were transmitted by the Navy to the Army I do not know. All transmission of this subject material was entirely in the hands of the Navy.

Dispatches from the War Department gave me ample and complete information and advice for the purpose of alerting the Army Command in the Philippines on a war basis, which was done prior to 7 December 1941.

/s/ DOUGLAS MACARTHUR.

Sworn to 7th May 1945.

HENRY C. CLAUSEN,
Lieutenant Colonel.

Senator LUCAS. What page of the report is that on?

Mr. MURPHY. 186.

General MILES. 188. No. 186.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know how General MacArthur spells his last name?

General MILES. I thought it was "M-a-c".

Senator FERGUSON. That is the way it is signed, is it not?

[2531] General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, at the top how is it spelled?

General MILES. "M-c".

Senator FERGUSON. "M-c". Well, at least that would indicate that no one in MacArthur's headquarters prepared that affidavit, wouldn't it?

General MILES. That was prepared, undoubtedly, by Colonel Clausen.

Senator FERGUSON. Who didn't know how to spell MacArthur's name?

General MILES. I would say that was it.

Senator FERGUSON. Let's take up some things in that exhibit.

I have been shown what Colonel Clausen has designated as Top Secret Exhibit "B" consisting of a file of intercepts of Japanese diplomatic messages.

Do you know what they are?

I would like to have you keep that affidavit.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know what that was?

General MILES. It was a collection of the magic messages, as I remember it, which was called "Exhibit B."

[2532] Senator FERGUSON. Was it all of the messages now in exhibit 1?

General MILES. That I cannot say, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What is an "ultra" message?

General MILES. What is a what message?

Senator FERGUSON. "Ultra"?

General MILES. Ultra is the same thing as—it is another word for "magic" or "top secret" as applied to these intercepted messages.

Senator FERGUSON. In that paragraph, the last line is:

I believe I saw every ultra message that was delivered to the headquarters U. S. A. F. F. E.

What would that mean to you?

General MILES. That would mean, sir, he saw all of these Japanese intercepts decoded by Navy which were turned over to his headquarters.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, have you any knowledge as to how many were turned over to his headquarters?

General MILES. No, sir; I have not.

Senator FERGUSON. But it would indicate that he had certain things turned over to him from the so-called magic messages; is that right?

General MILES. It would.

[2533] Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you know whether the same thing was turned over to General Short at Hawaii?

General MILES. To the best of my knowledge and belief there was no decrypting and decoding units set up in Hawaii by either Army or Navy.

Senator FERGUSON. Then we take this to be true, that if General MacArthur was getting the purple or ultra code messages, the magic, in the Philippines, and General Short was not getting them on the Hawaiian Islands, at Pearl Harbor, they were getting different information?

General MILES. Yes, sir. That is true. It would also apply to General Andrews in Panama and General DeWitt on the west coast.

Senator FERGUSON. We come to the next sentence:

I have not previously seen the British S. I. S. message dated 27 November 1941, and 3 December 1941.

What is that?

General MILES. I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. You haven't any idea?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you give me any idea who would know, so we can ask counsel to get it?

Mr. GESELL. If I may interpose, Senator, those are exhibits in the Clausen report.

[2534] Senator FERGUSON. Will counsel later on point those out to me?

Mr. GESELL. Certainly.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you do it now?

Mr. GESELL. I thought you said later on. I will have to get it.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to have it now because it may be material.

Mr. GESELL. It is in the exhibits, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. What exhibit is that?

Mr. GESELL. Well, the Clausen report has 12 exhibits, 12 bound volumes of exhibits, which are not here before the committee now. This is only the report itself, that General Miles has in his hands.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the next sentence:

I have no knowledge as to the basis or source of this intelligence, and I did not know that these or similar messages were being transmitted to persons in Honolulu T. H.

Do you know why such a question would be asked of General MacArthur?

General MILES. No, sir; I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. Coming down to the next sentence:

The Signal Intelligence Service—is that your service?

[2535] That is SIS?

General MILES. That is SIS.

Senator FERGUSON. Transmitters and receivers of the messages.

General MILES. And decoded and decrypted in Washington.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

United States Army, operated an intercept station at Fort McKinley, immediately before the 7 December 1941.

The next one—Do you know when that station was opened?

General MILES. No; I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, was that station used to collect intelligence for you?

General MILES. It was used to collect intelligence for the Signal Intelligence Service which later on transmitted it.

Senator FERGUSON. To you?

General MILES. To me, when decoded and decrypted. It had nothing to do with my department until it came to me in plain English.

Senator FERGUSON. Wouldn't the source of material be material to you in evaluating material?

General MILES. No, sir; whether a message was picked up in Manila or in the State of Washington out of the air [2536] would have had no particular significance to me.

Senator FERGUSON. That wouldn't have been of any value to you at all?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Just to give you an example, one of those small radio boats that was put out, as we find at least was ordered out, suppose that kind of a short-wave message had been transmitted and it had only a certain radius and would be picked up at the Philippines. Wouldn't that be an indication as to its value, where it was coming from, rather than coming out over a long-range radio?

General MILES. Well, I imagine that there would be some indication if it were picked up in the Philippines and not picked up on the west coast that it emanated from some station not powerful enough to cross the Atlantic, but the message itself when translated into English by the S. I. S. would have been the significant thing to me.

Senator FERGUSON. Wouldn't also the place where it was sent out and its radius have something to do with its purpose, its value, in other words?

General MILES. I can't imagine a situation in which the station, the location of the station that intercepted a message coming over the air, would have been of any particular value in analyzing that message from the point of view [2537] of military intelligence.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the next :

Diplomatic messages in purple code,— and I assume, and is it correctly assumed, that all in exhibit 1 are purple-code messages, or is that not a correct assumption?

General MILES. That is my impression, but I am not sure of it. That is a technical question for the SIS.

Senator FERGUSON. Well now the code used to send the most important messages from Japan was the purple code; is that correct?

General MILES. I believe that is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, those messages, and they would be diplomatic messages would they?

General MILES. I believe that is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would they be military and naval messages also?

General MILES. I imagine they would be in certain circumstances, but I do not know these different codes.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, those picked up by the Army, it appears, were delivered to the Navy at Corregidor where they were decrypted and translated. Some or all were delivered to the SIS officer who delivered them to headquarters. USAFFE. It would indicate that the Army headquarters was getting the purple messages; is that correct?

[2538] General MILES. That is the inference from this statement; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading) :

The decrypting and translating of these messages was a function of the Navy. The Army monitored some circuits and turned the material over to the Navy for decryption and translation. The Navy had facilities and personnel, not possessed by the Army, for such processing of this intelligence. Whether all messages were transmitted by the Navy to the Army I do not know.

I want to ask you there whether or not there was any system in the Intelligence Office or in the SIS office where a person could later ascertain what message had been sent from one agency, the Army or the Navy to the other. Had you any system that you could check whether a message had been sent or not sent?

General MILES. Here in Washington we did have a system. I am not acquainted with all the details, but I do know that Colonel Bratton is prepared to testify on that subject.

Senator FERGUSON. Where would G-2 be in this picture over the Philippines? It would be in the headquarters USAFFE, would it not?

General MILES. I presume so, but that was a matter for decision of General MacArthur. It was his G-2 and not mine.

[2539] Senator FERGUSON. Now, wasn't all of G-2 together, weren't you over all G-2 whether in the field or in Washington?

General MILES. No, sir. I have testified that the G-2's of the overseas departments were staff officers of their commanding generals, selected by them and directly under them.

Senator FERGUSON. Then do I understand that the intelligence in the field was not your concern, but the concern of the commanding officer?

General MILES. It was my concern so far as giving information to the field, and giving information to the Chief of Staff from the field, but I did not directly control the G-2's of the overseas departments, staff officers of the commanding generals thereof.

Senator FERGUSON. Did they inform you as to what they had?

General MILES. They sent us a great deal of information which they got from various sources. I have no recollection of any information coming from the G-2 of the Philippine Department regarding magic.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I come down to the message again in exhibit 37 on page 39.

General MILES. Thirty-nine?

[2540] Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. It is not in there. That is not in the Clausen report. You are not referring to the Clausen report?

Senator FERGUSON. No.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is what he had in his hand.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I neglected to ask you one or two questions on that Clausen report.

Dispatches from the War Department gave me ample and complete information and advice for the purpose of alerting the Army command in the Philippines on a war basis, which was done prior to the 7th of December 1941.

Do you know what messages, what dispatches he was talking about there?

General MILES. I presume, sir, he was talking about General Marshall's dispatch to the overseas department commanders on the 27th of November.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, that would have to be taken into account in evaluating with everything else, that MacArthur knew all the other purple messages he had, and all his own Intelligence had; isn't that correct?

General MILES. Yes, sir; but it was a message from the Chief of Staff of the Army which gave him a definite [2541] warning, directed him, as I remember it, to do certain things.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, coming back to certain things, one of them was reconnaissance, was it not?

General MILES. I haven't got the message to General MacArthur before me, but that is my impression.

Senator FERGUSON. He was to use reconnaissance. Will you look at it? I think you will find it at page 9.

General MILES. I have found it.

Senator FERGUSON. It says:

* * * Take such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary. Report measures taken. Should hostilities occur you will carry out the tasks assigned in revised rainbow five which was delivered to you by General Brereton. Chief of Naval Operations concurs and requests you notify Hart.

So, there was reconnaissance mentioned in that message; is that true?

General MILES. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. We go back to the message on page 39 of exhibit 37. This is on the 2d of November 1941.

General MILES. Second of December.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

It says:

[2542] Report measures taken to carry out President's views. At the same time inform me as to what reconnaissance measures are being regularly performed at sea by both Army and Navy, whether by air, surface vessels, or submarine and your opinion as to the effectiveness of these latter measures.

That indicates that the President is anxious to know exactly what reconnaissance is being taken at the Philippines; is that true?

General MILES. I would assume so, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, was any such message sent to Admiral Kimmel or General Short?

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Wasn't the message of December 2 directed to all those sea areas that you couldn't find on the map and which were far distant from the Philippines? Not only to the Philippines, but up and down the coast down to Indochina?

Senator FERGUSON. What did we have at the places mentioned by the Congressman?

General MILES. What do we have there?

Senator FERGUSON. He mentioned other places.

Mr. MURPHY. Talking about the sea.

General MILES. You mean Camranh and Hainan Islands?

[2543] Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. I don't think we had anything there.

Senator FERGUSON. So it couldn't be sent there? This message couldn't be sent to any of those places?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Where was Admiral Hart at the time?

General MILES. Where was Admiral Hart?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. On the 2d of December 1941?

General MILES. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you account at all for the fact that you didn't get this information that was sent out on the 2d of December 1941, on page 39 of exhibit 37?

General MILES. Yes, sir. I think I have already accounted for it by my statement that I was not in that channel of command or concentration, whatever you would like to call it. I don't remember ever having been consulted or informed of, directly, any naval operation message or any Presidential message.

Senator FERGUSON. I find among your evaluations, on December 1, that you gave an evaluation of this whole situation, the Far East, on December 1, 1941. You recall that, or is it December 5? It is a supplemental brief periodic [2544] estimate of the situation on December 1, 1941, to March 4, 1942.

General MILES. Yes, sir. I have that before me.

Senator FERGUSON. Numbers 27 and 28 in exhibit 33?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How could you evaluate the intelligence without being in this circle you talk about and not know what was going on there? For instance, not getting the reply back as to the air reconnaissance at the Philippines?

General MILES. I had to depend on other sources of information, perhaps not so good in many cases. That was why I particularly, supported by my naval colleague, naval intelligence, was trying to integrate our activities and those of the joint Army-Navy Board.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you know why specific reconnaissance, such as these three small men-of-war was being taken at the Philippines, and not taken—similar action was not being taken at Hawaii?

General MILES. I do not know but I would suppose that the action taken from the Philippines was directed primarily to the observation of the Japanese shipping of various sorts, military and commercial down the China seas. No such movement was obtainable or going on at the time in the vicinity [2545] of the Hawaiian Islands.

Senator FERGUSON. In your opinion was not the Vacant Sea and the space north of Hawaii just as important an area as the one over along the China coast and the Gulf of Siam? Talking about your opinion now, as an expert.

General MILES. Yes, sir; I think it was, but it was a great deal harder to cover.

Senator FERGUSON. You were not consulted as to what should take place in those areas? That was above your range?

General MILES. About the reconnaissance in the China Sea?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. I was not.

Senator FERGUSON. I mean the one in the Vacant Sea, you were not consulted as to what reconnaissance should be taken?

General MILES. I know nothing of any reconnaissance in the Vacant Sea.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I want to go to the Hewitt testimony. It is in the Hewitt testimony.

Mr. MURPHY. What page, and volume? There are three volumes.

Senator FERGUSON. Page 88-C.

Corregidor had liaison with the British unit at [2546] Singapore, and everything of interest or importance received from Singapore was forwarded to Washington.

Did you know that fact, that it first went to Corregidor and then later came here?

General MILES. From what source, sir? From the British?

Senator FERGUSON. Well, it says:

Corregidor also had liaison with the British unit at Singapore and everything of interest or importance received from Singapore was forwarded to Washington—

General MILES. Well, we had a Colonel Brink—

Senator FERGUSON (continuing):

In like manner, any translation of particular importance to the commander in Chief, Asiatic Fleet was sent out from Washington.

In other words, Admiral Hart had two means of getting his information, one was from Washington, the other from Singapore, Corregidor to Hart. As I understand it, Kimmel had one means and that was Washington to Kimmel. Is that correct?

General MILES. Senator, I am not prepared to testify nor am I competent to testify on these naval-communications arrangements.

Senator FERGUSON. What I am trying to find out, General, is how much knowledge you had, you being the top and the [2547] head of our Intelligence Branch in the Army—

General MILES. Yes, but—

Senator FERGUSON. We had no source higher than you in the Army, had we, for Intelligence?

General MILES. I was the Assistant Chief of Staff for Intelligence, the War Department.

[2548] Senator FERGUSON. The highest man in the Intelligence.

General MILES. In the Army?

Senator FERGUSON. In the Army.

Now, the function of the Army was to defend the Fleet at Pearl Harbor, wasn't it?

General MILES. Defend that naval base at Pearl Harbor and the Fleet would have occupied the naval base, yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And the purpose of Intelligence is to anticipate what an enemy or prospective enemy is going to do; that is its very purpose?

General MILES. That is our ultimate, ideal purpose.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, would anyone else have knowledge in a higher position than you, that could give us what knowledge was known by the Intelligence branch of the Army? Is there anybody above you in the Intelligence branch? It went from you to General Marshall?

General MILES. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you understand that there were consultations between people in a higher level on this Intelligence?

General MILES. There may have been. There were certainly consultations on a higher level than I occupied.

Senator FERGUSON. It involved evaluations of Intelligence?

Senator LUCAS. Let the General finish his answers.

[2549] Senator FERGUSON. I mean to. Any time you haven't finished your answer, just say so.

Senator LUCAS. Counsel continues to break in about the time the General has his mouth open.

General MILES. May I have the question again?

(The question was read by the reporter.)

General MILES. I imagine it did. Certainly action was taken on the information that Intelligence supplied.

Senator FERGUSON. Did this higher level have certain intelligence that you did not have? For instance, I take it the reply to the instrument on page 39 of exhibit 37, which was the reconnaissance being taken at the Philippines, and the effectiveness of the measures.

General MILES. Yes, sir. I never saw the answer to that request.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, if those answers came back this higher level that you are speaking about would have different facts to evaluate than you had?

General MILES. That is true, sir. It was true not only of information coming from the Philippines but information here in Washington. I did not know, never did know, what the Secretary of State or the President was saying to the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did you examine all the diplomatic [2550] messages so that you would have and know what this higher level knew? These diplomatic messages that we were intercepting?

General MILES. I examined all the intercepted messages that were sent to me. In other words, all of the important messages that we intercepted from the Japanese. I knew a good deal of what was going on in this diplomatic conference. I knew also from my liaison with the State Department additional information about that diplomatic conference. I knew there was a great deal of information in the higher level that I did not get.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, did you know what messages we were sending out in our diplomatic relations with the Far East?

General MILES. Generally speaking not. Only if they were given to my liaison officers in the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. I ask you how you could evaluate the Japanese messages in reply and the memorandums sent by the Japs if you didn't know what they were replying to and what the original message was. How can you possibly evaluate?

General MILES. Well, generally I knew the important messages. I certainly knew the substance of our note of November 26.

Senator FERGUSON. Doesn't it take knowledge of more than the substance of that note to realize its significance?

[2551] General MILES. Well, I think I also knew, I am pretty sure I also knew, from my liaison officer in the State Department, what certain officials of the State Department thought of the chances of acceptance of that note.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, when you were giving your testimony on page 113, question No. 82 on page 112—

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Pages 112 and 113 of what?

Senator FERGUSON. Secret, No. 2, Army Pearl Harbor Board, testimony of General Miles. [Reading:]

General, when in your opinion did it become apparent that war with Japan was inevitable?

This is your reply:

General MILES. On the 27th of November when we learned that we had practically given what might have been considered and probably would be considered by them an ultimatum to them. From then on I considered war as very probable if not inevitable.

General MILES. Senator, that testimony should be changed to "if not ultimately inevitable."

Senator FERGUSON. That is a correction there?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "If not ultimately inevitable."

General MILES. May I also call your attention to the succeeding page, and I would like to read my statement there.

[2552] Senator FERGUSON. I wish you would read the one that I read the way it should be read.

General MILES (reading).

General MILES.—

Senator FERGUSON. There are no corrections here, but as I understand it at the end you made many corrections?

General MILES. I made quite a few corrections, largely typographical errors.

Senator FERGUSON. So that accounts for this mistake here?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. On the page it is just as I read it, is it not?

General MILES. On page 113 it reads:

On the 27th of November when I learned we had practically given what might be considered or probably would be considered by them an ultimatum, from then I considered war as very probable if not ultimately inevitable.

Then I wasn't satisfied with that answer and you will find on page 114 of the same testimony:

I should like, if I may, to add a little bit. I am not quite sure of my answer regarding inevitable war. I do not want to give the impression that I thought on November 27—

Senator FERGUSON. Wait, General. That isn't the way [2553] it is written here.

General MILES. I know. It is corrected here.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read it first how it is on the page and then tell me how it was corrected later.

Let me clear something up.

[2554] Do I understand that you were given your testimony by the Army Board so that you could make corrections some time later?

General MILES. I was given my testimony by the Army Board almost immediately on my return from Boston, at my appearance down here before the Army Board. Whatever corrections were made I made in my own handwriting in ink and forwarded it by covering letter to General Grunert, and I understand those corrections were accepted.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, is this true, then, that what I read was the way you gave it first and then you corrected it some days later?

General MILES. It was the way the stenographer took it down, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I mean.

General MILES. I am not at all sure it was the way I gave it.

Senator FERGUSON. Very well.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. You may proceed now, General, with your original answer.

Senator FERGUSON. I want you to read first the way the stenographer had it in the record and then the way you corrected it.

General MILES. You wish me to do that, sir?

[2555] Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I want to see the correction.

General MILES. Very well. [Reading:]

I should like, if I may, to add a little bit. I am not quite sure of my answer there.

Correction. Crossing out the word "there" and amaking it much more understandable, my answer regarding inevitable war. I continue. [Reading:]

I did not want to give.

I corrected it to say:

I do not want to give the impression that I thought on November 27th war was immediately inevitable. I thought that very definitely—

Senator FERGUSON. Just a moment. That is not the way it is in my sheet.

General MILES. Well, I am noting each correction that I made, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, will you first read it the way it is?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. You may proceed to read it, General, and the Senator can follow and try to get the differences as they appear.

General MILES. All the corrections are in red pencil, sir, and I am reading the English as it was sent to me by the Board.

[2556] Senator FERGUSON. Just a moment. Do I understand then the Chair will not permit the witness to answer the question?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The Chair is holding that the witness, in the Chair's opinion, is trying his best to answer the question.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, is the question clear? I would like to have it read.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. If the witness has a different text from what the Senator has, why, the witness will have to be supplied with the text the Senator has.

Senator FERGUSON. I give you the text that I have and ask you to read it the way the stenographer has transcribed it and then give us the way you corrected it.

General MILES (reading):

General MILES. I should like, if I may, to add a little bit. I am not quite sure of my answer there. I did not want to give the impression that I thought war was immediately inevitable. I thought that very definitely an action by Japan, a pretty radical action, would be taken almost at once; that that, necessarily, would be an overt and open attack on the United States. I did not feel at all sure that war with Japan was practically inevitable at any time—note the contradiction, please, in those two sentences—

but there were [2557] a good many things Japan could have done if she did break those negotiations short of open war with the United States and we were considering all of these matters.

My corrected statement is as follows:

General MILES. I should like, if I may, to add a little bit. I am not quite sure of my answer regarding inevitable war. I do not want to give the impression that I thought on November 27th that war was immediately inevitable. I thought that very definitely some action by Japan, a pretty radical action, would be taken almost at once but that need not necessarily be an overt and open attack on the United States. I did not feel at all sure that war with Japan was immediately inevitable at any time. There were a good many things Japan could have done if she broke her negotiations in Washington short of open war with the United States, and we were considering all of those possibilities.

Senator, you will please notice that in your version there is a direct contradiction between two sentences. I picked that up immediately and corrected it.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, from the information that you had did you ever come to the conclusion prior to the attack—I am talking about any time prior to the at- [2558] tack, prior to notice to you of the attack, prior to that time that war was inevitable with Japan?

General MILES. No, sir. "Inevitable" precludes any other alternative as I understand the word and in that sense I never regarded war as inevitable until I knew that war was on.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, getting back just for a moment where we were before, on the information known by the higher levels.

I want to call your attention to another instrument given to me this morning, dated November 27, 1941.

Does counsel have another copy he could give the witness?

Mr. MITCHELL. What is it?

Senator FERGUSON. It was given to me by counsel this morning, I would like to have the record show.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, here is a copy for the witness.

Senator FERGUSON. This is a memorandum of November 27, 1941, "stamped notation: November 28, 1941 Noted—Chief of Staff (WBS—handwritten)."

Do you see what I am reading from?

General MILES. I think it is William Bedell Smith, but I am not sure, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What was his position with the Army [2559] at that time, on the 27th of November 1941?

General MILES. He was Secretary of the General Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. Then it is: "Noted—Deputy Chief of Staff (WBS—handwritten)." What is that?

General MILES. I think that is the same, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So he signed it for General Marshall and signed it for himself as Deputy Chief of Staff, is that correct? He signed it in two capacities?

General MILES. He did not sign for himself at all that I can see, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, "Deputy Chief of Staff." Who is Deputy Chief of Staff?

General MILES. General Bryden, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Right under that is "WBS—handwritten." What is that?

General MILES. I think, sir, that is the initials of General Bedell Smith.

Senator FERGUSON. Then he signed for himself and signed for General Bryden, is that correct—or signed for General Marshall?

General MILES. For General Marshall and General Bryden.

Senator FERGUSON. For General Marshall and General Bryden, is that correct?

[2560] General MILES. That is apparently correct, sir.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. Is that something that you have a copy of?

Senator FERGUSON. You have received it this morning.

Mr. GESELL. We delivered it this morning in anticipation of General Gerow's testimony.

Mr. MURPHY. All right.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff.

That is General Marshall, is it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

Subject: Far Eastern Situation.

1. The Secretary of War sent for me about 9:30 A. M., November 27, 1941. General Bryden was present.

This is signed by L. T. Gerow, Brigadier General, Acting Assistant Chief of Staff. He was in War Plans, was he not?

General MILES. Yes, sir. He was Chief of War Plans.

Senator FERGUSON. He was Chief of War Plans. The Secretary of War was Mr. Stimson at the time, was he not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

[2561] General Bryden was present.

Now, you say he was Deputy Chief of Staff?

General MILES. General Bryden was Deputy Chief of Staff; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading).

The Secretary wanted to know what warning messages have been sent to General MacArthur and what were proposed. I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November 24.

What is that instrument? I will not try to identify it. You identify it. [Reading from the letter:]

I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November 24.

What is that message?

General MILES. I presume it is the message on page 5 of this exhibit 32, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Is the Senator satisfied on that identification or can counsel help?

Mr. GESELL. You will note, Senator, that that message, while a Navy message, says: "Addressees to inform senior Army officers their areas" in the body of the text, making it a joint message and it bears the date November 24, 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, we have identified that. Going on with the letter (reading):

[2562] I then showed him a copy of the draft message you discussed at the Joint Board meeting.

What is that, General?

General MILES. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever see it?

General MILES. I cannot identify it, Senator. I was not at that meeting.

Senator FERGUSON. And now, reading it, you cannot identify it?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, continuing reading:

He—

meaning the Secretary of War—

He told me he had telephoned both Mr. Hull and the President this morning. Mr. Hull stated the conversations had been terminated with the barest possibility of resumption. I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

Mr. GESELL. You left out a sentence, didn't you, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. I beg your pardon. Yes; I left out a sentence. [Reading:]

The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines.

I will read that over so the record will be straight. [2563] Strike the other out. [Reading:]

Mr. Hull stated the conversations had been terminated with the barest possibility of resumption. The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines. I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

Did you ever have that knowledge?

General MILES. Did I have what?

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have that knowledge that the President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines?

General MILES. I did not, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you consulted in relation to that at all, to give them what intelligence you had; what information you had?

General MILES. I have no recollection of any such consultation, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then it goes on:

Later in the morning, I attended a conference with the Secretary of War, Secretary of Navy, and Admiral Stark. The various messages to the Army and Navy Commanders and, to Mr. Sayre were discussed.

Who was Mr. Sayre at the time?

[2564] General MILES. He was the High Commissioner in the Philippines, I believe, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, would that indicate that what they were discussing was this instrument which you read right before the noon recess, the one from the President to the High Commissioner of the Philippines?

General MILES. It would so indicate, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON (reading).

A joint message for General MacArthur and Admiral Hart was approved (copy attached).

May I ask, counsel, if there was a copy attached to this when we received it, having that joint message?

Mr. GESELL. Yes; I think that is the joint message printed in Exhibit 32, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. On what page?

Mr. MURPHY. Page 5.

Mr. GESELL. No; not page 5. The one of November 27 to MacArthur, which is a joint message, telling him to inform Hart.

Senator FERGUSON. So we get the right page. Page 9, is it not?

Mr. GESELL. Yes; I believe so.

Senator FERGUSON. So it is joint between MacArthur and Hart?

[2565] Mr. GESELL. The last two words are, "Notify Hart."

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. That makes it joint with MacArthur and Hart?

Mr. GESELL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you familiar with that message?

General MILES. I was not, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, that message was signed by General Marshall. Do you see that on the bottom of it?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you were not consulted prior to the 7th about that message?

General MILES. I was not, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have knowledge of it prior to the 7th?

General MILES. I did, sir. I had knowledge of the substance of the warning messages which were sent out to all of the overseas departments and the west coast.

Senator FERGUSON. But you had not seen the messages; you just had their substance?

General MILES. So far as I can remember, I did not, as I stated in my memorandum of January 30 of the following year, 1942, remember seeing an actual text of the message.

Senator FERGUSON. But did you know that on the 27th of November that General Marshall was not in Washington?

[2566] General MILES. I probably did at the time. I remember very well that he was not in Washington on the 28th.

Senator FERGUSON. Is it just the opposite, that he returned on the 28th and that he was not here on the 27th? Does that refresh your memory?

General MILES. I think not, sir, because he was not here when we were discussing the Arnold antisabotage messages on the 28th. That was the reason that General Bryden presided at the conference.

Senator FERGUSON (reading on):

The Secretaries—

I take it that means the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy—were informed of the proposed memorandum you and Admiral Stark directed be prepared for the President.

Now, what memorandum are they referring to there?

General MILES. I have seen recently a copy of a memorandum that I think that refers to.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I show you exhibit 17. Do you have it?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, does that refresh your memory?

General MILES. Exhibit 17 is apparently the memorandum referred to in General Gerow's memorandum of the 27th.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever seen it?

[2567] General MILES. I have no recollection of having seen it at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not certain recommendations were made in it?

General MILES. Yes, sir; three recommendations appear at the bottom of it.

Senator FERGUSON. What are the recommendations made?

General MILES. Do you wish me to read it, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES (reading):

It is recommended that:

prior to the completion of the Philippine reinforcement, military counteraction be considered only if Japan attacks or directly threatens United States, British, or Dutch territory as above outlined;

in case of a Japanese advance into Thailand, Japan be warned by the United States, the British, and the Dutch governments that advance beyond the lines indicated may lead to war; prior to such warning no joint military opposition be undertaken; steps be taken at once to consummate agreements with the British and Dutch for the issuance of such warning.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you first get knowledge of that paper, of those facts? [2568]

General MILES. To the best of my belief, Senator, I got knowledge of this particular paper about a week or ten days ago.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, reading on from the memorandum:

The Secretary of War wanted to be sure that the memorandum would not be construed as a recommendation to the President that he request Japan to reopen the conversations.

Do you know anything about that statement?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do I understand that General Marshall and Admiral Stark were to prepare a memorandum to the President? That is what is indicated immediately above, is it not?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And that is the instrument that you read from?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

The Secretary of War wanted to be sure that the memorandum would not be construed as a recommendation to the President that he request Japan to reopen the conversations.

[2569] Would you say that that was an indication that the Secretary of War was telling General Marshall and Admiral Stark what they should put in their recommendations or what they should put in their memorandum?

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, will the Senator yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. May I inquire whose message is this that the General is testifying from?

Senator FERGUSON. It is L. T. Gerow's. I am trying to get him to interpret it as an Intelligence officer and also as to what knowledge he had.

Senator LUCAS. If course, I am not going to make any objection but it does seem to me that General Gerow is about the only individual who can give the committee any real information as to what he had in mind when he gave out that statement. It is my understanding that General Gerow is to come on the stand and testify as to all of these matters.

General Miles here has practically told us nothing. He has assumed and supposed, and so on, and so forth. He does not know much about it and it does seem to me we are wasting a lot of time, but maybe we are not.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, as far as this Senator is concerned we are not. I am trying to find out—

[2570] Senator LUCAS. I knew that, of course.

Senator FERGUSON. I am trying to find out exactly what this man knew, and what those above him knew, and what those below him knew, and if it is going to take some time, considering that the other time that has been taken I do not consider that I have wasted this time and I would like to continue asking these questions.

Senator LUCAS. No; the only thing I say, if I may reply to the Senator, it is pretty well understood as to how this matter was to come on, and it does seem to me that we are adding a lot of confusion to what was presumed to be an orderly prepared case, and now counsel will have to go over this thing tomorrow, the same thing over and over again, when General Gerow gets here.

Senator FERGUSON. General Gerow cannot say what this man knew.

Senator LUCAS. General Miles doesn't know anything about Gerow's language and its interpretation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would assume, and I suppose the committee would assume, that in a message sent by General Gerow to anybody, if there is any difference in the interpretation of that message as between General Miles and General Gerow, as between General Miles, who did not send it, and General Gerow, who did, the committee would consider whether General Gerow's interpretation was entitled to greater force [2571] and weight than General Miles'. I suppose that is a matter that the committee may have to decide.

Senator LUCAS. Then I would like to inquire how many officers we can bring here from the Intelligence Service to interpret messages sent out by General Gerow and everybody else? There will be no end to this if we follow that procedure.

Senator FERGUSON. I now ask the question, Did you ever know that the Secretary of War had spoken to General Marshall and Admiral Stark, or either of them, about what should be in their memorandum that went to the President, and as to whether or not they wanted to make sure, to be sure that the memorandum would not be construed as a recommendation to the President that he request Japan to reopen the conversations?

General MILES. I did not, Senator, and I repeat, sir, that I was not called in in consultation in any way that I can remember between the Chief of Staff and the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of War and the President, or the Chief of Staff and the President in reference to this paper or any other paper. I was simply not a part of that hierarchy that handled those matters.

[2572] Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any knowledge about the paragraph:

After consultation with each other, United States, British, and Dutch military authorities in the Far East agreed that joint military counteraction against Japan should be undertaken only in case Japan attacks or directly threatens the territory or mandated territory of the United States, the British Commonwealth, or the Netherlands East Indies, or should the Japanese move forces into Thailand west of 100° East or South of 10° North, Portuguese Timor, New Caledonia or the Loyalty Islands?

General MILES. I have a distinct recollection, Senator, that I did know of the existence of certain negotiations or discussions going on at that time about a line beyond which certain powers would agree that the Japanese might not go without incurring war.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you get that information? Pardon me. Are you through?

General MILES. Yes, sir; I am through.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you get that information?

General MILES. I cannot say exactly when. It was during this period of late November, or the latter half of November or early in December.

[2573] Senator FERGUSON. Do you know that there was a message given to the Jap Ambassador on August 17, 1941? That is in volume II of Foreign Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. Has somebody got volume II?

Senator FERGUSON. I will get it later. I will pass that for the time being. Did you know of any message to the Japs by the President in August of 1941 in relation to their movement south?

General MILES. I cannot now recall any such message, sir. I might have, but I do not remember.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, I read you what was in this memo of the 27th from General Marshall and Admiral Stark about the line, and you said you knew about that.

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you get that information from General Marshall?

General MILES. I do not think I did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you know where you obtained it?

General MILES. I believe I obtained it verbally from General Gerow.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate it was part of our war plan, would it not?

General MILES. Oh, no, sir; not a written war plan.

Senator FERGUSON. Did we have a war plan on that?

[2574] General MILES. None that I know of, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you use that fact in evaluating your material?

General MILES. The fact that there was a discussion about such a line?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. I presume I did, sir, but I would give it very little evaluation, knowing that no such definite agreement had been made or transmitted to the Japanese.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you mean that last part of your answer? You would not expect us to transmit that to the Japanese in that particular language, would you?

General MILES. That is what the suggestion in this paper implies, sir. The United States, British, and Dutch Governments indicated that an advance beyond that line may lead to war, that Japan was warned by the United States, British, and Dutch Governments that an advance beyond that line that was indicated may lead to war.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether that warning was ever given?

General MILES. Not to my knowledge, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any conversations with the Secretary of War during this period that you were evaluating this evidence?

[2575] General MILES. I do not remember any specific conversation, sir. I saw the Secretary not infrequently.

Senator FERGUSON. Your best knowledge now is you got this information about the ABCD agreement from General Gerow?

General MILES. The ABC and D agreement No. 1, as I remember it, was the result of a Joint Staff conference with the British in the preceding winter. Are you speaking of that, Senator, or this line?

Senator FERGUSON. Did that involve the line; the one in the winter?

General MILES. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. They are two different things, are they not?

General MILES. They are two separate things; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now the first agreement you say was agreed upon in the winter. What was that? What knowledge do you have on that?

General MILES. I sat as a conferee in that conference. I had pretty complete knowledge of that.

Senator FERGUSON. You had direct knowledge of that?

General MILES. I did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What was that agreement?

General MILES. That was an agreement contingent on the United States being drawn into the war, of certain basic concepts [2576] or policies that would be followed by the United States and Great Britain.

Senator FERGUSON. That was in April of 1941, was it not?

General MILES. As I remember, that conference took place in, I would say, February or March, or it may have been March or April of 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. And where did it take place?

General MILES. Here in Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. Attended by the British, Canadians, and the Dutch?

General MILES. No, sir; by the British and Americans.

Senator FERGUSON. Just the British and Americans?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now was this line fixed at that time?

General MILES. No, sir; I have no recollection of any such line being discussed at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you first get information on a line?

General MILES. As nearly as I can fix it, sir, sometime about the middle or latter part of November, perhaps even as late as the first days of December 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. Now will you tell us, as nearly as you can, what that information was about the line?

General MILES. That there were discussions then in hand [2577] between representatives of our Government, the British, and Dutch, fixing a line by latitude and longitude beyond which Japanese penetration would not be permitted, except at the cost of war.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that, to your knowledge, the line in the part that I read? Have you got it there?

General MILES. I think this is the same line, sir. But I, of course, am not familiar with this particular paper or memorandum to the President of November 27.

Senator FERGUSON. I wish you would look on page 203, October 2, 1944, transcript of the Army Pearl Harbor Board, General Marshall's testimony, and see whether or not this same line was not discussed by you when you were in conference with the British?

General MILES. I haven't got the testimony before me, sir, and I have never seen it.

Senator FERGUSON. Pass it to him.

(The document was handed to General Miles.)

General MILES. Page 204, did you say, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Page 203, at the bottom of the page. You will have to read it up in the other part to identify it.

General MILES. I think that General Marshall is referring here to a conference held in Singapore.

Senator FERGUSON. When was that conference held?

[2578] General MILES. Sometime during the fall of 1941, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Look on page 204 and see whether or not it does not give it?

General MILES. Yes, it says here:

The agreement was reached in the so-called American, British, Dutch Staff conversations held at Singapore in April of 1941.

I think that is a mistake. I think it was nearer October 1941. There were no Dutch in the Staff Conference that we held here in Washington in the early spring of 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. So you were not a party to the one that General Marshall is talking about?

General MILES. I have never been in Singapore, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever heard of that line before when you were dealing with the British in that conference?

General MILES. No, sir. I testified I have no recollection of the line ever being mentioned in the Staff Conference.

Senator FERGUSON. Now I have volume II of Foreign Relations, and I ask you to look at the last paragraph on page 556—going back to the question I asked.

(The book was handed to General Miles.)

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever know of that?

General MILES. I do not recall knowing of this at the [2579] time, sir, although I may have read it in magic.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever have a talk with General Marshall about the Pearl Harbor attack after the attack on December 7, 1941?

General MILES. To the best of my recollection, no, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It would not impress you so that you would remember such a conversation, if you had one?

General MILES. A conversation with reference to the attack that had already occurred?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MILES. I do not believe that I ever had such a conversation.

[2580] Senator FERGUSON. This memorandum that you made about the 15th of December, referred to at one place as the means of communicating with the General, you made a memorandum rather than talk with him about it; is that right?

General MILES. No, sir. My recollection is that he asked me and he asked General Gerow and I think Colonel Bratton and Colonel Bundy to prepare for him memoranda as to our recollection as to what happened in his office on the morning of Sunday, December 7.

Senator FERGUSON. But you never spoke to him over the telephone or personally about it?

General MILES. About what occurred in his office?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; about the Pearl Harbor incident or attack.

General MILES. I do not remember discussing the attack that had already taken place with him subsequent to the event. I do not remember any discussion with him as to what had occurred in his office, just prior to the attack. I think that was fully covered by his request to me, which may have been made by telephone, to give him a written memorandum on the best of my recollection as to what had occurred in his office.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, were there any staff studies or investigations of the efficiency of G-2 after the 7th [2581] of December 1941, by the Chief of Staff, the Secretary of War, or a representative of either of them?

General MILES. Not that I remember, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, don't you think that you would remember that if they did make an investigation of your office, the efficiency of your office?

General MILES. I think I would remember. I was, however, absent a good deal of the time after December 7 until I was finally relieved at the end of January.

Senator FERGUSON. Where were you when you were absent?

General MILES. In South America, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I assume on your intelligence work?

General MILES. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, did you ever hear that there was such an investigation, or study?

General MILES. No, sir. The nearest thing I can come to that is that I knew we were turning over a great many of our records to the Roberts Board, but I never heard of a representative of the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War making an investigation of MID at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. In testifying before the Pearl Harbor Board on August 8, 1944, you said G-2 was trying, and I quote you, "to gather all possible information about Japan."

You stated further that your system was a running digest [2582] and will you tell us further whether it was not also a part of the function and mission of Military Intelligence to furnish all possible information to the commanding officers of overseas installations and their subordinate units of the Army?

General MILES. It was the duty of G-2 of the War Department General Staff to furnish all information to the major units of the United States Army which we believed would be of use to them, subject, of course, to the restrictions which I have already pointed out, of security, and of getting into the command channel.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any limitations from the Chief of Staff on your duties in relation to your last answer?

General MILES. He put no direct limitations on me that I know of, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Either in writing or verbally?

General MILES. Either in writing or verbally.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, on page 96 of your testimony before the Pearl Harbor Board you stated that "Army G-2 freely exchanged information with the British and Dutch."

Did you ever receive from the British and Dutch any notice that they had intercepted any implementation of the winds messages?

[2583] General MILES. I did not, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether there was any information at all from those sources that they had that message?

General MILES. The implementing broadcasts to the winds message?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

General MILES. To the best of my knowledge and belief, no knowledge of that implementing broadcast ever reached the Military Intelligence Division.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you any knowledge that they had the original message?

General MILES. That the British had the original winds code?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; the winds code messages.

General MILES. I assume that they had because of the arrangement that existed between SIS and British communications whereby we checked to see that each one received all of the broadcasts.

Senator FERGUSON. How did you check to see that each one received all of the broadcasts?

General MILES. Senator, that is a question that I would very much rather you ask Colonel Sadtler when he comes, because it is a technical question of the SIS [2584] and British communications.

I did know that such a system existed, and was run by a reasonably simple code.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you recall whether any liaison existed at that time between the United States Navy, or Army Intelligence Service, and the British or Dutch in order that the final wind message would be promptly flashed to us by them, or to them by us if and when it was intercepted? Who would have knowledge of that?

General MILES. In our search for that implementing broadcast, we acted through the SIS, through the Federal Communications Commission, and we also asked SIS to check with the British to see that we did not miss that implementation, but it was a broadcast in plain Japanese that we were waiting for, certain Japanese phrases in plain Japanese put into weather reports in a certain way, and we undoubtedly were just as capable of picking that out of the air, or rather more so, than the British or the Dutch.

[2585] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I see it is 4 o'clock and we might adjourn before I start on the questions in relation to the wind message, that I ask to clean up in the morning.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, General Marshall is coming along Thursday morning. Of course, that has completely disarranged our schedule.

I would like to have the committee's consent that General Gerow may go on the stand in the morning and that the further examination of General Miles be taken up afterward. We cannot finish with General Gerow before General Marshall comes on, but we can do the best we can to lay down a lot of basic material that General Marshall will have to deal with.

Considering we are advancing General Marshall's testimony, completely upsetting our arrangement and causing confusion, that is the best solution I can offer. We can call General Gerow at 10 o'clock in the morning and go through with him until 4 and then we will have to let him get off and put General Marshall on Thursday, and then recall both General Miles and General Gerow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is a reasonable request on the part of counsel.

Senator FERGUSON. I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman.

[2586] The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

General, we will recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow. It appears that you will not have to be here tomorrow, if you desire to be elsewhere.

General MILES. Very well, Mr. Chairman. I will not be called until after General Marshall has testified?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

General MILES. Very well, sir.¹

(Whereupon, at 4 o'clock p. m., the committee recessed until 10 o'clock a. m., Wednesday, December 5, 1945.)

Part 3—December 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, and 13, 1945—follows.

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman), presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson; and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[2588] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. General Gerow, will you be sworn, please?

TESTIMONY OF LT. GEN. LEONARD TOWNSEND GEROW, UNITED STATES ARMY ²

(Having been duly sworn by the chairman.)

The CHAIRMAN. Is counsel ready to proceed?

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to make a short statement to the committee which I think may help it in connection with the next two or three witnesses, including General Marshall.

Calling General Marshall out of turn, of course, upset our order of proof, and we are bringing up some matters now which we had not intended to present to the committee until sometime later.

One, I think, is the story of the so-called "winds" message, and the other is the detailed record in handling, analytically, and so on, what is known as the fourteenth part of the message which came in on December 6 and 7.

Our order of proof originally was for taking those things up as a special order of proceeding. We intended to call all our witnesses on that at one time, and in advance of General Marshall's testimony.

Now that he is coming on he will have to be asked about that.

My statement is intended to sort of orient the committee as to what we know about the situation, so that they will [2589] understand the testimony and be better equipped to do something about it until General Marshall comes in.

Now, the first thing is this "winds" message. That is a sort of a romantic term. I want to report now just generally what the state of the inquiry is in regard to the "winds" message, so the committee will understand.

² See Hearings, Part 5, p. 2490, for suggested corrections in his testimony submitted by General Gerow.

The winds message, originally the winds code, which is found on page 154 of the diplomatic intercepts, exhibit 1, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact at the start that if the Japanese had used that method of communication and we had intercepted their diplomatic message what you would have learned was that the diplomatic relations between the United States and Japan were in danger, and that instructions had to be given to burn the code.

My first reaction to the winds message was, if we had intercepted it, we would have had little more than we had already, because we knew our diplomatic relations were in danger and we knew they had given orders to burn the code. So my original reaction was there was much ado about nothing in the winds message.

But passing that I want to also call to the attention of the committee the fact that the code, as set up by its very terms, provides:

In case of emergency (danger of cutting off our [2590] diplomatic relations), and the cutting off of international communications, the following warning will be added in the middle of the daily Japanese language shortwave news broadcast:

That shows on its face that the Japs only set this method up for an emergency system, in case they could not use the ordinary means of communication.

Now the proof already shows that they were using the ordinary means of communication right up to the attack on Pearl Harbor. So the question arises at once whether they did send out those messages.

Heretofore all the assumptions have been that they did, and there has been an inquiry by the other boards as to who received them and what was done with them.

Now we have made a plan to dig out all the facts on that, and I just want to report the present status of that.

In the first place, in our effort to find out whether the message ever was sent we have already the FCC report from one of the best monitoring stations, we have the exact report from them as to just what they picked up. That report was that one of the messages picked up on the 4th of December by the Japanese listener on the FCC station, which he picked up because it resembled—did not exactly comply with the code but resembled the code—had the statement in it, "North wind cloudy," which [2591] meant war with Russia and not with the United States and Great Britain, and that we can talk about as the false winds message, which was probably a real broadcast and not a code broadcast, and caused, of course, confusion among witnesses as to whether they ever saw the message or not.

We also had from the FCC the report that on the afternoon of December 7, after the attack on Pearl Harbor and after the ordinary means of international communication had been closed, a winds message was received. That message said nothing about "East wind rain," which meant war with the United States, because that was already known all over the world, but it did use the expression which meant war with England.

That is the message received by the FCC after the attack on Pearl Harbor, and was an implementing message to warn the Japanese people abroad that they were about to have war with Great Britain.

The next thing we did was to inquire from the Dutch and British and Australia, through the State Department, as to whether either of those nations had any record of intercepting, prior to December 7, an implementing message which said "East wind rain," which meant war with the United States. We heard from the Australians and they say no, they did not. We have not yet had our report from the Dutch and British.

Now we also had sent to General MacArthur some time ago [2592] a request that he endeavor to find from the Japanese, from their records, whether they ever sent a winds implementing message prior to December 7. The report from General MacArthur is that the Japs say they sent none out until the afternoon of December 7, which covers this implementing message they sent out which we intercepted, the FCC intercepted, showing a warning of war with Great Britain.

That report, for whatever it is worth, did not indicate that the Japs sent out any messages other than those picked up by the FCC.

Now we also have had communications from and have been busy bringing here witnesses from every one of the monitoring stations, witnesses who were in the stations during the critical period November 28 to December 7, and witnesses who were present at the stations at the time, and those witnesses will be here and we will find out all they know about the situation.

[2593] Now, there is just one other point about the winds message. There has been a statement to the effect that there was a message numbered 7001 in the Navy files. The tab in it shows the number is canceled, and there is no message in there. It has been thought that this missing 7001 was a winds message. The Navy reports, which are quite voluminous, in their search and effort to find what 7001 was, shows, among other things, that if the winds message had ever been received, it is not the type of message that would have been put in the file with the serial numbers which 7001 would require, for the simple reason that they filed under 7001 only coded intercepts.

Of course, this was in Japanese broadcasting language and would not have been put in that file, if it had ever been received.

Now, that is as far as we have gone up to date with the winds message, and as long as we are to have General Marshall, I thought we ought to have a review of the situation.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I don't understand, do I, from counsel that he is intending this morning to determine what the evidence will show, or what his opinion of certain evidence in other hearings is?

Do I understand that you are passing upon what the evidence will be?

[2594] Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I am trying to explain to the committee what kind of witnesses we are going to call, and what the result of our present inquiry has been. If I have expressed any opinion about the weight of the evidence, I didn't intend to.

Senator FERGUSON. You don't wish to convey to the committee the weight of any of this evidence?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I have my opinion about the weight of the evidence, and if it has crept out in this hearing, why, I don't think I need to apologize.

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, you do not wish to express to the committee what you think about the weight of the evidence?

Mr. MITCHELL. I don't know what you understand. My words speak for themselves. As I stated, I am trying to report to the committee what the situation is. That is my only object.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, counsel is, in a sense, forecasting for the benefit of the committee what the testimony will be.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Now, I want to turn to the 1 p. m., and fourteenth part messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could I inquire [2595] whether there will be any conflict on this winds message, that it did come in?

Mr. MITCHELL. There was a great deal of conflict, as you know, among various witnesses called before the other boards of inquiry as to whether they saw a message of that kind. Great conflict with it. And that is one reason I was anxious to get at the root of the matter and find out whether the message was really sent or not. I don't understand that there is any conflict about anything I have told you except I haven't yet talked to the witnesses who had charge of the monitoring stations and I don't know what they are going to say about ever having received it, or anything they have to say about the destruction of their records.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask counsel when it is contemplated that the testimony with respect to the winds message will be submitted to the committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. As soon as this inquiry is complete. Our original plan, Mr. Congressman, as our record shows, submitted on November 2, called for the story of the winds message pretty well down the line, and a great many witnesses before it, and the only reason I bring it up now out of order is because General Marshall has been advanced and that has upset our schedule. But it is hard for me to predict with certainty when the witnesses will be called because I can't tell how [2596] long the examination of each witness is going to be.

We intend to, as soon as we can get around to it, and just as soon as it is ready, we will bring in all the witnesses that bear on the winds message and make a special order of it and give you everything we have. The only reason I am bringing it up today is to report on the extent and direction of our inquiry and what it relates to. And the things I stated as to what the record shows that we have already got are not in dispute so far as I can see.

Mr. KEEFE. Of course, Mr. Chairman, you would expect a member of the committee to give consideration to the testimony when it comes in and the weight to be given to it is a matter for determination when the testimony is in.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course.

Mr. KEEFE. Any conclusions to be drawn must necessarily await the conclusion of the introduction of all of the testimony relating to this subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Congressman, have I said anything to the contrary this morning?

Mr. KEEFE. I make that statement because there seems to be an impression that your own conclusions are already formed in certain aspects of the situation, and while that may be proper, yet I think you would concede that as a member of this committee I should be compelled to await any conclusions on it [2597] until the testimony is all in. That would be proper, would it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. I haven't any question about it. If you really want to know what my present impression is, for what it is worth, I confess that on the state of the inquiry up to date I have very, very grave doubts whether the Japs ever sent out a winds implementing message prior to the afternoon of December 7, but that is a matter for the committee to decide when they hear all of the proof, and I didn't intend to express an opinion that the committee would have to accept. I was just trying to give you a picture of our inquiry up to date so you would know.

[2598] Mr. KEEFE. So it will not be necessary to cross-examine General Miles or General Gerow, or anybody else, with respect to their knowledge of this winds message now. The whole subject, if they have any testimony to give on the subject, or were in any way interested and can produce any proof, that will be submitted at the time you take up the winds message?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the way I would like to have it, but General Miles was already asked about the winds message, as I understand it, yesterday morning, although I wasn't here.

Mr. KEEFE. I think only just a few questions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was that all?

Mr. KEEFE. At the end of his testimony; yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is quite agreeable to me to leave the winds message out of the picture as far as these two generals are concerned, but not General Marshall, because we won't have him back. So what he knows about it the committee will want to ask him about. That is the reason I made this statement, so you would be able to frame your questions in the light of the report as to how far our investigation has gone and what questions we have sought to resolve.

Mr. KEEFE. You referred to a communication from General MacArthur this morning.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. I understand you have such a communication.

[2599] Has the committee been supplied with it?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; we haven't given you any of those documents, I have been told, but we were planning to do that well in advance of our proof about the winds message. You see, General Marshall is coming and I wanted you to know what we had. If you want to look at anything we have up to date before General Marshall is called, you may.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the committee be furnished copies of this before tomorrow?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, you see General Marshall's inquiry has been advanced so rapidly, it has so disarranged it, that we haven't had time to have these reports mimeographed. I have only one copy. If you would like to have the information up to date on it, I will try and have it mimeographed. But I tried to tell you in a general way what these documents consist of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask counsel whether after General Marshall's testimony, and such information as we may get from him with reference to the winds message, in view of his early departure and his probable absence during the rest of the hearings, is it then planned to go back as far as possible on to the original schedule and deal with the winds message, subject to, of course, General Marshall's testimony?

Mr. MITCHELL. Precisely. Of course, our winds message [2600] inquiry isn't complete. When I get reports from the British and Dutch as to whether they received the message or not, why, if they say they did, I would recast my doubts about it ever having been sent. I am not in a position to express any opinion on it as yet.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MITCHELL. The other thing I wanted to call attention to was the so-called 14 part and 1 p. m. messages. Before General Marshall was supposed to be called we had intended to call all the basic witnesses to show the exact routing of those messages and how they were handled and the hours it was done and what was done. That might take us a week, to call those witnesses, or more. So we have to go on with General Marshall leading up to that subject, and we haven't had an opportunity to present that proof.

Now, there are one or two things I have which I hoped would aid the committee. One of those things is the document which has been distributed this morning in mimeograph entitled "Information from Documentary Evidence on Messages No. 901, 902, 907, 910." That is the 14 part and 1 p. m. messages. The pilot message that came in. And the code-burning message afterward.

This document which I am going to offer in evidence now, for whatever use the committee wants to make of it, will be [2601] Exhibit 41.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. It is this one [indicating]?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Prepared by the Army and Navy and is understood to state in detail all the information as to the handling of these messages. That is a matter of documentary proof, of course. They haven't attempted to put in any information that depended on recollection or memory of a witness.

So you find the history of the detailed handling of the fourteenth part message and the 1 p. m. message as far as documentary support of the routing is contained in this exhibit. And as to each part of the message.

The committee will remember that 13 parts were discussions by the Japs as to our position and the fourteenth part was the part of the message in which they said they had broken off negotiations. And the 1 p. m. message which followed was the message requiring or directing Ambassadors to deliver their message at 1 p. m. on Sunday, December 7.

[2602] Also, on this Exhibit 41 you will find there are references on the margin to exhibit pages on which the text of the parts, various parts, appear.

The CHAIRMAN. That refers to the pages in Exhibit 1?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I make an inquiry about that of counsel?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY. On page 6, at the top of the page, page 6 of Exhibit 41, at the top, will you have a witness, or will you supply the information as to when each of those processes was completed?

Mr. MITCHELL. Wherever there is a gap in the information shown on this, it means that there are no documents, and we will have to call witnesses. So that whenever you find a gap—and there are gaps—which you would like to fill, you will know we haven't the documents, but have to call witnesses and depend on their memory and recollection.

Mr. MURPHY. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. This will be No. 41, and it is now before the committee as an exhibit?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I just offered it.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

[2603] (The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 41.")

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Counsel, for your explanation.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, will you state your present rank and station?

General GEROW. Leonard T. Gerow, lieutenant general; station, Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Mr. MITCHELL. What are your duties at Fort Leavenworth?

General GEROW. I am in command of the post and also commandant of the Command and General Staff School.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that the principal general staff instruction point of the Army?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were you in the War Plans Division in the War Department in 1941?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. When did you receive that assignment?

General GEROW. I reported, sir, in November 1940, and left the War Plans Division in February 1942.

Mr. MITCHELL. You were head of the War Plans Division during that period?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; Assistant Chief of Staff of War Plans Division.

Mr. MITCHELL. Had you had experience prior to that time in war-plans work?

[2604] General GEROW. Yes, sir. I had served previously in the War Plans Division as Executive for War Plans Division, during the period, as I recall, the early part of 1935 to the early part of 1939, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. When you left the War Plans Division, what was your next command?

General GEROW. I was assigned to command the Twenty-ninth Division, sir, at Fort Meade, Md.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you had charge of training and the preparation of that division?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Infantry division?

General GEROW. I had complete command and trained the division as an infantry division.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was your next move?

General GEROW. I took the division to England in October of 1942, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And remained in command how long?

General GEROW. Until approximately June 1943 when I was assigned to command the Fifth Corps.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Fifth Corps?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. How many divisions in the Fifth Corps?

General GEROW. The number of divisions varied from [2605] time to time. The average, I should say, was three divisions at that time, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you take your Fifth Corps into France?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. The Fifth Corps was one of the corps that was designated to assault the Normandy beaches and the Fifth Corps landed on the Omaha beach on D-day, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And how long did you remain in command of the Fifth Corps?

General GEROW. I remained in command of the Fifth Corps until January 16, as I recall, 1944, shortly after the Von Runstedt breakthrough, when we started the counteroffensive. I was then assigned to command the Fifteenth Army.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you ever been stationed in the Hawaiian Islands?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. What were the functions of the War Plans Division in 1941?

General GEROW. Those functions, sir, are as stated in Army Regulations No. 10-15. If I may, I would like to read those.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. You may. Just a part of the regulations relating to the War Plans Division.

[2606] General GEROW. Yes, sir.

I quote paragraph 12:

War Plans Division, general duties:

a. The War Plans Division is charged, in general, with those duties of the War Department General Staff which relate to the formulation of plans for the use in the theatre of war of the military forces, separately or in conjunction with the naval forces, in the national defense.

b. The War Plans Division is specifically charged with the preparation of plans and policies and the supervision of activities concerning—

- (1) Location and armament of coast and land fortifications;
- (2) Estimate of forces required and times at which they may be needed under the various possible conditions necessitating the use of troops in the national defense;
- (3) The initial strategical deployment (plans and orders for the movement of troops to execute the initial deployment to be the duty of the Operations and Training Division);
- (4) Actual operations in the theatre of war;
- (5) Consultation with the Operations and Training Division and the Supply Division on major items of [2607] equipment.

Those are the responsibilities of War Plans Division, 1941, sir.

[2608] Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to offer in evidence now as exhibit 42 a copy of Army Regulations No. 10-15 dated August 18, 1936, which includes all amendments up to December 7, 1941.

The CHAIRMAN. All amendments, did you say?

Mr. MITCHELL. It includes all amendments. It is an up-to-date copy of the Army Regulations, defining the War Department General Staff duties, each department. It not only relates to War Plans but to G-2 and gives a short picture of the complete set-up.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be filed as Exhibit 42.

Mr. MITCHELL. Each member of the committee has it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 42.")

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, do you remember that during the time you were in the War Plans Division there were certain conversations with the British with respect to a joint war plan in case the two nations were drawn into the war?

General GEROW. I do, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is called the ABC, which means American-British Conversations, does it?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir; ABC-1.

[2609] Mr. MITCHELL. ABC-1?

General GEROW. And there was an ABC-2.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was also a British staff plan, was it, a joint plan with Britain?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember whether during that time there were conversations between military officers of the United States and Canada with respect to a joint operation with Canada in case we were drawn into the war?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; there were such conversations conducted.

Mr. MITCHELL. And do you remember also that there was a similar conference held at Singapore or some place in the Far East between officers of the Army and Navy of the United States and with the British and Dutch, which resulted in a plan or recommendations made by that conference out there?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; there was such a conference conducted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I show you a document here which is entitled, "American-Dutch-British conversations, Singapore, April 1941." You have seen that document, have you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have seen this document. It is a report of the conversations at Singapore, sir, between the Americans, Dutch, and British.

[2610] Mr. KEEFE. Is that Exhibit 43?

Mr. MITCHELL. I haven't had it reproduced. If the committee want it, we can do it. It is an elaborate staff plan.

These plans, I might say, the British-Canadian and the one with the Dutch, Americans, and British are brought up now with a view to ascertaining whether we can ascertain from them whether there was any commitment by the United States to engage in war with Japan, that is the purpose of it, but if the committee want it reproduced we will have that done.

Did you have anything to do with setting up the personnel—

Mr. KEEFE. Before you finish I personally would very much like, in view of General Marshall's previous testimony, I would like to have that exhibit made available.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will have it mimeographed. You mean copies to each member of the committee?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Congressman yield to his colleague?

Mr. MURPHY. I was wondering if it would not be better to defer your request that it be reproduced until we see what significance there is to it and how much of it you might [2611] need? Maybe only a portion of it would be necessary for the examination of General Marshall or maybe we could use the original.

Mr. MITCHELL. The exhibit has been available for some time and it has been loaned out to one member of the committee or another off and on, but we never have had it reproduced for all of them.

Mr. KEEFE. That has always been the trouble, Mr. Counsellor, that when you ask for a thing it is always in the hands of some other member of the committee. Now, I would like to see that.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if it is possible to have it all mimeographed the Chair would suggest that it be done so that each member can be furnished a copy.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will do that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is rather difficult to see it when any member gets it and keeps it for awhile.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, my question, General, was whether you had anything to do with the assignment of United States Army or Navy officers to attend that conference at Singapore in April 1941?

General GEROW. The assignment was made, sir, by the Chief of Staff as I recall now, sir. The War Plans Division did make certain recommendations to the Chief of Staff with [2612] regard to such assignment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that the document states that the representatives of the United States were Capt. W. B. Purnell, U. S. Navy, Chief of Staff of the Asiatic Fleet; Col. A. C. McBride, U. S. A., Assistant Chief of Staff of the United States Military Forces in the Philippines; Capt. A. M. R. Allen, U. S. Navy, United States Naval Observer at Singapore; and Lt. Col. F. G. Brink, U. S. A., U. S. Military Observer at Singapore.

You think they were selected by the staff here, by the Navy and Army?

General GEROW. No, sir. I would like to change my statement with regard to that. I think the commanders out there were instructed to furnish suitable representatives for this conference; that is, the Naval and Army commanders out there, sir, the Commanding General of the Far East and the Commanding Admiral of the Asiatic Fleet. That is my recollection at the moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. On page 6 of this document I find under the head of "Introduction" the following statement:

The following conditions apply:

(a) State of war between Germany, Italy and Japan on one hand and British empire with its present allies and the United States of America, referred to [2613] herein as associated powers, on the other.

(b) No political commitment is implied.

(c) Any agreement is subject to ratification by the government concerned.

Now, is that the usual system that our staff plans had of making certain assumptions?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir. Practically all staff plans have as one of their initial provisions the assumptions under which the plan is drawn.

Mr. MITCHELL. You called this "Conditions." Was that a British or American term?

General GEROW. That was a British term, sir. This paper was apparently handled largely by a British secretariat.

Mr. MITCHELL. "Terms of Reference," it says. [Reading]:

(2) Prepare plan for conduct of military operations in the Far East on the basis of report of Washington conversation.

(3) Particular points for agreement are: plan for employment and disposition of forces in the whole area, Indian Ocean, Pacific, Australian and New Zealand waters before and after arrival of the Far East Fleet as agreed in Washington conversations and summarized in Admiralty telegram 1848, of 4th of April. [2614]

(b) Details of arrangements for cooperation, eg. communications, exchange of liaison officers.

You have examined this document thoroughly, have you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, from your knowledge of War Plans and the systems of getting up war plans, how would you characterize this? What is it?

General GEROW. It is a technical agreement between military personnel for the conduct of operations in the event that the powers referred to should become engaged in war.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you find anything in the document to the effect that Captain Purnell or any of his associates had attempted to commit the United States to engage in war?

General GEROW. They had no authority to commit the United States to engage in war, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is meant by this term, "No political commitments and any agreement is subject to ratification by the government concerned"? Does that mean what it says?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; exactly what it says.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, this document refers to British-American conversations and I will ask you to refer to another staff plan I have here which is labeled "ABC-1 and 2." Have you examined this document? [2615]

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are quite familiar with it, are you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice this document, the first part of it, is dated March 27, 1941. That was prior to the Singapore meeting?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. It states that:

The staff conversations were held in Washington from January 29, 1941 to March 27, 1941 between the United States staff committee representing the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff of the Army and the United Kingdom delegation representing the Chiefs of Staff. Representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of the Dominions of Canada, Australia and New Zealand were associated with United Kingdom delegates during the course of these conversations but were not present at joint meetings.

It says that the United States representatives were Maj. Gen. S. D. Embick; Brig. Gen. Sherman Miles; Brig. Gen. L. T. Gerow; Col. J. T. McNarney; Rear Adm. R. L. Ghormley; Rear Adm. R. K. Turner; Capt. [2616] A. G. Kirk; Capt. DeWitt C. Ramsey; Lt. Col. O. T. Pfeiffer.

You yourself were a member of that delegation?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And took part in those conferences?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And in framing this document?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice that under the head of "Purpose" it says:

(a) To determine the best methods by which the armed forces of the United States and the British Commonwealth, with its present allies, could defeat Germany and the powers allied with it should the United States be compelled to resort to war.

Without going through the details of this staff plan, is there anything in it, or was there any understanding reached or attempted to be reached that the United States would engage in war?

General GEROW. No, sir. Those were purely staff discussions.

Mr. MITCHELL. On assumptions that she might be drawn into war?

General GEROW. She might be compelled to resort to war. [2617] yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have any authority on behalf of the United States to make any commitment that the United States would engage in war under any conditions?

General GEROW. We did not have such authority, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. This document then is entitled "A Report." To go to whom, the Chiefs of Staff?

General GEROW. To be submitted initially to the Chiefs of Staff, yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you know whether this ABC 1 and 2 were even approved by higher authority in the United States?

General GEROW. My recollection, sir, is it was approved by the Chiefs of Staff, by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an inquiry at that point, as to whether or not the question which you now relate, as I understand it, to the A-B-C agreements Nos. 1 and 2 having been approved by the Chiefs of Staff and the Secretaries of War and Navy, have you asked or will you ask the same question with respect to the other agreement, the A-B-C-D agreement?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should have done it before, but I was now getting to that.

I show you, General Gerow, copy of a memorandum taken [2618] from the files of the War Department, dated June 9, 1941, which appears to be signed by W. P. Scobey, lieutenant colonel, General Staff Corps, secretary of the Joint Board, and a letter dated June 2, 1941, preceding that, addressed to the President at the White House by Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War and Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy.

I had better read those. They ought to go into the record.

The letter from Mr. Stimson and Mr. Knox to the President, dated June 2, 1941, is as follows [reading]:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Joint Board has prepared Joint Army and Navy Basic War Plan—Rainbow No. 5 which with the report of United States-British Staff Conversations concluded on March 27, 1941, we have approved, and now transmit them for your consideration, recommending your approval. Joint Army and Navy Basic War Plan—Rainbow No. 5 is based upon agreements contained in the Report of United States-British Staff Conversations.

Joint Army and Navy Basic War Plan—Rainbow No. 5 states the concept of war and provides for initial dispositions and operations of United States forces, should the United States associate in war with the Democracies against the totalitarian powers. As such [2619] it constitutes the basic directive for United States Army and Naval Forces in a war effort.

The War and Navy Departments have been advised that the Report of United States-British Staff Conversations has been agreed to provisionally by the British Chiefs of Staff and that it has been submitted to the British Government for approval.

Now, the second document, a letter of June 9, 1941, or memorandum for the Chief of Staff, signed by Colonel Scobey, reads as follows:

Subject: J. B. No. 325 (Serial 642-5)—Joint Army and Navy Basic War Plan—Rainbow No. 5 and Report of United States-British Staff Conversations—ABC-1.

The President on June 7, 1941 returned the two subject plans without approval. In explanation of the President's failure to approve or disapprove the plans, his Military Aide, Major General E. M. Watson, stated to the Undersigned in substance as follows:

The President has familiarized himself with the two papers; but since the report of the United States British Staff Conversations, ABC-1, had not been approved by the British Government, he would not approve the report at this time; neither would he now give ap- [2620] proval to Joint Army and Navy Basic War Plan—Rainbow No. 5, which is based upon the report ABC-1. However, in case of war the papers would be returned to The President for his approval.

(Signed) W. P. SCOBEE.

Now, you said that this ABC-1 had been approved by the two secretaries. Did it ever get any farther than that, do you recollect, in the way of approval?

General GEROW. To the best of my knowledge and belief it was never approved by the President.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I notice that this document says not only ABC-1 but ABC-2. I should have asked you what ABC-2 is.

General GEROW. ABC-2 was a report of a special committee that was set up to consider air collaboration only.

Mr. MITCHELL. Air?

General GEROW. Air collaboration only; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Air what?

Mr. MITCHELL. Air collaboration.

The CHAIRMAN. I see; air collaboration. All right.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was the same type of document as ABC-1, a staff plan for a proposed plan of joint operations in case the Nation should be drawn into war?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

[2621] Mr. MITCHELL. Now I would like to ask you whether you know whether the Singapore report, the Dutch-British-and-American joint report from Singapore about joint military plans, was ever approved?

General GEROW. That document was never approved either by the Chief of Staff or the Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. MITCHELL. So if it was not approved by them it never went to the President for approval, I suppose.

General GEROW. As far as I know it never went to the President, sir, and I do not believe it was submitted to either the Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy for formal approval, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, let us turn to the Canadian document.

There were certain other staff conferences with Canada at about that time, were there not?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Which one of these documents would contain that report?

General GEROW. That would be ABC-22, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. ABC-22?

General GEROW. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. You have that before you, have you, and have you examined it?

[2622] General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have examined it and I have a copy.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice on the first page of that under date of August 12, 1941, is a memorandum from the Joint Planning Committee to the Joint Board (reading):

Subject: Joint Canadian—United States Basic Defense Plan No. 2 (Short Title—ABC-22).

Enclosure: (A) Subject Plan (draft of 28 July 1941) with permanent Joint Board on Defense letter of transmittal, dated: Montreal, 30th July, 1941.

The subject plan, which was prepared in collaboration with the War Plans Division of the War and Navy Departments, is transmitted herewith with recommendation that it be approved.

(Signed) L. T. GEROW.

Did you personally represent the United States at that conference in Montreal?

General GEROW. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice the signatures of our representatives are S. D. Embick, major general, United States Army; H. W. Hill, captain, United States Navy; Forrest Sherman, commander, United States Navy; Clayton Bissell, lieutenant colonel, United States Army.

Did you have anything to do with the selection or appointment of our representatives?

[2623] General GEROW. I cannot recall specifically that War Plans did make such a recommendation to the Chief of Staff, but I imagine that it did recommend to the Chief of Staff who our representatives should be.

Mr. MITCHELL. The section 1 of this document under the title, "Purpose of this plan," says (reading):

1. There has been submitted to the Government of the United States and to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom a report of Staff Conversations held in Washington from January 29, 1941 to March 27, 1941. The United Kingdom Government has referred this report to the Canadian Government for their concurrence. The report, which bears the short title "ABC-1," includes a United States-British Commonwealth Joint Basic War Plan.

2. ABC-1 assumes that joint agreements between Canada and the United States for common action in war under the concepts of ABC-1 will conform generally to the agreements reached in the United States-British Staff Conversations. This plan is intended to supplement those agreements, and to provide for the most effective use of Canadian and United States Forces for the purposes listed in paragraph 3, should the United States and the British Commonwealth be associated in a war against Germany and her allies.

3. Under such circumstances, cooperative action by Canadian and United States Forces will be required primarily for purposes connected with:

- (a) the protection of overseas shipping within the northern portions of the Western Atlantic and Pacific Areas;
- (b) the protection of sea communications within the coastal zones;
- (c) the defense of Alaska, Canada, Newfoundland (which includes Labrador) and the northern portion of the United States.

You have examined this document and, of course, know its general tenor and purpose?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was it anything different in scope or nature than any other United States or Joint Staff plan for joint operations in case of war?

General GEROW. No, sir. It followed generally the other war plans.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was this Canadian-United States joint plan approved?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; it was approved by the Chief of Staff and the Chief of Naval Operations, the Secretary of [2625] War and the Secretary of the Navy and approved by the President.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have here a document obtained from the War Department, dated August 20, 1941, signed by Secretary Stimson and Secretary Knox, addressed to the President at the White House as follows [reading:]

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Joint United States-Canadian Permanent Defense Board has prepared Joint United States-Canadian Defense Plan No. 2 (Short Title ABC-22) providing for common action in war against Germany and her allies in the defense of contiguous territories, including Newfoundland and Alaska, and adjacent waters.

This plan has been examined and approved by The Joint Board, and we also have approved it. It is transmitted herewith for your consideration with recommendation that it be approved.

Following that is the other document from the War Department, dated August 29, 1941, as follows [reading]:

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

Subject: Joint Canadian-United States Basic Defense Plan No. 2 (Short Title—ABC-22), J. B. No. 325 (Serial 717).

[2626] 1. You are advised that The President has, on August 29, 1941, given approval to the subject serial by indorsing the Joint Planning Committee report as follows: "OK, F. D. R."

(Signed) W. P. SCOBEX,
Lieut. Colonel, G. S. C., Secretary.

And bears the endorsement:

Sep. 4, 1941

Noted—Chief of Staff

Noted—Deputy Chief of Staff.

So that of these three plans the Canadian was the only one that ever was finally approved by the President?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have here a document which we will mark exhibit 43—the committee has this—captioned: "Statement by the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff."

Have you a copy of that?

General GEROW. I have a copy; yes, sir.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 43.")

[2627] Mr. MITCHELL. This document is a document of instructions from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the representatives of the United States at the American-British Staff conferences that resulted in the report which has been marked ABC-1 and 2?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; these are the instructions to the United States delegation, sir. It is a joint statement that was to be made by the Chief of Staff and Chief of Naval Operations before a meeting of the Joint Committee, both United States and British.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, you mean it was prepared and not given to the representatives, or wouldn't you know about that?

General GEROW. Well, sir; it was furnished the United States representatives and I think it was presented verbally at a joint meeting to the combined British and United States representatives.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see. That document offered as exhibit 43 I think ought to be read into the record. I will read it.

1. The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States are aware of the advantages that will accrue to both nations in the prosecution of any war in which the United States and the British Commonwealth may participate as associates, [2628] should tentative understandings be reached in advance concerning military cooperation. Therefore, they have prepared this statement in the hope that it will clear the way for the discussions which are to follow.

2. As understood by these two officers, the purpose of these staff conversations is to determine the best methods by which the armed forces of the United States and the British Commonwealth can defeat Germany and the powers allied with her, should the United States be compelled to resort to war.

3. The American people as a whole desire now to remain out of war—

The date of the document, I should have read, is January 27, 1941. Is that right?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL (continuing reading):

and to provide only material and economic aid to Great Britain. So long as this attitude is maintained, it must be supported by their responsible military and naval authorities. Therefore, no specific commitments can now be made except as to technical methods of cooperation. Military plans which may be envisaged must, for the present, remain contingent upon the future political action of both nations. All such plans are [2629] subject to eventual official approval by the two Governments.

4. The present national position of the United States is as follows:

(a) A fundamental principle of United States policy is that the Western Hemisphere remain secure against the extension in it of non-American military and political control.

(b) The United States has adopted the policy of affording material and diplomatic assistance to the British Commonwealth in that nation's war against Germany.

(c) The United States by diplomatic means has opposed any extension of Japanese rule over additional territory.

5. If the United States Government decides to make war in common with the British Commonwealth, it is the present view of the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff that:

(a) The broad military objective of United States operations will be the defeat of Germany and her allies, but the United States necessarily must also maintain dispositions which, under all eventualities, will prevent the extension in the Western [2630] Hemisphere of European or Asiatic political and military power.

(b) The objective of the war will be most effectively attained by the United States exerting its principal military effort in the Atlantic or navally in the Mediterranean regions.

(c) The United States and British Commonwealth should endeavor to keep Japan from entering the war or from attacking the Dutch.

(d) Should Japan enter the war, United States operations in the mid-Pacific and the Far East would be conducted in such a manner as to facilitate the exertion of its principal military effort in the Atlantic or navally in the Mediterranean.

(e) As a general rule, United States forces should operate in their own areas of responsibility, under their own commanders, and in accordance with plans derived from United States-British joint plans.

(f) The United States will continue to furnish material aid to Great Britain, but will retain for building up its own forces material in such proportion as to provide for future security and best to effectuate United States-British joint plans for [2631] defeating Germany.

6. The scope of the staff conversations should preferably cover the examination of those military efforts which will contribute most directly to the defeat of Germany. As a preliminary to military cooperation, tentative agreements should be reached concerning the allocation of the principal areas of responsibility, the major lines of the military strategy to be pursued by both nations, the strength of the forces which each may be able to commit, and the determination of satisfactory command arrangements, both as to supreme control, and as to unity of field command in cases of strategic or tactical joint operations. Staff conversations should also include an examination into the present military situations of the United States and the British Commonwealth, and also into the probable situations that might result from the loss of the British Isles.

7. The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff would appreciate it if the British Staff Representatives could furnish the United States Staff Representatives with an estimate of the military situation of the British Commonwealth as a preliminary to the staff discussions.

Now, General Gerow, do you know of any other Joint Staff [2632] conversations between the United States and Great Britain, and the Dutch and the Canadians and the Australians or anybody else during that period in 1941, other than those I have adduced?

General GEROW. No, sir; other than informal conversations between members of our own staff and the members of the British mission and the missions of other nations that were assembled in Washington at that time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I mean conversations of a more formal character that would produce some kind of a joint staff plan for possible future operations.

General GEROW. To the best of my knowledge and belief there were no such conferences.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you at any time during your service in the War Plans Division see or hear of any agreement which had been entered into by anybody, any executive officer of the United States, War, and Navy, or anybody else, including the President, which assumed to bind the United States to engage in war against Japan before Japan attacked the United States?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. There have been discussions here in the committee based on memoranda, I think, including this Singapore plan and memoranda by General Marshall and Admiral [2623] Stark, in which they recommended that no military operations should be conducted against Japan unless certain eventualities occurred, such as an attack by the Japs on the Philippines, and one of the eventualities was said to be "or unless the Japs should cross a certain latitude and longitude line." Do you remember that?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was a recommendation and report based on the Singapore report, carried on forward to the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy by the Marshall memorandum, is that right?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I think that statement appeared initially in the Singapore conversations, in the recommendation of the conferees at that conference.

Mr. MITCHELL. Exhibit 17 has already been offered in evidence. It is a memorandum dated November 27, 1941. [Reading:]

Subject: Far Eastern Situation.

Signed by General Marshall and Admiral Stark and addressed to the President. On the second page the report says:

It is recommended that:

prior to the completion of the Philippines reinforcement, military counter-action be considered only [2634] if Japan attacks or directly threatens United States, British, or Dutch territory as above outlined;

in case of a Japanese advance into Thailand, Japan be warned by the United States, the British, and the Dutch governments that advance beyond the lines indicated may lead to war; prior to such warning no joint military opposition be undertaken;

steps be taken at once to consummate agreements with the British and Dutch for the issuance of such warning.

Do you know or did you know at the time whether the President took any action on that recommendation?

General GEROW. I do not know whether the President took any action on it or not, sir.

[2635] Mr. MITCHELL. There was offered in evidence yesterday as exhibit 40, a message from the Commander in Chief of the Asiatic Fleet to the Chief of Naval Operations, marked "Information to the Commander in Chief of the Pacific Fleet," dated December 7, eastern time, I suppose, Philippine time, 1941, which reads as follows:

Learn from Singapore we have assured Britain armed support under three or four eventualities. Have received no corresponding instructions from you.

Do you know of any assurances that we had given the British at Singapore of armed support under three or four eventualities?

General GEROW. I know of no such assurances, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. May this report, that has been obtained from Singapore, have been founded on this Dutch-American-British conference report to which we referred?

General GEROW. It may have been; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. May I have the last answer?

Mr. MITCHELL. I asked him if it was possible that this report that Admiral Hart had might have referred to this Singapore plan. He said he does not know; it might.

We have tried to get Admiral Stark's reply to this message, but we have not succeeded in doing it up to this morning.

[2636] Senator FERGUSON. I might help counsel on the Admiralty report—

Mr. MITCHELL. I would be glad to get any help I can.

Senator FERGUSON. We asked that we have the Admiralty reports cleared up with the British.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean the messages from the British Admiralty?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; to our Navy.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, those, as I told you in our conversation yesterday, Senator, ought to go through clearance.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I say. I ask you now to get them cleared so we can clear up this point.

Mr. MITCHELL. You were going to give me a list of those you wanted cleared so we could narrow it down as much as possible.

It is quite a job to send messages to England and to get the British Government to clear the message.

Senator FERGUSON. I think you can clear that up later.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right, we will try.

Now, General Gerow, getting back to another subject, I show you a document dated December 30, 1940, signed by Admiral Bloch, addressed to the Chief of Naval Operations [2637] which is already introduced in evidence here, which is a report by Admiral Bloch on the problem of aircraft raids on Hawaii. It bears the endorsement of Admiral Richardson, who forwarded it under date of January 7.

Do you remember whether you ever saw that? It went to the Chief of Naval Operations and not to the War Department?

General GEROW. I do not recall having seen that at the time, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The record shows that the document I referred to is part of exhibit 9.

I call your attention now to exhibit 10, which is a letter from Secretary Knox to the Secretary of War, dated January 24, 1941, and part of the same exhibit, a letter dated February 7, 1941, from the Secretary of War Stimson to the Secretary of the Navy, in which, to refresh your memory, Secretary Knox said that the dangers at Pearl Harbor in the order of their probability, were—

1. Air bombing attack;
2. Airtorpedo plane attack;
3. Sabotage.

Do you remember having seen that correspondence?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I did see it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember whether, as the result [2638] of the correspondence so instituted and during the year 1941, following this correspondence, various reports and plans were made dealing with air defense at Pearl Harbor?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. There has been offered in evidence here a book containing extracts from various plans, not joint plans but United States Army and Navy plans having to do with the defense of Pearl Harbor against air attack.

I think this document itself, which the committee has, was not offered as an exhibit, but extracts of it were read into the record.

I think it advisable at this time to mark as exhibit 44 this document which is entitled "Copies of Defense Plans" and contains extracts from various basic Army and Navy plans dealing directly with the question of defense against air attack.

The CHAIRMAN. Let it be filed as exhibit 44.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 44.")

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you a copy of this document before you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you produced here the various plans on which this document, Exhibit 44, is based, as listed in [2639] the index in 13 items, that is, the War Department part of it?

General GEROW. I do not understand the question, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you checked these basic plans that have been produced here against the index?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of Exhibit 44?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are 13 items in the list of contents. Have you checked these documents against the index?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are all the documents that are listed in this index present here? You have checked them, haven't you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will ask you to look at them and just state generally, as you go over each item, what they are. The first is extracts from joint Army and Navy basic war plan—orange (1938); is that right?

General GEROW. This is the joint Army and Navy basic war plan—orange, 1938, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does that mean?

General GEROW. That means it is a war plan that pertains specifically to operations against Japan. Japan was known as "orange." [2640]

Mr. MITCHELL. And item 2, extracts from joint Army and Navy basic war plan—Rainbow No. 1, what is that?

General GEROW. This document is the joint Army and Navy basic war plan, Rainbow No. 1.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is Rainbow No. 1? Can you tell us what the relation of it is to the other plans, or something of that kind?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. If I might refer to the document, I can give the scope of the plan, rather than from memory.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I want you to do.

Mr. KEEFE. Why not do the same thing with respect to the orange plan?

Mr. MITCHELL. Start with orange, and tell the committee, in a general way, so we can orient these various plans and understand what they were and what their relations were to each other.

General GEROW. This joint Army and Navy basic war plan, orange, 1938, constitutes the basis upon which all Army plans, orange, and all Navy plans, orange, and all joint plans, orange, and all supporting allocations for an orange war shall be formulated and developed.

[2641] Orange, as I stated, was the code name for Japan. The document contains assumptions with regard to such a war, the concept of the war, the means assigned jointly to the Army and Navy and means assigned to each of the Army and Navy forces; joint decisions that were made by the Joint Board approving this plan; categories of defense.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, that plan covered any sort of operations in that area in a war with Japan?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; limited to the Pacific area.

Mr. MITCHELL. Limited to the Pacific?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And that, of course, included Hawaii?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. As part of the area?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, give us the same information about Rainbow No. 1, which is the second item. What is the date of Rainbow No. 1?

General GEROW. Rainbow No. 1, sir, was approved on August 14, by the Acting Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. August 14, what year?

General GEROW. 1939, and August 14, 1939, by the Acting Secretary of War. This document was prepared prior [2642] to my assignment to duty in the War Plans Division.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand that. I am asking you, as a War Plans man, to tell the committee in a very general way, what that plan dealt with, and what its relation was to orange, 1938.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

The general situation on which this plan was based, was that at the time this directive was issued, the European war was in progress, which may involve other nations, and expand the field of military action.

There is an ever present possibility of the United States being drawn into this war. There is also the possibility that peace in Europe may be followed by a situation in which the United States will be forced to defend without allies the integrity of the Monroe Doctrine and our interest in the Pacific.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that plan cover operations in the Atlantic and Pacific?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does it assume a possible engagement with Japan?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I should like to read the reference to the special situation on which it was based, sir.

[2643] Mr. MITCHELL. All right.

General GEROW. Special situation for Rainbow No. 1 [reading]:

The termination of the war in Europe is followed by a violation of the letter or spirit of the Monroe Doctrine in South America by Germany and Italy. This is coupled with armed aggression by Japan against United States interest in the Far East. Other nations are neutral.

The purpose of the plan was "to provide for the most effective use of naval and military forces to defeat enemy objectives, particularly those in the territory and waters of the Western Hemisphere north of the approximate latitude 13 degrees south. This plan will restrict initially the projection of U. S. armed forces to the American Continents and their outlying islands, north of 13 degrees south latitude, and to the United States possessions in the Pacific westward to include Unalaska and Midway. This plan will visualize the subsequent extension of United States control into the western Pacific as rapidly as possible, consistent with the accomplishment of United States objectives in the Western Hemisphere, but no plan for such extension of operations will be prepared at this time."

Mr. MITCHELL. Go to the third item in the joint Army and Navy basic war plan, Rainbow No. 5; please look at that [2644] and give us the date of that and briefly just what the scope of that plan is, or was?

General GEROW. This plan was approved on November 19, 1941, by the Chief of Staff and the Chief of Naval Operations. I think I can best describe this plan by reading from the plan the general assumptions on which it was based, and that is:

That the associated powers, comprising initially the United States, the British Commonwealth (less Eire), China, and the "Free French" are at war against the Axis powers, comprising either:

- a. Germany, Italy, Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, or
- b. Germany, Italy, Japan, Roumania, Hungary, Bulgaria, Indochina, and Thailand.

That the associated powers will conduct the war in accord with ABC-1 and ABC-22.

That even if Japan, Indochina and Thailand are not initially in the war, the possibility of their intervention must be taken into account.

That United States forces which might base in the Far East Area will be able to fill logistic requirements other than personnel, ammunition, and technical materials, from sources in that general region.

That Latin American republics will take measures to [2645] control subversive elements, but will remain in a nonbelligerent status unless subjected to direct attack; in general the territorial waters and land bases of these republics will be available for use by United States forces for purposes of Hemisphere defense.

Those were the assumptions on which this plan was based.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, turn to the next item, extracts from War Department Operation Plan—Rainbow No. 5. What is that?

General GEROW. After the joint Army and Navy basic war plans were prepared, the Army and Navy then separately prepared their own plans, based on that joint plan. This War Department Operations Plan, Rainbow No. 5 of 1941, is the Army plan that was prepared, based on the joint Army and Navy basic plan—Rainbow No. It contains many of the statements that are contained in the basic plan. It contains the concept of the war, the assumptions under which the war will be fought, the means of allotment of forces, the directions to subordinate commanders to prepare subordinate plans, the coordination that must be had with other departments of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. It includes in its scope the area of the Hawaiian Islands, does it?

General GEROW. It does; yes, sir.

[2646] Mr. MITCHELL. Did you give the date of that?

General GEROW. This document does not contain on it the date of approval, but I am sure it was in August 1941, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Exhibit 44 has a note on it "Approved by the Chief of Staff, August 1941."

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I think I have that somewhere in my documents.

Mr. MITCHELL. Never mind. That is near enough.

General GEROW. I know it was sent out to Hawaii in August 1941, and the receipt was received back from the War Department on September 3, 1941.

Mr. MITCHELL. The next item here is extracts from Hawaiian Defense Project, Revision 1940. Will you look at that and tell us the scope and nature of that document, and the date?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. This document was prepared initially in Hawaii. It is a local plan based on the War Department plan which I have just discussed.

Mr. MITCHELL. A plan worked out by the local commanders in 1940?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. By the commanding officer of the Hawaiian Department?

[2647] General GEROW. By the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the Commander of the Fourteenth Naval District?

General GEROW. No, sir; this is not a joint plan. This is an Army plan. It is a little different from a plan, sir. It is what we call a defense project.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see.

General GEROW. It contains the objective to be accomplished, but is primarily directed toward setting up the means that are required to carry out that war mission in considerable detail.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask of the General: You say this was in 1940, and based on that previous item which you have just discussed which seems to have been approved in August 1941. Is not there some divergence as to dates?

General GEROW. This defense project is prepared annually and revised annually. This is the 1940 edition. The 1941 edition had not been completed at that time, but the orange plan of 1938 and the rainbow plan No. 1, contained the war missions for Hawaii, and those plans were taken together with the other data with which to revise the defense project which was in existence at that time, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The next item is joint coastal frontier defense plan, Hawaii. What is that? [2648]

General GEROW. This is a joint plan that is prepared by the local commanders in Hawaii, Army and Navy, based on the joint plans, Army and Navy plans furnished by the War Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the date of it?

General GEROW. This document was approved at the Headquarters of the Hawaiian Department, the 11th of April 1941, and Headquarters Fourteenth Naval District, 11th of April 1941.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that that document is in Exhibit 44, set forth in full, not a mere extract of it. The whole thing is in this exhibit 44.

The next item is No. 7, annex No. VII, to joint coastal frontier defense plan, Hawaii. What is the date of that, and what is it?

General GEROW. Will you repeat that question, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. The next item is annex No. VII to joint coastal frontier defense plan, Hawaii. What is that document, the nature of it, and the date of it?

General GEROW. Annex No. VII, sir; to that document is a local plan prepared by the Fourteenth Naval District and the Headquarters, Hawaiian Department. It is dated the 28th of March 1941, and covers joint security measures, protection of the fleet and Pearl Harbor base.

[2649] Mr. MITCHELL. The next item in the same volume, No. 8, is the Joint Air Estimate, Hawaii (Martin-Bellinger Agreement).

What exhibit is that?

Mr. GESELL. Forty-four.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you ever see the report dated August 20, 1941, entitled "A Study of the Air Situation in Hawaii"?

Mr. KEEFE. What is the date of that, please?

Mr. MITCHELL. August 20, 1941.

It is entitled "Study of the Air Situation in Hawaii," addressed to the Commanding General of the Army Air Forces, Washington, D. C., through Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department, Fort Shafter, T. H., which has heretofore been marked Exhibit 13. Did you ever see that report?

General GEROW. I cannot recall at this time as having ever seen that report, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the report which considered the vulnerability of Hawaii to an air attack at a time that it would likely come, in the morning, from carriers, and things of that kind, and then went on to estimate the ways of defeating it, and the number of planes that would be required to run a 360° long-range reconnaissance to detect the Jap carriers the evening before.

General GEROW. I have read the document since, just prior to this investigation.

[2650] Mr. MITCHELL. You didn't see it at the time?

General GEROW. At the time I don't recall having seen it, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. No. 9, the next item in the index, "5 November 1941 Standing Operating Procedure, Hawaiian Department."

Will you look at that and tell us what it is?

General GEROW. That document, sir, is contained in the operation orders of the Hawaiian Department dated 1941, sir. It is, as stated, a standing operating procedure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Promulgated by whom?

General GEROW. By the commanding general, Hawaiian Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. On his own, not a direction from Washington?

General GEROW. No, sir; on his own.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that the document in which General Short directed his air alerts 1, 2, 3, or am I wrong about that?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; they are included in this document.

Mr. MITCHELL. Alert 1, sabotage without threat from without, and so on?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you see that document before December 7, 1941?

General GEROW. I don't recall ever having seen it before [2651] December 7. I think the records of the War Department show it came in later in 1942.

Mr. MITCHELL. The 10th item is "Field Order No. 1," and 11, "Extracts from Navy Basic War Plan"; 12, "Pacific Fleet Confidential Letter 2 CL-41."

Those are Navy documents and Admiral Turner can describe them more fully, but just to complete the story here will you look at them and tell us in a general way what the nature of them is?

General GEROW. That is number 10, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. 10, 11 and 12. Ten is the first, "Field Order No. 1 NS (Naval Security), Hawaiian Department." Give the date of it and, if you can from inspection, the general nature of it.

General GEROW. No. 10, sir, "Field Order No. 1 (Naval Security)," is an Army document.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. And it is the operations order as gotten out by the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department. It has no date. It is intended as an order to be put into effect when the emergency arrives.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is No. 11? 11, 12, and 13, they are Navy documents?

General GEROW. No. 11 is a Navy document, sir, based, as [2652] this paper indicates, on Rainbow No. 5.

Mr. MITCHELL. It would be a corresponding document to the Army operations plan on Rainbow 5, similar?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. It was prepared in compliance with the directive contained in the joint Army-Navy basic plan, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The next item is 12, "Pacific Fleet Confidential Letter 2 CL-41 (revised)—Security of Fleet at Base and in Operating Areas."

What is the date of that?

General GEROW. That is dated, sir, October 14, 1941.

Mr. MITCHELL. By whom is that issued or authorized?

General GEROW. The heading shows that it is issued by the Commander of the Pacific Fleet.

Mr. MITCHELL. The 13th item is "Operations Plan No. 1-41. Headquarters Naval Base Defense Force, 14th Naval District."

What is the date of that and by whom issued or authorized?

General GEROW. That is dated 27 February 1941 and is issued by the Headquarters of the Naval Base Defense Force, 14th Naval District, Pearl Harbor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, General Gerow, you have gone over these documents and also you have gone over Exhibit 44 which contains either extracts or complete copies of them, have you not?

[2653] General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And I asked you to prepare on the basis of your study of all these plans a condensed statement giving as a War Plans man, your analysis and conclusions as to the respective functions of the Army and the Navy or the 14th Naval District or the Fleet at Pearl Harbor. Have you done that?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you coordinate that with Admiral Turner who was War Plans Officer in the Navy when you were in the War Plans in the War Department? Did you submit the matter to him and get his consideration of your memorandum, your conclusions?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I took this paper, after I prepared it, over to Admiral Turner and informally discussed it with him and asked him if he concurred, and he said he did, sir, and I furnished him a copy.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you give to the committee the answer to the question I submitted to you? That is, the question is to present to the committee a brief statement of your analysis and conclusions of all these plans with a view to stating what the respective functions of the Army and the Navy were against an air attack in the defense of Oahu.

General GEROW. Yes, sir. May I read from this paper that I have already prepared?

[2654] Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could the record show the date of the request and whether the instrument was written recently?

Mr. GESELL. It has been distributed to all members.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman, but that brings up the question of distributing these papers on the morning. It is just impossible to go through and read these papers while we are listening to a witness. Is it possible to get these papers in the evening and not have them put before us in the morning? This is an example. I have been trying to read these papers and listen to witnesses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can't answer the question.

Senator FERGUSON. Can we get an answer from counsel right now?

Mr. MITCHELL. We got this document late last evening. We have had the mimeographing agencies of about every department of the Government chasing up and down getting these copies out, we have been running them ragged about it, and we are doing the very best we can.

I didn't get this summary, or even a draft of it, from General Gerow until a day or two ago, and then we had to have it mimeographed, and we got it last night.

Senator FERGUSON. How long has counsel had these other papers that were put before us?

[2655] The CHAIRMAN. Might the Chair suggest that we go into other papers at a different time from a time when we are on the verge of hearing General Gerow read the paper that he prepared. You asked when it was prepared and I think that is proper. But let's not go to the other papers.

Senator FERGUSON. We will go back to this one. Did we not have a rule, or at least a semblance of a rule, that we were to get any statements read by a witness 24 hours in advance?

The CHAIRMAN. We had an understanding that where a witness testified from a manuscript we would attempt to get the manuscript at least 24 hours in advance. The Chair does not understand that that applies to a mere memorandum that a witness would use during his testimony which is oral. If the Chair misunderstood, he is subject to correction.

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, this is an answer to a direct question that was given to this witness sometime ago. Why could the committee not have had this answer in advance?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have answered that question. I have stated that I asked the witness to give us his estimate. I didn't know that he wanted to write it out, necessarily, but to come here and testify to it. When he got to work on it he found he could do it better if he put it in memorandum form [2656] and consulted Admiral Turner about it. He did that within the last day or two and we didn't get the statement until late last night. If the committee wants him to state his conclusions orally he will do it. He has asked permission to read this document and comment on it so that his statement may be more accurate and better organized.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, as I understood counsel, the statement was received a day or two ago and then it had to be mimeographed. Did I understand correctly?

Mr. MITCHELL. I don't remember of having seen it at all until yesterday. Yesterday was Tuesday, wasn't it?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator BREWSTER. Don't you have a record—

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to know whether we are examining this witness or cross-examining counsel. I stated we have done our best in this matter and I don't see that counsel's office is under any criticism, proper criticism, in a case like this. You understand the facts fully. The witness was asked to prepare his conclusions and an analysis of those plans as to the respective responsibilities of the Army and Navy. He went to work on it. At the last minute he wanted to put it in writing so that he could read it. He having put it in that shape we wanted to have it mimeographed so that the committee could follow it. It was done late last evening [2657] and delivered last night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that General Gerow proceed to read his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Maine.

Senator BREWSTER. I think this thing should be clarified. I gather from what has been said that it may be that additional help is required to enable counsel to perform what the committee agreed was most desirable.

I have followed the practice with every document which I have received from counsel of noting not only the date but the hour. That practice is followed in all Government departments. I would like to know the day and hour when this document was received. And then, if counsel has not adequate mimeographing assistance, with all the facilities of the Government at his disposal, we ought to see that he gets more.

This is an illustration of what can be found in connection with Pearl Harbor, that they didn't have adequate help. We agreed we needed these things in advance. I see no reason why the committee shouldn't provide whatever facilities are necessary to do that in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know how many mimeographing outfits there are in Washington. All those that are available for our use are being utilized, I understand, for that purpose.

[2658] The Chair does not think that a memorandum, in the midst of oral testimony, comes within the rule that we provided for that in advance manuscript testimony should be furnished to the committee 24 hours in advance, or any other length of time in advance.

General Miles the other day read a memorandum which he wanted to read in the midst of his oral testimony and no question was raised about it. The Chair thinks General Gerow should be permitted to read this memorandum if he thinks it is more accurate than he could give it orally.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. As a suggestion, it is now 5 minutes to 12. I suggest that we recess at this point and that will give the members 2 hours to read this memorandum which is now before them and we can meet at 2 o'clock and hear General Gerow read it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Gesell reminds me also that one of the difficulties we are up against right now is, as indicated by this situation, due to the complete disarrangement of our order of proof.

General Gerow was not on the list until we got through with General Miles. Admiral Wilkinson and Admiral Turner also came ahead of him. We had to jam him on the stand today in order to give some basic material as a basis for General Marshall's testimony.

[2659] If General Gerow had come in his regular order we would not have this situation. We must take that into account.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee undoubtedly understands that it has been necessary to improvise due to the change of schedule, which is due to General Marshall's appearance this week.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I make a short statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. The statement about which so much fuss is being made is 6½ pages. Substantially all of what the witness has covered has been in the hands of the committee for over 2 weeks.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I suggest that we recess.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12 o'clock noon, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

[2660]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.
Counsel will proceed with General Gerow.

TESTIMONY OF LT. GEN. LEONARD TOWNSEND GEROW (RESUMED)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add something to my statement this morning. Since the noon recess, at half past twelve I received a report from the State Department. They heard from the British and Dutch about the intercept messages.

I reported this morning the Australians reported they did not get any such message, and that the British reported they haven't, but that report was not quite complete. They say some message got into Singapore 6 hours after the Pearl Harbor attack, and we are taking steps to get the text of that, to see what kind of message it was.

The Dutch said they haven't.

I also should have said this morning that the FBI have reported to us they have no trace of ever having had it, and having it in their file.

About this difficulty about mimeographing, I want to state additions to my staff would not help us any. It is a question of getting the mimeographing and photostatic equipment and the trained men. We are using now the mimeographing [2661] and photostatic equipment and personnel of the Navy Department, and that in the War Department, and the central mimeographing and photostatic equipment, and if there are any other mimeographs stationed around that I could get hold of I would be glad to take possession of it.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the committee be presented with that information? I have in mind the exact information that comes in on this so-called winds message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I have not had it mimeographed because it is not complete. I wanted to do a complete job and hand it all to the committee in advance of our proposed arrangement to have the winds message taken up as a special order.

I have now one report from the FBI, and I have letters from the State Department. I have one copy, I think, and maybe more, and I think that has been mimeographed, of the report from General MacArthur. I will give you mimeographed copies as we get them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the counsel is now reporting informally but later he will give the committee the official report to which he referred.

Mr. MITCHELL. The only reason I brought this up this morning was that once before I was criticized by allowing certain members of the committee to proceed in an examination that assumed certain facts to be so when I had information in [2662] my possession and kept quiet on it, so that they were proceeding on a false assumption. I was merely trying to aid the committee so they can guide their own questions and not make assumptions of fact which might not turn out to be so.

I also did it because, as I say, before General Marshall was called we expected to give the committee the full record on the thing, and, not being able to do it, I thought I ought to make an attempt, at least, to show the state of the inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee appreciates that.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, the thing that disturbs me, as a member of the committee, is the fact—and it can be indicated here—that counsel has drawn certain conclusions. I am unwilling to draw any conclusions at this time, until the committee has all of the sworn testimony and evidence before it.

I am quite disturbed over the fact that, on this particular evidence, it appears that counsel is drawing certain conclusions at this particular moment, prior to the committee getting the exact evidence upon which those conclusions are drawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that he hopes, and I am sure the whole committee hopes, that the committee as a whole and as individual members will draw no conclusions about any phase of this investigation until the whole testimony [2663] is in. The Chair understood counsel to be merely trying to bring the committee up to date as of today, in view of the disarrangement of the program and schedule made necessary by General Marshall's earlier appearance. The chairman did not understand that counsel was drawing any conclusions, except reporting up to this hour, or up to this morning, what had been found or had not been found in regard to official records and documents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did say this, Senator, I said on the record as it stood up to date I had grave doubts as to whether the winds intercept messages, indicating war with the United States, had ever been sent out, and I expressly reserve the right to change my view after I have heard all the rest of the testimony on it.

Now, I do not think a man is going to be blamed for having serious doubt, on the present state of the record, about it. I am guilty of that, I admit, for whatever it is worth. I never got this far in a lawsuit before without having some idea of what the probabilities of the case were. I do not think I would be worth anything as a lawyer if I didn't.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the committee understands that any of our doubts, or I might say any of our preconceived notions can be subject to change in view of evidence that may be brought to the committee, and therefore we have all proceeded [2664] on the theory that we are open-minded on any proposition respecting this investigation until the whole evidence is in.

At any stage of the hearing we may have some doubts about something that has been done up to date, but we will not make up our minds until all the evidence is completed.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether or not the difficulty does not arise somewhat from the unusual relationship of the counsel in this hearing. We all more or less recognize our places. I take it that the counsel necessarily takes a position that this hearing is quasi-judicial, so that his expression of opinion in this fashion, before the evidence is all in, does have a little anticipatory aspect.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Senator BREWSTER. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. It will undoubtedly be overcome by evidence that any such message was received.

1012 CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, let us hear the witness.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will proceed with the witness.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, you were about to give a statement of your summary of the respective functions of the Army and the Navy at Oahu under the existing plans with respect to defense in an air attack.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is, the plans up to December 7, 1941.

[2665] General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you please do that.

General GEROW. Yes, sir. [Reading:]

1. The broad responsibilities of the Army and Navy in Hawaii were contained in Army and Navy war plans prepared and issued to the Army and Navy Commanders in Hawaii. These responsibilities were expressed in the various plans in terms of joint missions and separate Army and Navy missions. With the exception as indicated below, these missions are stated identically in all war plans current in 1941, as follows:

JOINT MISSION

To hold Oahu as a main outlying Naval Base, and to control and protect shipping in the Coastal Zone.

NAVY MISSION

To patrol the Coastal Zone and to control and protect shipping therein; to support the Army forces.

ARMY MISSION

To hold Oahu against attacks by land, sea and air forces, and against hostile sympathizers; to support the Naval forces.

2. In the most recent plan the phrase in the Army mission "to support the Naval Forces" was deleted, and the following was substituted: "Support Naval Forces in the [2666] protection of the sea communications of the Associated Powers and in the destruction of Axis sea communications by offensive action against enemy forces or commerce located within tactical operating radius of occupied air bases."

That is the statement of the Army mission as it appears in Rainbow 5.

I desire to invite the attention of the committee to:

3. It should be noted that in all cases the missions called for mutual support.

4. Based on these broad missions the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, and the Navy Commander in Hawaii agreed to accept certain responsibilities for defense against air attack. These agreements are to be found in the various local joint plans and the separate plans of the Army and Navy in Hawaii. The basic current plans in Hawaii on December 7, 1941 were: The Joint Coastal Frontier Defense Plan, Hawaiian Coastal Frontier, 1941, and the Army and Navy Operations Orders and agreements based thereon. These plans and agreements contain the following major provisions pertaining to defense against air attack:

I shall discuss, first, antiaircraft defense.

The responsibility of the Army for antiaircraft defense was as follows:

Army—(1) "Shall provide for: a. The * * * anti- [2667] aircraft defense of Oahu."

(2) Army Antiaircraft, "supported by Naval Units placed under the tactical control of the Army, will operate to defend Oahu from attacks by hostile aircraft."

(3) The Army, "Arrange for such coordination of the antiaircraft artillery fire of naval ships in Pearl Harbor and the Army antiaircraft defense as may be practicable."

The Navy's responsibility was:

"The Pacific Fleet and the Fourteenth Naval District * * * are taking certain security measures, which include:

"(d) The organization of four air defense groups for the control and distribution of the antiaircraft fire of all ships anchored in Pearl Harbor. * * *

In the event of a hostile air attack, any part of the Fleet in Pearl Harbor plus all Fleet aviation shorebased on Oahu, will augment the local air defense.

"The Commandant, Fourteenth Naval District * * * shall: (a) exercise with the Army joint supervisory control over the defense against air attack. (b) Arrange with the Army to have their antiaircraft guns emplaced." * * *

"(d) Coordinate Fleet antiaircraft fire with the base defense."

I have drawn some conclusions from those different agreements. They are mine.

[2668] I believe that the commanders on the ground that made these agreements are in a much better position to interpret them, and say exactly what their intentions were at the time, than I am, but these are the conclusions that I have drawn from those paragraphs:

The orders and agreements on the part of the local Army and Navy Commanders lead to the conclusion primary responsibility for antiaircraft defense rested with the Army but that the Navy had a secondary responsibility in connection therewith.

I go next to the Aircraft Warning Service.

The responsibility of the Army for antiaircraft warning service was:

(1) The Army "shall provide for: * * *

b. "An antiaircraft * * * intelligence and warning service."

The Navy responsibility was:

During the period prior to the completion of the aircraft warning service installation, the Navy, through use of radar, and other appropriate means will endeavor to give such warning of hostile attacks that may be practicable."

My conclusion with regard to the aircraft warning service is as follows:

The Army had primary responsibility for the establishment of an aircraft warning service. [2669] The Navy, however, agreed to furnish such means as it had, pending the installation of the Army facilities then under construction.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that relate to what we have called radar, or is it broader than that?

General GEROW. It relates to radar, sir.

I might say in that connection that I understand that the radar on Navy ships is not particularly effective when there is an intervening terrain obstacle. It is all right across the water, but not so effective when close to an intervening article.

Aircraft defense: I have broken it down into three phases; the reconnaissance phase, the defensive air phase, and the offensive air phase. I state first the reconnaissance phase.

The responsibility of the Army:

(1) "Shall provide for:

* * *

"Establishment of an inshore aerial patrol of the waters of the Oahu Defensive Coastal Area in cooperation with the Naval Inshore Patrol."

The responsibility of the Navy:

(1) Navy "shall provide for: a. An inshore patrol. b. An offshore patrol * * * i. Distant reconnaissance.

[2670] (2) "When naval forces are insufficient for long distance patrol and search operations, and Army aircraft are made available, these aircraft will be under the tactical control of the naval commander directing the search operations."

Defensive air, I shall discuss next.

The Army's responsibility for defensive air operations is:

The Army was responsible for:

b. "Defensive air operations over and in the immediate vicinity of Oahu will be executed under the tactical command of the Army."

The Navy responsibilities were.

(1) "Each commander will * * * make available without delay to the other commander such proportion of the air forces at his disposal as the circumstances warrant."

(2) "With due consideration to the tactical situation existing, the number of fighter aircraft released to Army control will be the maximum practicable."

I turn now to offensive air operations.

The Army will:

"g. Support of naval aircraft forces in major offensive operations at sea within range of Army bombers."

The Navy's responsibility—

[2671] Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, may we have order?

I can't hear the witness for the buzzing that is on the right.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

General GEROW. The Navy responsibilities. The Navy:

(1) "Shall provide for * * * j. Attacking enemy naval forces."

(2) "Joint air attacks upon hostile surface vessels will be executed under the tactical command of the Navy."

My conclusions, as to the responsibility for aircraft operations in defense of Oahu against attack from aircraft are as follows:

The Navy was primarily responsible for close and distant aerial reconnaissance and offensive air operations against hostile surface craft. The Army was primarily responsible for defensive air operations. Regardless of the service primarily responsible, the opposite service was charged with supporting the operation within the means available to it.

To summarize, it will be seen from the above analysis that:

(a) Definite plans and agreements existed in Hawaii for defense against aircraft;

(b) Although the Army had the primary responsibility [2672] for anti-aircraft defense, aircraft warning service and defensive air operations and the Navy had the primary responsibility for close and distant reconnaissance, and offensive air operations, each service was charged with augmenting the forces of the other with the means available to them in order to provide the maximum effective defense.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, returning for a moment to these three joint plans, the Singapore plan, the British conversations, and the Canadian plan that we took up this morning, were any deployments, or steps ever taken by the United States prior to December 7 to put any of those plans into operation? December 7, 1941. You told us that the British and Dutch plans were never approved and only the Canadian had been finally approved. I want to know whether approved or not approved, the United States ever put those plans, or any part of them into effect before December 7, the joint plans, if you know?

General GEROW. I don't believe, sir, I can answer that question offhand. We certainly made some preliminary dispositions so we would be prepared to carry out those plans but without studying the history of the orders prior to December 7, sir, I prefer not to answer that question.

[2673] Mr. MITCHELL. You will kindly look that up for us so that when you return to the stand after General Marshall has testified you may be able to answer, please.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Could any of these other nations, as you read these joint plans, put them into effect without the consent of the United States, so as at any time to obligate or make necessary that the United States do likewise?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, in this matter of preparation of war plans, whether our own plans or jointly with some other nation, has it been the practice of the War Plans Division from time immemorial to make all sorts of plans about war operations on the contingency that some day or other we might be involved in hostilities with other nations?

General GEROW. Oh, yes, sir. We had at all times kept current plans for operations against any major power or combination of major powers, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is, you didn't make any distinction, generally, between those we were friendly with and those we were unfriendly with. Do you have plans against everybody practically?

General GEROW. Yes, sir, at one time I think we had plans against most everybody, sir, and I think that is the [2674] practice of every general staff of every nation.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is partly a matter of training in drawing plans and partly a matter of being ready if trouble comes; is that it?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And that is especially true, of course, in the situation where our foreign relations with any particular nation are becoming tense?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. We concentrate then on a particular plan that pertains to that nation.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the General Staff did not do that and got caught without any plans if hostilities started, it would be a rather sickly situation for the General Staff, would it not?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. We would be accused of neglecting our duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to this pink book, telegraph messages between the War Department and Hawaii from July 8 to December 7, 1941. It has been offered in evidence as Exhibit 32. You have examined that, have you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Could you tell us whether you knew about those messages or had copies available to you at or about the time they were sent, what the practice was about that?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I knew about most of these [2675] messages. There are one or two that I didn't know about, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can you identify those that you didn't know about?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I do not believe that I had the copy of the message referred to in this document at page 19, sir, dated the 4th of December.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is a dispatch from the commanding general at Hawaii to the Chief of the Army Air Corps; is that the one you refer to?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; on page 19, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. How did these dispatches come to you? Some of them you participated in preparing, did you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. Some of them are what might be called joint messages prepared by the war plans of both the Army and Navy working together. Others were messages that were prepared in the War Department for submission to the Chief of Staff for approval.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Counsel, if I may interject, this exhibit you are now referring to, the folder I have shows December 10. That must be an error.

Mr. MITCHELL. What page?

Senator LUCAS. Page 19. Exhibit 32. Is that the correct date?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

[2676] Senator LUCAS. That came after the Pearl Harbor attack.

Mr. GESELL. There is an earlier message, Senator Lucas, from General Short, which appears earlier. This one, however, I think, was dated December 10.

Senator LUCAS. All right. I apologize for interrupting.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead.

Mr. GESELL. That may have been sent somewhat earlier. I think the December 10 date is the arrival date.

Mr. MITCHELL. It says on it, "Received December 10."

Mr. MURPHY. It says, at the beginning, "December 4, No. 1033." "No. 1033 December 4th." Right below "Chief Army Air Corps," top of the page on the left.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir. Sent on the 4th, received on the 10th.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

[2677] Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, on November 21, 1941, I understand you attended a conference with Secretary Hull, Admiral Stark, and Messrs. Hornbeck, Hamilton, and Ballantine, of the State Department, and I will ask you to refer to your memorandum of November 21 to the Secretary of State, part of Exhibit 18. Have you that before you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have that exhibit, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was a memorandum you made of the conference that was held on the 21st, was it, at the time you made it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And it correctly records the proceedings at the meeting as you remembered them on the 24th of November 1941?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Why don't you read it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Shall I read it? It is in evidence.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a memorandum to the Chief of Staff. "Subject: Far Eastern Situation," dated November 24, 1941, and signed by General Gerow. It says [reading from Exhibit No. 18]:

A conference was held in the State Department at 9:45 a. m., November 21, 1941. Present: Secretary Hull, Dr. Hornbeck, Mr. Hamilton, Admiral Stark, and representatives to express their informal views from a military standpoint on a draft of a tentative outline of a basis for agreement with Japan. (Tab A.) He explained that the outline was in a formative stage and had not been adopted by the State Department.

The various provisions were discussed. Both Admiral Stark and General Gerow were of the opinion that, in general; the document was satisfactory from a military viewpoint. They requested, however, an opportunity to make a more detailed study of its possible effect on the military situation. It was agreed that comments would be submitted early the same afternoon.

The comments of Admiral Stark (Tab B) and my own (Tab C) are attached. I informed Admiral Stark verbally that I regretted the reference to Army forces in the Navy comments on provisions A 1. I feel that no restrictions should be placed on Army's preparations to make the Philippines secure.

I informed the Secretary of War and General Dryden verbally of the conference.

(Signed) L. T. GEROW,
Brigadier General.

Do you remember what that related to?

[2679] General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was it? That is, the document that Secretary Hull said was a tentative outline of a basis for agreement with Japan?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; it was a proposal, a tentative draft proposal for delivery to Japan of a modus vivendi.

Mr. MITCHELL. You got into the modus vivendi picture at that time then, did you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you make a subsequent memorandum for the Secretary of State on that subject?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or was it an earlier one?

General GEROW. I made one the same afternoon of the conference, November the 21st, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see. The memorandum I just read to you to the Chief of Staff was made on the 24th and related to the conference on the 21st. Now, the memorandum I am just calling your attention to was made on the same day as the conference, was it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. It was agreed we would put in our views on the State Department paper that same afternoon, sir.

[2680] Mr. MITCHELL. And this one I have just referred to is your view on that?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. As you made it then?

General GEROW. The one dated November the 21st.

Mr. MITCHELL. That has been offered but not read. Shall I read it?

The CHAIRMAN. Read it; yes.

Mr. KEEFE. What is the exhibit number?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was part of Exhibit 18. There were several documents together.

Mr. KEEFE. All right.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a memorandum for the Secretary of State. Maybe you should take a shot at it.

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I will read it.

Senator FERGUSON. May I interrupt? Both are part of Exhibit 18?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

1018 CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead, General.

General GEROW. This is a memorandum headed [reading from Exhibit No. 18]:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WAR DEPARTMENT GENERAL STAFF,
WAR PLANS DIVISION.
Washington, November 21, 1941.

[2681]

Memorandum for the Secretary of State.
Subject: Far Eastern Situation.

War Plans Division has made a hasty study from a military viewpoint of your tentative "Outline of Proposed Bases for Agreement between the United States and Japan," and perceives no objection to its use as a basis for discussion. The adoption of its provisions would attain one of our present major objectives—the avoidance of war with Japan. Even a temporary peace in the Pacific would permit us to complete defensive preparations in the Philippines and at the same time insure continuance of material assistance to the British—both of which are highly important.

The foregoing should not be construed as suggesting strict adherence to all the conditions outlined in the proposed agreement. War Plans Division wishes to emphasize it is of grave importance to the success of our war effort in Europe that we reach a modus vivendi with Japan.

War Plans Division suggests the deletion of paragraph B.—5. The proposal contained in that paragraph would probably be entirely unacceptable to Russia. The geo- [2682] graphical lay-out in the Manchurian-Siberian area is such that military time and space factors are all in favor of Japan. Furthermore, it would be most difficult to reach an agreement as to what are "equivalent forces" and the measures to be taken to insure that no unauthorized increases are made in those forces. Such an arrangement would increase the vulnerability of the Russian position, particularly in the Maritime Provinces, and at the same time remove the very real threat to Japanese cities of the Russian air bases therein. From the United States viewpoint, it is greatly to our advantage to have the possibility of access to Siberian airfields securely guarded by a potential ally.

The paper has been considered as a whole. If major changes are made in its provisions, it is requested that the War Department be given an opportunity to consider the military aspects of such changes.

The Chief of Staff is out of the city and consequently this paper has not been presented for his consideration. War Plans Division believes that he would concur in the views expressed above.

(Signed) L. T. GEROW,
Brigadier General,
Acting Assistant Chief of Staff.

[2683] Mr. MITCHELL. Now, you had a meeting again on November 24. General Marshall, Admiral Stark, Under Secretary Welles, and yourself, and possibly others, were present. Have you any memorandum of that meeting? Do you have a record of such a meeting? Do you remember anything about it?

General GEROW. I cannot recall at this time, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, now, at this meeting on the 21st, when this proposed modus vivendi message was under consideration, do you remember the discussions that took place at that meeting beyond your memorandums?

General GEROW. No, sir. The memorandum would be much more correct than my memory at this time, sir. I cannot recall the details.

Mr. MITCHELL. During your conferences with the State Department people about the modus vivendi, do you recollect having had your attention called to a message from Mr. Churchill in which he said it was all right with Great Britain, but how about the Chinese, and it was rather thin diet for the Chinese? Do you remember having brought to your attention the message from Chiang Kai-shek in which he protested against the modus vivendi because it would result in the collapse of the Chinese Army and defense? Do you remember anything about that?

General GEROW. I do not recall this message; no, sir. [2684] I attended this particular conference in the absence of the Chief of Staff, and that may have been discussed at some other conference at which I was not present. I do not recall that, however.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have more than one meeting that you attended with State Department people—here was Welles, of the State Department, not Mr. Hull—that dealt with this modus vivendi? Can you recall more than the one?

General GEROW. I can only recall the one, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, did you know at the time that the modus vivendi idea was going to be abandoned?

General GEROW. I do not recall that I knew that, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have a part in drafting the warning message sent by the War Department to General Short on November 27, 1941?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. What function had the War Plans Division in sending a message of that character?

General GEROW. It was the responsibility of War Plans Division to prepare such draft messages for consideration of the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, now, do I understand that it was not your function to send merely information messages? Weren't you confined to sending messages that had to do with [2685] active operations or orders?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. The responsibilities of War Plans Division were confined to operational messages. The sending of purely information was the responsibility of the G-2 Intelligence Section, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So the reason that you were brought into this warning message was because it had something in it that directed some deployments or action on the part of the addressee; was that it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. It would require operations on the part of the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you your memorandum of November 27, 1941, to the Chief of Staff about that? Do you have a copy of it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I have a photostat copy of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will mark that Exhibit 45. It has not yet been introduced. I offer it.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. It has been distributed?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. It was distributed yesterday, Congressman Cooper.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. It may be received.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 45" and follows.)

[2686] Mr. MITCHELL. Will you please read that memorandum that you wrote to the Chief of Staff? Read all the notes at the top of it as well.

1020 CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

General GEROW. Yes, sir. [Reading:]

WAR DEPARTMENT
WAR DEPARTMENT GENERAL STAFF
War Plans Division

WASHINGTON.
WPD 4544-13.

Mr. MITCHELL. How does the first sentence start out so I can be sure I have the same thing?

General GEROW. "The Secretary of War sent for me."

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it. Well, you read the photostat then.

General GEROW. Very well, sir.

Dated 11/27/41. Initials "C. A. G." Dated November 27, 1941. There is a number "4544-13." Under that, "November the 28th, 1941. Noted: Chief of Staff" with initials that I cannot decipher. Also "Noted: Deputy Chief of Staff," with the same initials which I cannot decipher. [Reading from Exhibit No. 45:]

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:
Subject: Far Eastern Situation.

1. The Secretary of War sent for me about 9:30 a. m., November 27, 1941. General Bryden was present. [2687] The Secretary wanted to know what warning messages have been sent to General MacArthur and what were proposed. I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November 24. I then showed him a copy of the draft message you discussed at the Joint Board meeting. He told me he had telephoned both Mr. Hull and the President this morning. Mr. Hull stated the conversations had been terminated with the barest possibility of resumption. The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines. I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

2. Later in the morning, I attended a conference with the Secretary of War, Secretary of Navy, and Admiral Stark. The various messages to the Army and Navy Commanders and to Mr. Sayre were discussed. A joint message for General MacArthur and Admiral Hart was approved (copy attached). The Secretaries were informed of the proposed memorandum you and Admiral Stark directed be prepared for the President. The Secretary of War wanted to be sure that the memorandum would not be construed as a recommendation to the President that he request Japan to reopen the conversations. He was reassured on that point. It was agreed that the memorandum would be shown to both Secretaries before dispatch.

[2688] 3. Both the message and the memorandum were shown to the Secretary of War. He suggested some minor changes in the memorandum. These were made (copy attached).

(Signed) L. T. GEROW,
Brigadier General,
Acting Chief of Staff.

Then there is a notation, "Filed in O. C. S." "2 Incls: Memo. for President, 11-27-41; Memo. for TAG, 11-27-41."

And then written in: "Copy in General Gerow's book" and initials which I cannot decipher. The figures "11-28." Other figures "—11-27-41."

Then "Memorandum for TAG, 11-27-41." Then written in, "File in OAS record room." Then at the bottom lower right hand corner. "OCS-18" — it appears to be "36-125." Two letters there which I cannot decipher. Then "11-28-41."

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Is this Exhibit 45?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of counsel if that does correctly represent the copy furnished the committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. No. The only difference is these different routings and notations on the bottom of it.

[2689] Senator FERGUSON. But it does show who received it on the photostatic copy but not on the other?

Mr. MITCHELL. The mimeographed copy contains these notations: "Noted: Chief of Staff, November 28" and "Noted: Deputy Chief of Staff" with the same date. The only difference is some of these routings or dates that are immaterial. The notations of who received it are on the mimeograph.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, at this meeting that you spoke about where the Secretary of War sent for you, was there considered at that meeting a draft of a proposed message to Hawaii, Panama, and other places, or only at that time the MacArthur message? Do you remember about that?

General GEROW. The conference was directed primarily to the message to the Philippines and the commanding general of the Far East, but the other messages, as I recall, were discussed and I referred in my memorandum to that fact. There were various messages to the Army and Navy commanders and to Mr. Sayre discussed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can you tell in your own way, independently of this memorandum, just what happened at that meeting, or can you add anything to the memorandum?

General GEROW. I believe now, sir, that I was in the office at the time that the Secretary of War telephoned to the [2690] Secretary of State. I believe that I heard one end of the conversation.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is, you were in the Secretary's office?

General GEROW. In the Secretary of War's office, yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you heard him telephone the Secretary of State?

General GEROW. That is my recollection; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you heard one end of the conversation?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And then what did the Secretary of War report that you remember as to what the other end of the telephone had said?

General GEROW. The Secretary, after he had completed this conversation, stated to me that it is too abrupt to say the negotiations shall terminate, that the Secretary of State won't quite go along with that. "He says to all intents and purposes," I recall, "with the barest possibilities of their being resumed" and based on that I cannot recall whether I noted the exact wording in the message that was sent, or whether the Secretary wrote it down in his own handwriting. I cannot recall at this time, sir.

[2691] Mr. MITCHELL. Well, you are speaking now of the message to the Philippines?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; the message to the Philippines, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, you used that same phrase in your message later to Hawaii, didn't you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. The Philippines message, which was, I know, definitely approved by the Secretary of War, formed a basis for the preparation of the other messages to the other three commanders in the Pacific area.

Mr. MITCHELL. In other words, the War Plans Division took upon itself the task of drafting in its own way the messages to the other commanders on the basis of the one that had been agreed upon for the Philippines, was that what had happened?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; but I cannot recall whether all of them were presented to the Secretary of War later on for approval or not; I cannot recall at this time, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I notice that so far as concerns the dispatch to General Short and the one from the Navy to Admiral Kimmel, the Navy did not put any qualification about negotiations being resumed, did they?

General GEROW. I cannot remember exactly what happened about the Navy message that was sent. I believe it was [2692] written earlier, prior to the conversation that I had with the Secretary of War, and I believe that it might have been sent prior to the dispatch of the message that was sent by War Plans Division.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the Navy was not present then when this conversation between the Secretary of War with Secretary Hull over the telephone took place. Is that your recollection?

General GEROW. No, sir; I believe that the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Stark were both there at the time of that conversation but I cannot be sure, sir. I cannot accurately state whether that was my first conference that I had with the Secretary of War when he called up or the second one, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I will call your attention to this: The message which you drafted for General Marshall, to go over General Marshall's name to the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department says:

Negotiations with Japan appear to be terminated to all practical purposes, with only the barest possibilities that the Japanese Government might come back and offer to continue.

That was put in there at the suggestion of Secretary Stimson after talking with Mr. Hull over the telephone, as I understand it.

[2693] General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, the Navy message of the same date from the Chief of Naval Operations to the commander in chief of the Pacific Fleet says this:

This dispatch is to be considered a war warning. Stop. Negotiations with Japan looking towards stabilization of conditions in the Pacific have ceased and aggressive move by Japan is expected within the next few days.

Now, there is a difference between those and it is evident, I think, that the Navy dispatch did not know anything about the conversation with Mr. Hull or the man who wrote the Navy dispatch. So are you sure that the Navy was present at this conference that you spoke about, which you and General Bryden attended with the Secretary of War?

General GEROW. I am sure that the Navy was not present at the first conference. I am positive that Secretary Knox and Admiral Stark were present at the second conference.

Mr. MITCHELL. You say:

Later in the morning I attended a conference with Secretary of War and Navy and Admiral Stark.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember whether at that second conference at which the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral [2694] Stark were present their attention was called to the fact that Mr. Hull wanted to water down the statement that it was a complete breach or termination of negotiations with Japan? Do you have any recollection about that?

General GEROW. Well, the entire message was discussed. I cannot recall now whether there was any particular reference to that particular sentence.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, do you remember anything further about the discussion other than what you have stated in your memorandum here of November 27, 1941? Does anything come back to you that I haven't asked you about?

General GEROW. No, sir; I cannot remember anything else, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, the original draft of the message that was prepared to send to the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department contained, I understand, some phrase about sabotage, did it not?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you seen Exhibit 36, the photostat copy of the original draft?

General GEROW. I have a photostat copy, sir. I imagine it is the same one that you have, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it. I call your attention to the fact that in this draft, dated November 27, which was a memo- [2695] randum for the Adjutant General through the Secretary of the General Staff, says:

The Secretary of War directs that the following, considered as a priority message, be dispatched by cable, radio, or telegraph to each of the following: Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department; Commanding General of the Caribbean Defense Command.

Then there is a line:

also to the Commanding General of the Western Defense Command.

and that seems to be stricken out.

Do you see that?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And then at the bottom of that page in the draft are these words:

Needed measures for protection against subversive activities should be taken immediately.

A line is drawn through those words and the initials "L. T. G." there. Did you cause both those deletions to be made? The upper one does not seem to be your deletion.

General GEROW. No, sir, the upper one is not my initials, I do not know who made that, sir, but I do positively recall making the deletion which referred to subversive activities, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. How did that, or at whose instance did [2696] that original statement about subversive activities get into the draft, do you know?

General GEROW. No, sir. Some time during the preparation of this message by the officers of War Planes Division under my instructions that phrase was inserted. Whether it was done after a conference with G-2 or not, I do not recall it, but when it was brought to me for approval I objected to the inclusion in the message.

Mr. MITCHELL. On what ground?

General GEROW. This message was intended to warn the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department of the possibility of an attack from without, not against subversive activities, so I asked for a meeting—

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean not only against subversive activities?

General GEROW. Yes, sir, but primarily directed against the possibility of an attack from without.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, except for that sentence that you struck out, there isn't a word in the draft about subversive activities or sabotage?

General GEROW. No, sir. That was primarily a responsibility of G-2, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you state you struck it out because you did not want it limited, is that the idea, or you did not [2697] want any specific danger to be mentioned. What is your recollection about that?

General GEROW. Well, I wanted to be sure that this message would cover only—that this message could be interpreted only as warning the commanding general in Hawaii against an attack from without.

Mr. MITCHELL. So it was stricken out at your suggestion?

General GEROW. At a conference held that afternoon in the office of General Bryden, attended by General Miles and Colonel Bundy and myself, there was quite a considerable discussion. It was finally agreed that the phrase should be stricken out and it was also agreed that General Miles would send a message to G-2 of the Hawaiian Department with regard to being on guard against subversive activities.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, can you remember anything more about the discussion relating to striking out those two lines?

General GEROW. No, sir, except the fact that I did not feel it to be appropriate to include a reference to subversive activities in this War Plans Division operational message.

Mr. MITCHELL. You made that point at the conference, you mean?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

[2698] Mr. MITCHELL. And who urged the other view, if anybody did, that the subversive activities be mentioned in the main dispatch? Do you have any recollection about that?

General GEROW. General Miles felt very strongly, as I recall, sir, that some reference to subversive activities, protection against subversive activities should be transmitted to the commanding general in Hawaii.

Mr. MITCHELL. And it was settled that it should not be in the main warning but would take the form of another sabotage dispatch from the G-2 in Washington to the G-2 officer on General Short's staff?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know at the time of the sending of the second subversive and sabotage message over General Adams' signature and the other one over General Arnold's, at his request? Did you know about those?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I attended a conference with regard to that message, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Whom was the conference with?

General GEROW. As I recall—

Mr. MITCHELL. There are two messages I am referring to, one over Adams' name and the other one over the Chief of the Air Corps' signature.

General GEROW. I do not recall the one over the signature of the Chief of Air Corps. I do recall the one that was sent over the signature of Adams. That was a conference attended by General Miles and, as I recall, General Scanlon and myself. I do not recall who else was present. [2699]

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember the nature of the discussion?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. The discussion revolved, as I recall, largely around the fact that General Miles was concerned that in preventing subversive activities that the military might exceed authority and cause some difficulties.

Mr. MITCHELL. That the military might what?

General GEROW. Might apply—

Mr. MITCHELL. Illegal measures?

General GEROW. Well, not illegal measures, no, sir, but measures that might antagonize the—

Mr. MITCHELL. People?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I am not clear in my mind, sir, on that particular message because that was a G-2 responsibility and I was called into that conference only incidentally.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, do you remember anything about the other message, sabotage messages that went forward over General Arnold's signature?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was addressed to the commanding general of the Hawaiian Department? [2700]

General GEROW. No, sir; I do not recall that message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under date of November 28. It was sent over General Adams' signature, but the last two words are "Signed—Arnold." That would be an Air Corps message?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I do not recall being in on the preparation of that message, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have referred to you for examination the reports of the various commanders to whom these warning messages had been sent, the Army commanders?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. Those reports came over my desk, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You saw the report from General Short on November 28, 1941, 5:57 a. m.? Would that be Honolulu time?

General GEROW. May I find the report, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is on page 12 of exhibit 32, the pink book covering telegraph messages between the War Department and Hawaii. Do you have it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. 5:37 a. m. That means Honolulu time as you understand it?

General GEROW. I do not know, sir. That is put on by the Signal Corps and I do not know, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see. That report reads this way:

[2701] Report Department alerted to prevent Sabotage Period Liaison with Navy REURAD Four Seven Two Twenty Seventh. SHORT.

Now, I will ask you to look at the one from MacArthur on the previous page, page 11, which reads:

Pursuant to instructions contained in your radio six two four air reconnaissance has been extended and intensified in conjunction with the Navy Stop Ground security measures have been taken Stop Within the limitations imposed by present state of development of this theatre of operations everything is in readiness for the conduct of a successful defense Stop Intimate liaison and cooperation and cordial relations exist between Army and Navy.

You got also a telegram from General Andrews. Is that Frank M. Andrews in the Caribbean area?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under date of November 28, on page 16 of Exhibit 32. His answer is:

REURAD four six one November twenty seven signed Marshall report requested being forwarded air mail.

And on page 18, 18-A and 18-B of this Exhibit 32 we find General Andrews' report that came in by air mail in response to the message you sent him. He says:

[2702] Naval measures. At the present time, it is believed that the defensive measures for the Caribbean Defense Command center largely around the Panama Canal; however, a plan for furnishing Army support to the Navy has been worked out and coordinated with the various Naval commanders in the Caribbean Theater. In the Panama Sector, the Commandant of the 15th Naval District is conducting continuous surface patrol of the area included within the Panama Coastal Frontier, supplemented, within the limits of the aircraft at his disposal, by an air patrol. In my opinion, the Commandant of the 15th Naval District does not have sufficient aircraft or vessels within his control for adequate reconnaissance.

Did you see that report from General Andrews?

General GEROW. I believe that I did, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you see also the one from General Dewitt on page 15, which goes at length into the measures he had taken?

General GEROW. Yes, sir, I believe that I did.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was General Marshall out of the city on the 27th when the warning message was sent over his name?

General GEROW. To the best of my recollection and belief he was, sir.

[2703] Mr. MITCHELL. Do you know whether he had anything to do with the draft of it before he left?

General GEROW. There was some discussion of a message, informal discussion, at the Joint Board meeting. I do not recall the details of that discussion, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was a meeting at which General Marshall was in attendance?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. How long before the 27th?

General GEROW. That was the day preceding, sir; the 26th.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the 26th?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. At the time you received Short's reply was your attention directed to the brevity of it as compared with the other reports, the reports that you had received from other commanding officers?

General GEROW. No, sir, it was not. The procedure in the War Plans Division at that time was for the executive officer to bring to my desk for information copies of important messages and letters. This document came to my desk and was initialed by me. It was then routed to the proper section of War Plans Division, which in this instance would be the Plans group, headed by Colonel Bundy who is now dead. I did not see this message from General Short again prior to December the 7th. I stated in my—[2704] Mr. MITCHELL. Just a minute. I show you a photostat of General MacArthur's report of action taken of November 28, to which is attached a photostat of General Short's report, and attached to that is a routing sheet, and I will ask you, have you that before you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir, I have that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the routing sheet show whether those two reports were attached together as they were routed through the department. Could you tell? The routing sheet shows two message numbers, doesn't it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. I am trying to identify those numbers.

Mr. MITCHELL. Look at the lower right-hand corner of each of the two messages, and you get the number as shown on the routing sheet, do you not?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So it is quite obvious, is it not, from these documents that MacArthur's report and Short's report were fastened together with a single routing sheet as they came to your hand? I notice, "Noted W. P. D." with your initials on it on the first message. That is right, isn't it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the same thing on the second message?

[2705] General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will offer this in evidence as Exhibit No. 46.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, that will be accepted as Exhibit 46.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 46.")

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice also on the MacArthur message "Noted H. S." Is that Secretary Stimson?

General GEROW. It looks like his signature; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Like his own writing? It says under it "Stimson." What does that mean? Is that somebody's else writing?

General GEROW. I should say so; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are the initials in "Noted H. S." Mr. Stimson's initials, do you know?

General GEROW. They look to me like they are, sir, from what I can remember of his writing.

Mr. MITCHELL. And underneath that "Noted L. T. G." Can you tell which one of you saw it first? Would the routing message show that?

General GEROW. No, sir; I cannot tell from this who saw it first.

Mr. MITCHELL. The same thing appears on the Short [2706] report on the next photostat page.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice at the top of MacArthur's message on the right, the words "To Secretary of War, G. C. M." Is that in General Marshall's handwriting?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That means that General Marshall probably saw it before Secretary Stimson saw it, does it not? He was directing it to be forwarded to the Secretary of War?

General GEROW. It would indicate that; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice General Marshall's initials do not appear on the next page, which is the Short report, but only on the first one. Is that correct?

General GEROW. His initials do not appear on the Short message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire where General Marshall's initials are on the photostat?

Mr. MITCHELL. On the right-hand corner.

Senator FERGUSON. Up at the top of the page?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman might also note that the "Noted Stimson" looks like there are three initials there [2707] instead of "H. S."

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, his middle initial, "H. L. S."

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, does the original have on the bottom of it "Noted, Chief of Staff," and no initials under that? Both of them have "Noted, Chief of Staff," and then one has a special note up at the top of the initials. What does this stamp mean? Does counsel know?

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose it was stamped on there for the Chief of Staff to initial. He did not do it, but instead of that he noted up at the top "To Secretary of War G. C. M."

Senator FERGUSON. What is the "O-4-c"?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will have to ask the witness about that. I am not in a position to guess about it.

The first question, General, is on the first message, the first page being the MacArthur report, a photostat of it. Above the words "Noted W. P. D." and your initials, "L. T. G." are the stamped words, printed with a stamp, "Noted Chief of Staff," and under it there are no initials to the effect that General Marshall noted it. Now, can you understand why that stamp would be put on there? Would it be in preparation of a signature, or what? When the thing came to you, were the words "Noted W. P. D." stamped on there?

[2708] General GEROW. Yes, sir, they would be stamped thereon by my office. The "Noted Chief of Staff" would be stamped by the Office of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see. Before it was shown to him?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. By the way, it was stamped "Noted W. P. D." before it was shown to you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So you infer instead of noting his initials down there, the general put the message up at the top, "To Secretary of War G. C. M."?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

May I bring up, sir, the question of this routing slip?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; anything you think of that we ought to know, General.

General GEROW. You will note that the routing slip is a routing slip from the office of the secretary, General Staff. That would normally come down to the War Plans Division, as is indicated here with those two papers attached. My executive may or may not have kept the routing slip on there. He may have removed it, or put the War Plans Division slip on it. What they did I do not know, sir, but it is necessarily true that that routing slip appeared on these [2709] messages when they were brought to me, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the way the record stands in the War Department, that it was put on there at some time?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean after you saw it.

General GEROW. No, sir. When these messages went into the Office of the Chief of Staff, for example, sir, the secretary of the General Staff would put his routing slip on it to send it to the War Plans Division, attaching the two messages, and the messenger would bring it down to my executive and my executive would receipt for it, and then that paper may or may not continue to keep the same routing slip.

Mr. MITCHELL. What would be your conclusion from that? I do not quite get the drift?

General GEROW. No conclusion, sir, except I understood a minute ago you asked me if that routing slip was on it when it came to my desk. That was my understanding of the question, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, is that correct? You know that these two documents came together, do you?

General GEROW. I cannot testify to that fact. I do not recall that now, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is only because there is a routing [2710] slip, with both numbers on the same routing slip that you infer they did come together?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I think we would like to be sure about it.

Is it your conclusion that the routing slip does not show that they were together when they were presented to you, or that it does?

General GEROW. They show that they were together when they were presented—handed to my executive officer because he initialed it. Whether it continued on there I cannot testify at this time. I think it is rather immaterial as to whether it did or not, sir.

[2711] Mr. MITCHELL. Well, where did your executive officer initial it?

General GEROW. He initialed, if you notice, on the routing slip, sir. You see "A. C. of S., WPD, noted WPD, CAG." That was Colonel Galey, those initials, my executive officer.

Mr. MITCHELL. This assistant secretary, or assistant chief of staff, War Plans Division, noted and those initials, are your secretary?

General GEROW. My executive, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your executive?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, he initialed the routing slip covering both messages?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So the routing slip must have been on there when it got to your office.

General GEROW. When it reached the War Plans Division; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why do you think it would be detached when it was handed to you?

General GEROW. It might have been detached, sir, since that was the routing slip from the Office of the Chief of Staff. Whether my executive might have put on other papers afterwards to route it to a division section within the War [2712] Plans Division, I cannot state at this time, sir, but we had certain routing slips within the War Plans Division itself, just as the Office of the Chief of Staff had a routing slip.

Mr. MITCHELL. You say you saw both messages?

General GEROW. I saw both of those messages; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are in doubt whether you saw them both attached together at the same time?

General GEROW. I am in doubt, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, it is certain that they both came together to your executive, did they not?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And where was your executive's office?

General GEROW. His office was adjacent to mine, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then is it your theory that after the two papers with the routing slip came to your executive, he detached the routing slip before he handed it to you for initialing?

General GEROW. I do not remember his exact procedure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why should he take the routing slip off? If the two messages came in with the routing slip and he initialed the routing slip showing both messages were there and then he brought it into your office to show it to you, why would he take the routing slip off?

General GEROW. Well, you see, sir, the routing slip is [2713] a routing from the office of the Chief of Staff to the Office of the War Plans Division.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

General GEROW. Now the War Plans Division itself had routing slips if the executive routed the paper from the executive office to the chief of plans group, for example, or the chief of projects group.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean the routing slip was prepared in your War Plans Division then?

General GEROW. No, sir. This routing slip was apparently the routing slip that was prepared, as you notice, by the Office of the Secretary, General Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. It got to your office with both these messages attached to it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then your theory is it may have been taken off before you saw it?

General GEROW. The messages may have been separated by the executive officer in War Plans Division for routing to the section of the War Plans Division which would handle that message.

Mr. MITCHELL. After you saw it?

General GEROW. I do not know, sir, whether it was before or after, but I saw both the messages, sir.

[2714] Mr. MITCHELL. You may have a chance later to clear that up. I do not believe I quite get the result.

When you saw the Short message did you then know about the joint arrangement required under which the Navy would conduct long distance air reconnaissance and that the Army would supply to the Navy for that purpose such heavy bombers as it had available for that work?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I knew of the agreement in Hawaii, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. When you saw General Short's reply I wish you would state, in your own way, General, just what your reaction was to it, and what you thought about it.

General GEROW. Well, sir, as I testified before the Roberts Commission, I assumed when that message came through that it was an answer to the G-2 message that was sent out by General Miles to the Hawaiian Department the evening before. I was probably led to that assumption by the fact that the question of sabotage had been discussed quite at length after that conference on the evening before.

I do not remember now, at this late date, what my reaction was to the message.

The message was then sent out, as I stated before, to the plans group, which was headed by Colonel Bundy, who is now dead. I do not know what Colonel Bundy's reactions were to [2715] that message. I don't remember ever discussing it with him. It is reasonable to assume that he may possibly have interpreted the message to mean, or that part of the message which said "liaison with the Navy," that the commanding general out there had instituted protective measures against sabotage and was working with the Navy to arrange for other defensive measures, including reconnaissance.

I do not know that that was Colonel Bundy's thought, but it was a reasonable assumption from the way the message was worded. I did not see the message after it was sent to Colonel Bundy prior to December 7.

The message contained two short sentences: One, "Alerted against sabotage," and the other stating "liaison with the Navy." It also contained a reference to a No. 472, as I recall. That message meant nothing to me at that time.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean the number meant nothing?

General GEROW. The number meant nothing to me, sir, because that number was put on by the Signal Corps and it was not the number assigned to that particular document by the War Plans Division.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean you had to go to the Signal Corps office to find out what the dispatch was that was numbered 472; is that it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. Insofar as I know, sir, no [2716] inquiry with regard to that message was sent to General Short. In the light of subsequent events, I feel now that it might have been desirable to send such an inquiry, and had such inquiry been sent it would probably have developed the fact that the commanding general in Hawaii was not at that time carrying out the directive in the message signed "Marshall."

If that had been done, there would have been an opportunity to correct the situation, but I do not believe that the message could necessarily be interpreted as meaning that sabotage measures only were being taken.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, there was nothing there to suggest that there was anything else but sabotage measures, except the words "liaison with the Navy"?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And what interpretation did you place then, if you know, on the words "liaison with the Navy"?

General GEROW. As I testified, sir, I had assumed that the message was in answer to the G-2 message and it was then routed to a section of War Plans Division. I did not see that message again, so I did not have an opportunity at that time, or did not make any assumption regarding what the phrase "liaison with the Navy" meant. I think my executive officer, or the chief of my plans group, might possibly have interpreted the message that way, and that is why it was not brought back [2717] to me and my attention invited to the fact that it did not explicitly cover the operation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, if you interpreted this message as an answer to G-2, or Adams, as a sabotage message, then you were left in the position of having no report at all from Short about the main warning message that you sent over Marshall's signature?

General GEROW. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. To strengthen that position?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did it occur to you to wonder why Short did not respond to the main warning message?

General GEROW. Well, sir, I was handling a great many papers at that time, and it was the responsibility of the officers in my division to check the messages and correspondence and bring to my attention anything of importance that required action on my part, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Even if your staff had the responsibility of following up on these things, the comparison between the two-lines dispatch from Short and the elaborate report from MacArthur and Andrews, and the western base command was rather sharp, was it not, General?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The message that you helped draft on [2718] November 27, No. 472, was not a mere transfer of information. It was a command, was it not, involving an order or directive?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let me read it again. We all know it. It says:

Negotiations with Japan appear to be terminated to all practical purposes with only the barest possibilities that the Japanese Government might come back and offer to continue period Japanese future action unpredictable but hostile action possible at any moment period If hostilities cannot repeat cannot be avoided the United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act period This policy should not repeat not be construed as restricting you to a course of action that might jeopardize your defense period Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary but these measures should be carried out so as not repeat not to alarm civil population or disclose intent period Report measures taken period A separate message is being sent to G dash two Ninth Corps area re subversive activities in United States period Should hostilities occur you will carry out the tasks assigned [2719] in Rainbow five so far as they pertain to Japan period

Limit dissemination of this highly secret information to minimum essential officers.

Now, there is a direct order there, is there not? It says:

You are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary.

Now, did that mean if you did not deem it necessary, you were not going to take any reconnaissance or other measures?

General GEROW. No, sir. The intent of that message was to invite his attention to the necessity of conducting reconnaissance.

Mr. MITCHELL. You mean he was supposed to take some measures, but the extent of them and the nature of them you left to the discretion of the local commander; is that it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You had given him an order then and you got a report that as you interpret the order, this message of Short's had been a response, or you thought it was a response, to 472, and it would be a report by Short that he failed to carry out your instructions, would not it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that why you thought it was a report about the sabotage messages?

General GEROW. Well, it never occurred to me, sir, that [2720] General Short would not take some reconnaissance and other defensive measures after the receipt of this message. He was an experienced commander and it never entered my mind that he would not take such action.

[2721] Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I have been following this testimony very closely, and I would like to ask counsel at this time, if he can, to pin down this one thing: This message is directed from Fort Shafter to the Chief of Staff. Short's message is directed to the Chief of Staff.

Now, if it had been a reply to the G-2 message, to whom would the reply to the G-2 message normally be directed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you answer that question, General? You say you thought it might have been a report of Short's about the sabotage message. Now, one of those was Adams', wasn't it; that is, Adjutant General?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The other was Adams over the signature of the Army Air Forces man.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The third one was signed Miles.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of G-2.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, the Congressman would like to know, and so would the committee, the reply to any one of those three, when it was addressed to the Chief of Staff, wouldn't Short have wired back to the man who sent the message he was reporting about?

[2722] General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So that right on the face of it, it showed that it was a report on your message 472.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is, if you stop to think the other messages weren't signed, "Marshall."

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, may I ask counsel right there, because I would like to get this pinned down while we are going through it, do I understand the witness to testify now that upon further recollection and consideration of this message, the reply of General Short to the message that went to him from Marshall, the fact that the message is directed to the Chief of Staff is in itself proof that it was a direct reply to the Marshall message and not a reply to any message sent by G-2 or anyone else?

Mr. MITCHELL. He has just stated that. Is that correct?

General GEROW. Yes. In my mind, the message in question was a reply to the message from General Marshall.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a little more than that. It is clear that it was, apparently, but I am asking you whether on the face of the message that ought not to have been clear to you when you saw it?

[2723] General GEROW. I didn't notice that fact, sir, when the message came over my desk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Assuming that you thought it was not a reply to your main instruction to take reconnaissance and other measures, on that theory you never got a report from Short about your 472 message, although you asked him to report measures taken; isn't that correct?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So far as you know there was no follow-up by you or any member of your staff to elicit from General Short a more complete report or further information or any word as to what he had done, no follow-up prior to December 7?

General GEROW. No, sir; there was no follow-up sent to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to suggest that counsel follow what Congressman Keefe had in mind. The message from General Short was routed to Secretary Stimson's office also by the Chief of Staff. Whether that would make any difference as to whether it was a reply to the Miles or the other message when the Chief of Staff routed it to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry.

I understand the anxiety of the distinguished Senator [2724] from Michigan, and I understand the anxiety of the distinguished Congressman. But there is an order of procedure here. I have a lot of questions I would like to ask too.

I realize they are anxious to get information, but the rule was to be that counsel would conduct the examination and then the witness would be turned over to each of us to dissect his testimony. If we are going to have suggestions, I have four or five to make too.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state that the rule which we adopted doesn't seem necessarily to preclude the members of the committee from asking counsel to clear up a point that he is inquiring about at the time.

The rule applied to the examination of the witness by members of the committee by rotation after the counsel had concluded.

Mr. MITCHELL. Within reasonable limits, it doesn't bother me.

Mr. MURPHY. I want to say that I agree that the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan and of the Congressman are excellent suggestions, in view of the fact that we are going to have General Marshall here in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's go ahead.

Senator FERGUSON. That was the reason I suggested counsel asking that question, because General Marshall will [2725] be here in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I don't want to ignore the suggestions anyway.

I am going to ask the General whether he knows from this routing slip, or the notations on it, whether when it came to him, it had the notation by General Marshall to send it to the Secretary of War, and whether it had Mr. Stimson's handwriting, the word in Mr. Stimson's handwriting "Noted." Could you tell us about that?

General GEROW. I can't recall now, sir, whether it was on at the time it came to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the ordinary course of procedure, would it have reached you before it went to the Chief of Staff? What was the practice with a message like this? Would it go directly to the Chief of Staff and then to you?

General GEROW. I would say that in this particular case it would go to the Chief of Staff first. Messages did come both ways. There were messages coming to me that I would send up to the Chief of Staff. This, I believe would have gone to the Chief of Staff first.

I think the way the initials are shown on there, we could presume that it had gone through that channel.

Mr. MITCHELL. So your inference is that it went to [2726] General Marshall first, went to the Secretary of War next, and then came down to you; is that right?

General GEROW. I would presume that, yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So that at that stage of the game, you know that the report had gone directly to General Marshall, being in answer to a message that had gone out over his signature?

General GEROW. I didn't understand.

Mr. MITCHELL. You knew from the face of it that it had gone—the Short report—had come first to General Marshall, because it was an answer to the message sent over General Marshall's signature.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. If General Marshall signed a telegram and his name was appended to it, and the answer came in, it was the practice to send it to him, was it, or did it come to you first?

General GEROW. I believe the practice would be it would go to him first, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know at the time you saw General Short's report that he had established locally what he called Alert No. 1, which said "Look out for sabotage with no threat from without"? Did you know about that?

I think maybe I asked you that this morning. Did I?

[2727] General GEROW. No, sir; you didn't ask me that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did ask you if you had prior to December 7 seen the local order of General Short establishing what he called Alert No. 1, and you said it didn't come in until the following year sometime.

General GEROW. That is correct. It came in sometime, I think, in March 1942, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you have had any way of knowing what his Alert No. 1 was, if you didn't have that order before you?

General GEROW. No, sir; I would not have known what Alert No. 1 was.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember after the Short report was received that you had any discussion with anybody, with General Marshall or anybody in the War Plans Division, about the Short report, or the question of its sufficiency, or the question of whether it ought to be supplemented, or a further report should be asked for?

General GEROW. I do not recall any such discussion, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, I am going to read to you a paragraph in Secretary Stimson's report on the Pearl Harbor incident, in which he says this:

Again, as I have pointed out, General Short, in [2728] response to a message which had been sent out containing a warning of possible hostilities and a request for a report of actions, had sent a message to the War Department which was susceptible of the interpretation that he was on the alert against sabotage only, and not on the alert against an air raid or other hostile action.

While this interpretation was not necessarily to be had from the wording of his message, nevertheless, a keener sense of analysis and a more incisive comparison of the messages exchanged, would have invited further inquiry by the War Plans Division of General Short and his failure to go on the necessary alert might well have been discovered.

The Chief of this division and certain of his subordinates knew that a report of the measures taken by General Short had been asked for. General Short's reply was brought to the attention of the chief of the division. A clear and satisfactory reply should have been required. This was not done, and a more efficient functioning of the division would have demanded that careful inquiry as to the meaning of General Short's message be made and no room for ambiguity permitted.

Do you think that is a fair statement of the situation?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I do, and if there was any responsibility to be attached to the War Department [2729] for any failure to send an inquiry to General Short, the responsibility must rest on War Plans Division, and I accept that responsibility as Chief of War Plans Division.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, we find that the Short report and an opportunity to compare it with the MacArthur report went up higher than you. It went to the Chief of Staff, the Secretary of War. It wasn't their function to follow up things like this?

General GEROW. No, sir; I was a staff adviser to the Chief of Staff, and I had a group of 48 officers to assist me. It was my responsibility to see that those messages were checked, and if an inquiry was necessary, the War Plans Division should have drafted such an inquiry and presented it to the Chief of Staff for approval.

As I said, I was chief of that division, and it was my responsibility.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I am wondering whether the committee would be willing to sit a little longer tonight.

I have some other matters that we ought to go into before General Marshall is called.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senate is not in session. It has already adjourned for the day. Is it agreeable to the committee to sit a little while longer?

[2730] Without objection that will be done.

Senator GEORGE. Let me ask how long.

The CHAIRMAN. About how long, Senator George asks.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is hard for me to estimate. I will keep going until you think I ought to stop.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Might I offer one brief suggestion to counsel. General Marshall initialed this top paper, which is the MacArthur message. I think it would be helpful to find out whether this Short message was also attached to that and whether it would be reasonable to assume that those initials of General Marshall applied to both of these.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have done all I can with the general about that. Those two were brought in together. The two documents were attached, and he saw them both together.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MURPHY. May I suggest that General Marshall has already testified on his impressions on that very thing and will do so tomorrow.

The CHAIRMAN. Let's get going and get to him.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, I show you four intercepted Japanese messages concerning military installations and ship movements that I found at pages 12, 13, 14, and 15, in exhibit 2, which is entitled "Japanese Messages Concerning Military Installations, Ship Movements, etc." [2731]

We turn first to the one on page 12. You have examined that message, have you not?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the message from Tokyo to Honolulu dated September 24, 1941, and translated October 9, which directs the spies or somebody in Honolulu—Jap spies—to divide the harbor area, the Pearl Harbor waters, into five different areas, and calls for specific information, not merely as to ship movements, but as to location of the vessels specifically in each one of those areas.

Then on page 13 is a message from Honolulu to Washington. The message states:

The following codes will be used hereafter to designate the location of vessels.

This is dated September 29, translated October 10

It is suggested repair dock in navy yard will be called KS.

Navy dock in the navy yard, KT.

Moorings in the vicinity of Ford Island, FV.

And the east and west sides will be differentiated by A and B respectively.

Then there is one in the same series on page 14 which is a report from Honolulu to Tokyo, dated November 18, [2732] translated December 6. That is rather late, but I will refer to it. It is a report of battleships and other vessels in specified areas.

Finally, there is one on page 15, Tokyo to Honolulu, November 18, translated December 5, and one dated November 29, translated December 5, which reads:

We have been receiving reports from you on ship movements but in future will you also report even when there are no movements.

I have called your attention to those messages before, have I not, and their possible significance?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did they come to your attention at or about the time they were translated?

General GEROW. I believe they did, sir. Most of those important intercepted messages were brought to my attention, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you any personal recollection of their having been received by you?

General GEROW. Not of these particular messages; no, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would there be any record in the War Department by which it could be told whether they were shown to you or not?

[2733] General GEROW. No, sir. These messages were brought to me in a locked dispatch case by an officer. He unlocked the dispatch case and stood there while I read the messages. Sometimes there would only be 1 message, and other times 10 or 15. I kept no record and I believe he kept none of the ones I actually saw.

Mr. MITCHELL. And after you saw them, the officer would go out with the messages?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. They were not left with you for evaluation?

General GEROW. No, sir; they were not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Unless something was shown you that was so apparent that you saw it instantly, and made an evaluation of it, you wouldn't do any evaluation work on it, would you?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you have been allowed to keep these dispatches in your possession for some time for the purpose of studying them if you wanted to?

General GEROW. No, sir. Under the instructions I had received, they were to be returned immediately to the officer presenting them to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Where would they go for evaluation?

General GEROW. G-2, sir.

[2734] Mr. MITCHELL. And I suppose you don't know, not being in the Signal Corps, what the explanation may be for the delay between the actual interception of some of these Japanese messages and the time when they were actually translated?

General GEROW. No, sir. That was a Signal Corps responsibility, and I never had occasion to inquire into it. I did at one time ask a Signal Corps officer how it was done and he told me that he had positive orders not to divulge that except on order of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. You don't mean as to the delay?

General GEROW. No, sir; not the delay.

Mr. MITCHELL. You never noticed that?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose a message came in and was shown to you that was of a character that, when evaluated, would call for action by War Plans Division, not merely transmission of warning, or information, but a directive, such as the message you sent to General Short on November 27. As I understand it, the War Plans only interfered in these messages when there was an operational directive involved? Is that right?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you depend on G-2 for evaluation of [2735] messages intercepted which might lead to directional orders by you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I depended on G-2 for the evaluation of all enemy intelligence.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why were they shown to you?

General GEROW. For information, sir, and to keep me abreast of the general situation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, is there any doubt in your mind about the respective responsibilities of G-2 and the War Plans Division for evaluating messages about the military installation?

General GEROW. There is no question in my mind at all sir. That is a responsibility of G-2.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, to put it bluntly, suppose one of these messages intercepted from the Japanese was brought in to your office in a pouch and that message had stated boldly "Be all ready on December 7. That is the date we are going to attack." Would you have any responsibility to do anything with that message?

General GEROW. I certainly would have had; yes, sir.

I would have taken it and prepared at once the warning message for the approval of the Chief of Staff and submitted it to him as quickly as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL. That would be a message directing him [2736] to take measures to meet the attack?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. That would have been an operational message.

Mr. MITCHELL. So, if the evaluation of the message was obvious, then you were supposed to make an evaluation of it.

General GEROW. Yes, sir. If the message obviously indicated operations were necessary on the part of our Army forces, I would take action, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The question was asked General Miles:

Then, in other words, while you weren't as a matter of fact or procedure sending the text of the messages or the gist of them or a summary of them to the theatres, it was, even in the fact of these security considerations, always open to the Chief of Staff to send specific instructions or directions to the Commander at Hawaii or the Philippines, or elsewhere, based on the information which had been obtained from intercepts?

General MILES. That is true, and at this point I think I should like to go further and point out that from early August, I think the 5 of August, 1941, we discontinued, by direction of the Chief of Staff, presenting magic in evaluated form. So the Chief of Staff and the Chief of War Plans Division, Secretary of War, were from then on [2737] doing their own evaluating of the raw material that we were presenting to them in the form of magic.

Do you remember anything about that?

General GEROW. I am sure I was never informed that G-2 had discontinued evaluating magic.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you know whether there was any direction of the Chief of Staff that you should make your own evaluations?

General GEROW. I do not. There was no such direction issued to me, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to have you refer to your memorandum of November 3 to the Chief of Staff on the far eastern situation, exhibit 16. It is one of the documents in exhibit 16. Have you that before you?

General GEROW. I have it; yes, sir. That is the memorandum of November 3, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks that the committee be in order. There is a good deal of confusion—conversation.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, before we get into another subject, it is my understanding that General Miles' testimony was that he was ordered in August to pass on the raw material, but there was nothing in General Miles testimony, as I understand, that he was to discontinue acting as G-2 in evaluating in addition to supplying the raw material.

[2738] Mr. MITCHELL. I guess you are right, because the next question on this page, that I could have read to the general, was this:

Mr. GESELL. You mean that from August on G-2 had no responsibility to evaluate the intercepted material?

General MILES. No, sir, I do not mean that, but I do mean that our responsibility in that respect was somewhat lessened by the direction of the Chief of Staff that he wanted not only the evaluation of the Military Intelligence Division, but he wanted to see the material itself, the raw material itself, presented to him.

That seems to clear the matter up, doesn't it?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. From that time did you still continue to get evaluations from G-2?

General GEROW. I received from G-2 estimates.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you had also the opportunity, under this pouch delivery system and inspection, a chance to at least read over the raw material, did you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your memorandum of the 3d of November, 1941 to the Chief of Staff, part of exhibit 16, speaks of a conference held at the State Department on the morning of November 1. Do you want to add anything to the incident [2739] that isn't contained in your memorandum?

General GEROW. I don't believe there is anything I can add at this time from memory, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. In that memorandum you speak of the policy derived in the American-British Staff conferences. Does that include the Singapore conference, preliminary conference—on page 2 of the memorandum?

General GEROW. That would apply to both the ABC conference held in Washington, and the Singapore conferences as well.

Mr. MITCHELL. You speak there of the fact that one of the recommendations is that the movement of counteraction against Japan should be considered only in case of any of the following actions by Japan, and one of those is the movement of Japanese forces into any part of Thailand to the west of 100° east or south of 10° north, meaning there a recommendation that had been made by the Singapore conference?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will offer now, Mr. Chairman, as exhibit 47, some supplementary documents that are underlying documents for this memorandum, or report, of General Gerow on November 3, which is contained in exhibit 16.

This document I am now offering contains a telegram [2740] from Chungking to the Secretary of State in Washington, signed by Mr. Gauss. I think he was the State Department man out there. Dated November 3. Another one of the same date from Chungking to Washington, signed by Chiang Kai-shek.

The CHAIRMAN. Are they both included in exhibit 47?

Mr. MITCHELL. They are both included.

There is also another one in exhibit 47. This is Navy Department, office of the Chief of Naval Operations, Office of Naval Intelligence, Washington, memorandum for the Director, dated November 1, 1941, signed by R. A. Boone for A. H. McCollum.

And a telegram from Alusna. That means the Chungking naval attaché.

The CHAIRMAN. The documents will be received as exhibit No. 47.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will not stop to read them now.

General Gerow, you remember that there is in the record what we call a 14-part message and a 1 p. m. message, which was the Japanese diplomatic messages from Tokyo to their Ambassadors in Washington which came in on the 6th and 7th of December, 1941.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

[2741] Mr. MITCHELL. We offered this morning in evidence, as exhibit 41, a summary of the movements of that message and the date of its interception, and when it was received in Washington, and when it was decoded and so on, and so far as the documentary proof shows, eliminating matters that have to be established by witnesses—I am just reminding you what the message was so that I can ask you questions about it.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have anything to do with that message or know if its receipt on the 6th or any part of it?

General GEROW. No, sir. I did not know of the existence of the message and I did not see it on the 6th of December. I understand there has been some testimony in previous investigations to the effect that it was presented to the War Plans Division. It was never presented to the War Plans Division on the 6th of December.

Mr. MITCHELL. The message, according to this record, which we will assume is correct for the present, 13 parts of it, if I may remind you, consisted of a long discussion by the Japanese about their diplomatic position and about ours.

The fourteenth part of that 14-part message was the clause [2742] that said they were through, that they thought negotiations were no longer necessary.

The record here shows that that fourteenth part, the breaking off, was translated at least after midnight December 6, because it bears the translation date of December 7. Then there followed what we call a 1 p. m. message, which was a supplementary message directing the Ambassadors at Washington to present that final message to the Secretary of State at 1 p. m., on Sunday, December 7.

That, according to this record, was translated on the 7th, which was sometime after midnight.

Does that refresh your recollection any on it at all as to the message, that is, as to any of the incidents connected with it?

[2743] General GEROW. Well, the first time the 14-part message or the 1 p. m. message was in the office of the Chief of Staff on the morning of December 7th was about 11:30 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. Can you remember what you were doing on the evening of December the 6th?

General GEROW. No, sir; I cannot recall at this time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you have any record? Do you keep a diary?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Senator LUCAS. That is a great contribution to this cause.

Mr. MITCHELL. You cannot recall what you were doing. You had a good many things since December 7 to engage you, including such little things as the Omaha Beach attack, haven't you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you tried to cast your memory back to those events as far as you could?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; and I cannot recall what I was doing.

Mr. MITCHELL. What you were doing on the night of December 6?

General GEROW. What I was doing on the night of De- [2744]
cember 6; no, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You do not remember whether you were at your office or at your quarters or what not?

General GEROW. No, sir; I cannot recall. If there was a large volume of work I probably worked down at the office until 6 or 7 or 8 o'clock. If there was not I probably was home. I do not recall being out to dinner on that particular evening.

Mr. MITCHELL. But you are confident that you never saw that 14-part message, or any part of it, or the 1 p. m. message until you got into General Marshall's office around 11:30 on the morning of the 7th?

General GEROW. I am positive, yes, sir, of that fact.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest one thing? As I understand it he did not see the 13 parts either.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is it?

Mr. MURPHY. As I understand it, his testimony is that he did not see any part of the 14 parts, either one.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what he said.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what he says now.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you seen lately this memorandum from you that is already in Exhibit 39 in evidence, dated December 15, 1941, called a "Memorandum for Record" and signed by you, recording the events of the morning of De- [2745] cember 7? Have you examined that lately?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I read it recently, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose you take a look at it.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That memorandum states that about December—I suppose that this document is a more reliable record of what had occurred because it was made December 15, 1941, than your present recollection would be?

General GEROW. It will be, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will have to depend on this, will you not?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That states that :

About 11 : 30 A. M. on Sunday, December 7, 1941, General Marshall called me to his office.

That was the occasion for your going to his office?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does that mean that you were in your office?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And called to his [reading] :

General Miles and Colonel Bratton were present. General Marshall referred to the fact that the Japanese Ambassador had been directed to deliver a note to the [2746] State Department at 1 P. M., December 7, 1941. He felt that the Japanese Government instructions to deliver the note at an exact hour and time might have great significance. The pencilled draft of an alert message to be sent at once to CG, U. S. Army Forces in Far East ; CG Caribbean Defense Command ; CG Hawaiian Department ; and CG Fourth Army was read aloud by General Marshall and concurred in by all present. Colonel Bratton was directed to take the pencilled draft of the message to the Message Center and have it sent immediately by the most expeditious means. Colonel Bratton returned in a few minutes and informed General Marshall that the message had been turned over to the Message Center and would reach destinations in about thirty minutes. The pencilled draft was typed later during the day and formally made of record.

Do you remember anything more about that meeting in General Marshall's office on the morning of December 7, 1941, than is stated here in this memo?

General GEROW. No, sir ; I do not.

Mr. MITCHELL. This message was one which was obviously important, especially when it got down to part 14 and the 1 p. m. part of it. Is that message which in the ordinary course of practice in the War Department somebody with [2747] a pouch would probably have brought into your office in the Department?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Had that been done prior to your going to General Marshall's office?

General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you ever make any inquiry as to why it had not been delivered to your office before 11 : 30, when it had been translated at an earlier hour?

General GEROW. No, sir ; I did not.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow, have you a memorandum of November 17, 1941, that you presented to General Marshall regarding efforts of the Army and Navy to arrange a unity of command in Hawaii and at other points?

General GEROW. Yes, sir ; I have here a copy of such a memorandum, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. What is the date of that, Mr. Mitchell?

Mr. MITCHELL. This is November 17, 1941.

Your memorandum to the Chief of Staff, dated November 17, 1941, "Subject : Method of Coordination of Command in Coastal Frontiers," is a short one and a longer one on the same date.

Were they both presented at the same time? I have two memoranda for the Chief of Staff dated November 17, 1941, [2748] signed by you, both of which relate to the method of coordination of command in coastal frontiers. Have you both of them before you?

General GEROW. Yes, sir ; I have both copies.

Mr. MITCHELL. Both documents?

General GEROW. Both documents; yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to number as exhibit 48 and now offer in evidence three documents, all in one exhibit: November 17, 1941, memorandum from General Gerow to the Chief of Staff about the method of coordination of command in Coastal Frontiers; another one, memorandum of the same date on the same subject from General Gerow; and a letter which clears up the story, dated December 20, 1941, "Personal and Confidential", addressed to "My dear Emmons." That is General Emmons who succeeded to the command of the Hawaiian Department about that time?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. This memo or letter is signed by "G. C. Marshall."

Senator LUCAS. Was this memorandum dated December 20 issued after the Pearl Harbor attack?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, that is November 17.

Senator LUCAS. Oh, I see; November 17.

Mr. MITCHELL. The letter of General Marshall directed [2749] to General Emmons and dated December 20, 1941, was after the attack on Pearl Harbor. That letter was directed to General Emmons, who succeeded General Short. The two letters of General Gerow are dated November 17.

Senator LUCAS. I see.

Mr. MITCHELL. They both relate to coordination of commands in Coastal Frontiers and, among other things, do they include Hawaii?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you tell in your own way, General, just how—

The CHAIRMAN. Those documents will be received under the title of exhibit 48.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibit No. 48").

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you just state in your own language how this subject happened to come up for consideration and who considered it and what the proposal was?

General GEROW. I just saw these papers yesterday, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see, Would you rather have me read them first?

General GEROW. I can read them, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, read them into the record. They are somewhat important.

[2750] General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And I think the committee would like to hear them. Read the short ones first.

General GEROW. The short one of November 17 first.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the memorandum from you to the Chief of Staff?

General GEROW. Yes, sir. (Reading:)

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

Subject: Method of Coordination of Command in Coastal Frontiers.

1. The attached Joint Board case has been before the Joint Planning Committee since last February. At a recent meeting of The Joint Board, Admiral Stark suggested that the Army take action on the Navy proposal.

2. The case is divisible into two main subjects—Changes in Coastal Frontiers and the assignment of Command in the Caribbean, Panama, Hawaii and Philippine Coastal Frontiers. The Army and Navy sections of The Joint Planning Committee have reached an agreement with regard to changes in Coastal Frontiers. They disagree, however, as to the service that should exercise Unity of Command in the Coastal Frontiers.

3. The proposals of the Army and Navy Sections on command are outlined in the attached Memorandum to you. [2751] The Memorandum also embodies my views on the question of unity command in the Caribbean Area, Hawaii, and the Philippines.

4. If the Joint Board desires definite action on this case, I recommend that you approve the attached Memorandum. I believe the Navy will agree with the solution proposed, which simply means that we will continue to operate by mutual cooperation. If you do not wish to raise the question of command at this time I can hold the case in suspense for the time being.

(Signed) L. T. GEOW,
Brigadier General,
Acting Assistant Chief of Staff.

The second and longer memorandum reads as follows:

Memorandum for the Chief of Staff:

Subject: Method of Coordination of Command in Coastal Frontiers.

I. Discussion.

1. Joint Board case (J. B. No. 350, Serial 678) prescribing coordination of command is now before the Joint Planning Committee.

2. The Navy section proposes changes in command relations in the following coastal frontiers:

a. Caribbean.

[2752] Coordination by the method of unity of command, command being vested in the Commandant of the 10th Naval District.

b. Panama.

Coordination by unity of command, command being vested in the Commanding General, Panama Canal Department except when major naval forces are based in the frontier for general strategic naval operations in either the Caribbean Sea or the Pacific Ocean. In this contingency command would be vested in the Commandant of the 15th Naval District.

c. Hawaii.

Coordination by unity of command as follows:

(1) Command vested in Commanding General, Hawaiian Department when the most important strategic problem is one of territorial defense of the Hawaiian Islands and when major naval forces have been withdrawn and not based in the frontier for general strategic naval operations either in the vicinity or at a distance.

(2) Command vested in the Commandant of the 14th Naval District when major naval forces are based in the frontier for general strategic naval operations either in the vicinity or at a distance.

3. The Army section proposes the following, appli- [2753] cable to all coastal frontiers:

a. Unity of command over forces assigned to the defense of a coastal frontier is vested in the Army, except when the United States Atlantic or Pacific Fleet or the major portion thereof is operating against comparable hostile forces within the radius of possible support by Army aviation operating from bases within the coastal frontier. In the excepted case, unity of command is vested in the Navy.

b. In a specific operation, unity of command in coastal frontiers may be transferred from the Army to the Navy and vice versa, when the senior Army and Navy commanders concerned agree that such change is necessary and further agree as to the service that shall exercise such command.

c. Unity of command does not authorize the service in which it is vested to assign missions that will require the forces of the other service to operate from bases outside the coastal frontier.

4. The Army and Navy sections of the Joint Planning Committee have been unable to reach an agreement on a compromise solution of the problem of unity of command. The Army section does not believe that unity of command in coastal frontiers is essential. It is believed that [2754] the Navy section will agree to a continuation of coordination by mutual cooperation.

5. The vesting in a single individual of full responsibility for a military operation is a generally accepted principle for the accomplishment of effective military action. In theory at least, no amount of personal willingness to cooperate can eliminate the objections inherent in the committee system of control of military forces. The most frequently cited recent example of the effect of such divided responsibility is that of failure of the defense of Crete as contrasted with the successful attack on that island in which the attacking force presumably was commanded by a single individual.

6. Unity of command is the accepted method of coordination within the Army and within the Navy, themselves. However, the many practical difficulties encountered in the application of that principle as applied to joint operations of the Army and Navy have usually led to the adoption of the method of coordination by mutual cooperation except when specific tasks are planned.

7. The difficulty of determining the service in which unity of command should vest in the defense of a coastal frontier lies in the inability to determine in [2755] advance when hostilities will begin and the nature and the extent of the operations. For that reason it is difficult to foresee which service will play the major part in the defense and will have primary interest. The major responsibility may well pass from one service to the other during defensive operations. On the other hand, overseas landing expeditions or land operations requiring support from Naval forces, such as those in Libya, present problems in which the service having preponderance of responsibility can readily be determined. The time such an operation should begin, as well as terminate, and its nature and extent can be forecast and the service having the preponderance of responsibility definitely agreed upon between the two services, thereby indicating the service in which unity of command should vest. In such operations the preponderance of responsibility will not fluctuate from one service to the other as might be the case in defense of coastal frontiers.

A fact frequently lost sight of in consideration of the method of coordination under the principle of mutual cooperation is that although the major operation is being conducted under that principle, joint operations subordinate thereto may still be conducted under the principle of unity of command if so agreed to by the [2756] Army and Navy commanders concerned. This method is particularly applicable to joint operations by forces having similar combat characteristics, such as the air forces of the two services.

II. Action recommended.

That coordination of joint operations in the Caribbean, Panama and Hawaiian Coastal Frontiers continue to be effected by mutual cooperation. If this recommendation is approved, such a proposal will be discussed with the Navy section of the Joint Planning Committee.

[2757] Mr. MITCHELL. Now that report states the fact that the Army and Navy representatives on the Joint Planning Committee were in direct disagreement about this question of unity of command in Hawaii and other coastal frontiers?

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And your statement there is that the Army does not think the unity of command is essential. Was the Army making any effort to secure unity of command at that time?

General GEROW. I think that statement means essential under the conditions which we had at that time. I think the only way you can have effective unity of command is for the tops of the services to say, "So and so is in command, and he is in command from now on." You cannot vary that command from day to day depending on what the operation is. One man must be responsible for preparing that place for operation, and he must be responsible for commanding it after he has prepared it.

Mr. MITCHELL. This report of yours would indicate that the people in that conference of the Planning Board wanted a scheme by which that command would shift back and forth from the Army to the Navy and from the Navy to the Army depending on the nature of attack or defense?

General GEROW. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. You did not believe in that?

[2758] General GEROW. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The result was, because of these differences between the Army and Navy you came in and recommended the only thing you can do is to get mutual cooperation?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; I thought mutual cooperation would be better than a continual switching of command. I did not think either the Army or Navy planning group would agree to say wholeheartedly, "You take everything and it will be agreeable to us." Neither would agree to that. That is the only way I saw it could be done.

Mr. MITCHELL. That somebody at the top had to knock their heads together and tell them what to do?

General GEROW. That is correct, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You remember that in the local plans—I call them "plans" but it may not be the right word—arranged between General Short and Admiral Kimmel at Pearl Harbor there was a provision there that they had agreed, if they did agree to it, there would be unity of command if the two got together and fixed on one of them for the commandant, do you remember that provision?

General GEROW. Yes, sir; they do have authority, the commanders on the ground out there, to agree to such unity of command and who would exercise it.

Mr. MITCHELL. But you had no information on that, as to [2759] whatever was attempted by the commander prior to December 7?

General GEROW. I have no information that such an agreement was entered into.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now I will read this letter from General Marshall to General Emmons on December 20, 1941:

MY DEAR EMMONS: Instructions to the Army and Navy were issued a few days ago assigning unity of command to the Navy in Hawaii. At the same time unity of command was assigned to the Army in Panama.

For your confidential information, this action was taken in the following circumstances: In the first place, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy were determined that there should be no question of future confusion as to responsibility. Further, the efforts I have been making for more than a year to secure unity of command in various critical regions had been unavailing. All sorts of Naval details, such as the operations of ships and submarines, the coordination of efforts to locate purely Naval objectives, and similar matters had been raised in objection to Army control wherever that was proposed. I must say at the same time that some of the Army staff brought up somewhat similar objections to Naval control. Both [2760] Stark and I were struggling to the same end, but until this crash of December 7th the difficulties seemed, at least under peacetime conditions, almost insurmountable. However, the two decisions I have just referred to have been made and further ones are in process of being made, all of which I feel will add immeasurably to our security, whatever the local embarrassments. Also, I regard these as merely stepping stones to larger decisions involved in our relations with allies.

I am giving you this information in order that you may better appreciate the problem and, therefore, be better prepared to assist me by endeavoring to work with Nimitz in complete understanding.

Whatever difficulties arise that cannot be adjusted locally, should be brought to our attention here for consideration by Admiral Stark and myself. These days are too perilous for personal feelings in any way to affect efficiency.

This is a very hasty note, but I want General McCoy to take it off with him this morning.

You have my complete confidence and I will do everything possible to support you.

[2761] Faithfully yours,

(Sgd) G. C. MARSHALL.

General DLOS C. EMMONS,
Commanding Hawaiian Department,
Honolulu, T. H.

Now, if the committee please, I have not finished entirely with General Gerow, but I feel I have finished everything that I can do tonight which will help in the Marshall examination.

The CHAIRMAN. Under those conditions we will recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

General Gerow, you will come on later after General Marshall.

General GEROW. Yes, sir.

(Whereupon, at 4:40 p. m., the committee recessed until 10 a. m., Thursday, December 6, 1945.)

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman), presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel, Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[2763] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.
General Marshall, will you be sworn?

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL OF THE ARMIES GEORGE C. MARSHALL, SPECIAL ENVOY TO CHINA¹

The CHAIRMAN. Counsel may proceed.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, when were you appointed Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. I was appointed Acting Chief of Staff on July 1, 1939, and formally appointed and confirmed Chief of Staff on the 1st of September 1939.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you served until what date?

General MARSHALL. I think it was until November 20 just past.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of this year?

General MARSHALL. Of this year.

Mr. MITCHELL. During your service in the Army have you ever had any service in the Far East?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I spent about 5 years in the Philippines and a little short of 3 years in China.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was your service in China?

General MARSHALL. I was either in command or executive officer of the 15th Infantry at Tientsin.

The CHAIRMAN. General Marshall, will you move a little closer to the microphone, please.

[2764] Mr. MITCHELL. Did you learn the Chinese language when in China?

General MARSHALL. I wouldn't admit that to a language student, but I can carry on a conversation.

Mr. MITCHELL. The gentleman who said you didn't know anything about China the other day will have to revise his ideas, probably.

¹ See Hearings, Part 5, p. 2483, for suggested corrections in his testimony submitted by General Marshall.

Now, will you state in your own way what the functions of the Chief of Staff of the Army were during 1940 and 1941?

General MARSHALL. With your permission I will read the Army regulations on the subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is Exhibit 42.

General MARSHALL (reading):

The Chief of Staff is the immediate advisor of the Secretary of War on all matters relating to the Military Establishment, and is charged by the Secretary of War with the planning, development, and execution of the military program. He will cause the War Department General Staff to prepare the necessary plans for recruiting, mobilization, organizing, supplying, equipping, and training the Army of the United States for use in the national defense and for demobilization. As the agent, and in the name of the Secretary of War, he issues such orders as will insure that the plans [2765] of the War Department are harmoniously executed by all agencies of the Military Establishment, and that the military program is carried out speedily and efficiently.

As Commanding General of the Field Forces.—The Chief of Staff, in addition to his duties as such, is, in peace, by direction of the President, the Commanding General of the Field Forces and in that capacity directs the field operations and the general training of the several Armies, of the oversea forces, and of the GHQ units. He continues to exercise command of the Field Forces after the outbreak of war until such time as the President shall have specifically designated a Commanding General thereof.

Those are the regulations.

Mr. MITCHELL. During 1940 and 1941 will you state in a general way what your general activities were and what problems you were dealing with?

General MARSHALL. They rather subdivided themselves into about four categories. In the first place, there was the mobilization of the Army which referred specifically to personnel and the organization of that personnel. The mobilization procedure was carried out into the corps areas of which there were nine of the United States under my direction. The [2766] organization and creation of the Army I delegated in large measure to a command I set up at what used to be the Army War College with General Leslie McNary as my deputy and he with his staff was held by me directly responsible for the organization and the training of the Army in the continental United States.

The relations with the overseas theaters, the Philippines, Hawaii, Caribbean, that is, Panama, were carried out as to detail, as to plans, proposals for me by what was then called the War Plans Division of the General Staff, now the Operations Division.

[2767] The matériel aspects of the activities were in the hands of a series of bureau chiefs—Chief of Ordnance, the Chief Quartermaster, Chief Signal Officer—and in the case, for example, of the Chief Signal Officer he not only had the problem of procurement of material but also certain operational responsibilities.

I dealt with them partly in person but largely through the medium of the four sections of the General Staff which coordinate supply and the plans and policies relating to supply.

In addition to that, there were special groups on which I had to depend, notably, that of the allocation of matériel which was probably one of the most trying problems of the day in relation to the Russians, the Chinese, the British, and to our own training and to our overseas theaters for their defense.

There was also the problem of priority which a special board, Army and Navy Board, operated and with which I was directly concerned. There was a subdivision of responsibility here, in that the Assistant Secretary, now the Undersecretary of the War Department, was chargeable under the law for the procurement activities in the field of civilian production.

The ordinary administrative point of the Army, as to [2768] records and matters of that kind, I depended largely on the Adjutant General's Department. The general coordination of administration details, I depended at that time on the senior Deputy Chief of Staff, but I created a second deputy who looked after for me the matériel factors concerned.

I think that is the general outline.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice in Secretary Stimson's report, in this Pearl Harbor Army inquiry, he makes this statement:

It is not the function of the Chief of Staff specifically to direct and personally supervise the execution in detail of the duties of the various sections of the General Staff. His paramount duty is to advise the President and the Secretary of War and make plans for and supervise the organization, equipment, and training of the great army for global war, to advise on and himself to make decisions regarding the basic problems of military strategy in the many possible theaters in which the war might develop, and in any other fundamental and broad military problems which confront the United States. It would hopelessly cripple the performance of those great and paramount duties, should the Chief of Staff allow himself to become emerged in administrative details by which the plans for defense are carried out in our Army outposts.

Does that fairly picture in your mind the situation of [2769] the Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. I think it does, sir. Throughout all of that, of course, it was my responsibility to determine, as far as it was humanly possible, what were the critical affairs in all these activities.

I omitted one reference, which was a very responsible duty, and a very difficult duty. That was in the preparation of the budget estimates of the War Department, and the representation before the committees of Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL. What policy did you have during your term as Chief of Staff with respect to the responsibility of commanders in the field, including overseas commanders, in respect to their independent initiative and responsibility and decentralization of action?

General MARSHALL. My endeavor was to select the ablest people available at the time, have their missions defined, and give them the responsibility for the positions which they occupied.

Mr. MITCHELL. You attended the Atlantic Conference at Argentina, did you not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I did.

Mr. MITCHELL. What part did you take in that?

General MARSHALL. I was concerned with what amounted to a first getting-together, coming to know the British Chiefs [2770] of Staff. We had no agenda for our meeting.

We met and discussed general matters, largely regarding the matériel desired by the British, and then we broke up into groups, myself and Field Marshal Sir John Dill, the head man of the ground forces of the British Army.

There was no question of matériel between us because we had given them all of the matériel we could afford to dispense at that time.

I believe on the Navy side, and I am quite certain on the Air side, there was considerable discussion on matériel.

With Field Marshal Sir John Dill and myself, our conversations were almost entirely devoted to a general résumé of the war situation, what the hazards were, what the anticipations were, particularly as to the Middle East and the Mediterranean, and Singapore.

[2771] Mr. MITCHELL. Did you at that meeting know of any commitment that the United States made at that meeting to engage the Nation in war if we were not attacked?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I did not. I was not involved in the political discussions.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you learn anything at that meeting about this proposal to make the parallel protests to the Japanese by England and the United States?

General MARSHALL. My recollection as to that is that I knew nothing of that until a meeting of the liaison group of the State, War, and Navy Departments in Mr. Sumner Welles' office after my return from Argentina.

Mr. MITCHELL. And what did you learn then about that, do you remember?

General MARSHALL. I was given either the information, general information with regard to, or heard read—I do not recall which—a message the President had sent.

Mr. MITCHELL. After he had sent it?

General MARSHALL. After he had sent it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you seen, or did you know about certain conferences that were had by representatives of the Army and Navy with the British on the one hand, called the ABC-1 and 2 conferences, with the Dutch and British in the Far East and with the Canadians?

[2772] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. Admiral Stark brought up the proposition and I acquiesced. He arranged the meeting. I went to his office when we were receiving these officers the day they arrived.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was the British here in the United States?

General MARSHALL. Yes sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know about similar staff conferences that were being held at Singapore between the Americans, Dutch, and British?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I was familiar with that.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the one with the Canadians?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. My recollection of that is, though, that except for the defense board we afterward created, of which Mr. LaGuardia, I think, was the senior American member, we only had one meeting and that was an informal meeting at dinner and after dinner at the home of the Chief of Naval Operations out near the Naval Observatory. That is the only time I saw them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you had an opportunity to look over those three reports; do you have copies of them?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And are you familiar with them?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[2773] Mr. MITCHELL. At this time, Mr. Chairman, I think we will offer those in evidence. We had only one copy heretofore but now they have been mimeographed. I will offer in evidence as exhibit 49—

The CHAIRMAN. All three as one exhibit?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir; I had better separate it. The report of the United States-British staff conversations in the United States; as Exhibit 50 the American-Dutch-British conversations at Singapore in April 1941; and as 51 the report of the conference with the Canadians.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be filed as 49, 50, and 51?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

(The documents referred to were marked "Exhibits Nos. 49, 50, and 51," respectively.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you any knowledge as to which, if any, of those conferences were finally approved, the reports, I mean?

General MARSHALL. The report on the Canadian, with the Canadians was, I believe, formally approved by the President. My recollection is and my knowledge is at this time he gave no formal approval of any of the others.

Mr. MITCHELL. In your examination of those reports do you find anything in that other than the ordinary military [2774] and naval plans to be used on the contingency that you get into trouble with somebody?

General MARSHALL. Would you please repeat that question?

Mr. MITCHELL. What I want to know is whether you interpreted those plans as committing the Government of the United States to engage in war with anybody prior to our being attacked?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not think they do. It was not our intention that they should; quite the contrary. It was our effort to be prepared against what appeared to be a possible eventuality.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did the Army make any deployments or dispositions of troops pursuant to those plans that you remember prior to December 7, 1941?

General MARSHALL. I do not think there were any definite moves unless it may have been into Iceland and I do not recall that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you ever hear, during your service as Chief of Staff, of any commitment that the President or anyone else had attempted to make with any of these other nations by which the United States was committed to engage in war without being attacked?

General MITCHELL. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was there anything about these plans that [2775] you can see by which one of the other nations who participated at the conferences by their action could bring us into war?

General MARSHALL. I do not think there is.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to what we called in this case the Herron alert in 1940 and at this time, Mr. Chairman, I will offer in evidence as exhibit 52 the book containing the communications between the War Department and General Herron concerning the 1940 alert at Hawaii. General Herron was commander of the Hawaiian Department at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be so filed.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 52.")

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you examined those communications as contained in that book, General?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I read it through yesterday morning.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember the fact that the alert was given to General Herron in June 1930?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember the circumstances under which that was done?

General MARSHALL. My recollection of the matter is that it was on the recommendation of Gen. George V. Strong of [2776] the General Staff of the War Department as a result of several branches of information, largely "magic," that there was a possibility of a threat by the Japanese in that area and, therefore, the alert.

Mr. MITCHELL. The alert, the book shows, was given to him over the signature of Adjutant General Adams.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was that at your direction?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the book shows that he continued in his state of alert, though somewhat diminishing, for several weeks after that..

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You are familiar with General Herron's reports that in obedience to the alert he puts his entire command on alert, kept his pilots out at daylight every day?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Ran reconnaissance by air?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And did all those things, kept his gunners at their guns with live ammunition?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And with the report he made that there was very little, if any, excitement among the population [2777] of Hawaii about it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you know how it happened that the Navy did not send any corresponding alert to Admiral Richardson?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall the circumstances. I recall, apropos of the reconnaissance, that either through the Chief of the Air Corps or otherwise there was great concern over our wearing out the engines and we had no replacements in the planes. The problem was how long we could continue that; and, also, we were wearing out the crews.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, the alert continued for several weeks?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you have noticed the reports of General Heron to the effect that there was no serious destruction of matériel?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or wearing out of personnel even during that length of time?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, General, Admiral Richardson has said that he had some conversation with you on one of his visits here respecting that alert and he quoted you as saying:

That was simply an exercise and I thought if I did [2778] not state it was an exercise, the exercise would be carried out more completely.

Do you remember any such conversations with Admiral Richardson?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. Admiral Richardson came out to my house for lunch and we had a talk then after lunch. There were some other guests at the time who also happened to be in Washington that day and I think there must be a misunderstanding in his mind because there was never any question about the purpose of that alert.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to make on behalf of Admiral Richardson a correction he wanted made in his testimony. He stated that he wired in to the Chief of Naval Operations and wanted to know what this was all about, this Herron alert, and never got any reply.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you read it into the record now?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I will not read his whole letter but the substance of it is that he has checked up on that, examined the original record and that there was a reply sent to him on June 22 which reads as follows:

War Department directive concerning alert issued as precautionary measure after consultation with Navy and State Department. Request you continue cooperation.

[2779] And he says that he has checked the records and found that that was actually sent and that he was mistaken. He actually received it.

The CHAIRMAN. Put the whole letter in the record.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will put the whole letter into the transcript.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, could we have the date of the letter?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. The letter he writes me is dated the 28th of November 1945, and he said in his testimony that he would write such a letter after he had checked it up.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

(Admiral Richardson's letter follows:)

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington 25, D. C., 28 November 1945.

Hon. WILLIAM D. MITCHELL,
General Counsel, Joint Committee on the Investigation of the Pearl Harbor Attack.

DEAR SIR: On 21 November, 1945, I stated to the Committee: "I have not had an opportunity to verify what- [2780] ever evidence there is in official records with respect to dispatches exchanged between me and Admiral Stark regarding the Army alert and, therefore, I request that the members of the committee hold in abeyance their judgment on that subject until I have had an opportunity to search the original records" (Page 815 of Report of Proceedings).

I have examined microfilm and photostatic copies of the original records and I find that;

(a) On 22 June 1940 I sent to the Chief of Naval Operations by radio a dispatch reading:

"Commanding General Hawaiian Department received orders War Department placing forces on alert against hostile trans-Pacific raid and since no information received Navy Department have assumed this exercise. Navy patrol planes are participating" (Page 810 of Report of Proceedings).

(b) On 22 June 1940 in reply to the above dispatch the Chief of Naval Operations sent to me by radio a priority dispatch reading:

[2781] The last quoted dispatch was sent from the Navy Department at 10:10 p. m. and was received by me in person as is shown by my initials on the photostatic copy of the dispatch. This dispatch was received by me after 5:00 p. m. Honolulu time on Saturday 22 June when my mind was fully occupied with secret sortie of the major portion of the Fleet which was to take place early Monday morning and since the reply left me in doubt as to the reality of the warning the fact that I received any reply escaped my mind with the result that in early July in Washington I asked both Admiral Stark and General Marshall whether the Army Alert was a real one or an exercise and testified before this Committee that I never received a reply to my dispatch.

J. O. RICHARDSON, Admiral, USN (Ret.)

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to the document which is in our exhibit 16, being a joint memorandum presented by you and the Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Stark, to the President under date of November 5, 1941; that is in evidence. Have you examined that memorandum?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I read that yesterday.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you state in your own way what that incident was and how you happened to make that report or [2782] memorandum?

General MARSHALL. My recollection of the matter is that there was a very urgent appeal from the generalissimo, Gen. Chiang Kai-shek, for assistance in meeting what he thought was a dangerous Japanese threat in an advance from the south toward Kunming. He wished American and British air assistance and other assistance that might be made possible for him. That, of course, would terminate the Burma Road if successful. That is my recollection of the basis of this particular joint memorandum to the President from Admiral Stark and myself.

Mr. MITCHELL. And your recommendations were?

General MARSHALL (reading):

That the dispatch of United States armed forces for intervention against Japan in China be disapproved.

That material aid to China be accelerated consonant with the needs of Russia, Great Britain, and our own forces.

That aid to the American Volunteer Group be continued and accelerated to the maximum practicable extent.

That no ultimatum be delivered to Japan.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were you asked to prepare the memorandum?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, sir.

[2783] Mr. MITCHELL. There is another memorandum, joint, by you and Admiral Stark under date of November 27, 1941, that is our exhibit 17. Will you kindly look at that and state the circumstances or the occasion under which that was made?

General MARSHALL. The circumstances, as nearly as I can recall them now, were a combination of affairs: The quite evident threat south through the China Sea toward Malay, Malasia, and the Dutch East Indies, the development of Japanese power in Indochina, the report of the conversations recently completed at Singapore. Those, as I recall, were the principal factors which brought about this particular memorandum.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your recommendations were what?

General MARSHALL (reading):

That prior to the completion of the Philippine reinforcement, military counter-action be considered only if Japan attacks or directly threatens United States, British, or Dutch territory as above outlined;

In case of a Japanese advance into Thailand, Japan be warned by the United States, the British, and the Dutch governments that advance beyond the lines indicated may lead to war; prior to such warning no joint military opposition be undertaken;

Steps be taken at once to consummate agreements [2784] with the British and Dutch for the issuance of such warning.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice a little earlier in the memorandum this statement:

After consultation with each other, United States, British, and Dutch military authorities in the Far East agreed that joint military counteraction against Japan should be undertaken only in case Japan attacks or directly threatens the territory or mandated territory of the United States, the British Commonwealth, or the Netherlands East Indies, or should the Japanese move forces into Thailand west of 100° East or south of 10° North, Portuguese Timor, New Caledonia, or the Loyalty Islands.

Were you there referring to this military conference held at Singapore in April 1941 that we have just discussed?

General MARSHALL. That, I believe, was the basis of their recommendation, their conclusions there.

Mr. MITCHELL. When you say there that the Dutch, British, and the United States military authorities had agreed to that action did you mean that they had made an agreement on behalf of the United States, or agreed to recommend it to their governments?

[2785] General MARSHALL. Agreed to recommend it. They had no power whatever to agree for our government and it was so stipulated, I think, in the—

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, you made a recommendation at that time that the President join with the other nations in giving warning to Japan that if they did certain things or advanced beyond a certain point it might lead to war. Was that recommendation carried out, was any such message or warning sent to the Japanese at that time?

General MARSHALL. Not that I know of, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to exhibit 24, dated November 30, 1941. It is a message for the President of the United States from the former naval person—that was the term used to describe Mr. Church—in which he says [reading]:

It seems to me that one important method remains unused in averting war between Japan and our two countries, namely a plain declaration, secret or public as may be thought best, that any further act of aggression by Japan will lead immediately to the gravest consequences. I realize your constitutional difficulties but it would be tragic if Japan drifted into war by encroachment without having before her fairly and squarely the direct character of a further aggressive step. I [2786] beg you to consider whether, at the moment which you judge right which may be very near, you should not say that "any further Japanese aggression would compel you to place the gravest issues before Congress" or words to that effect. We would, of course, make a similar declaration or share in a joint declaration, and in any case arrangements are being made to synchronize our action with yours. Forgive me, my dear friend, for presuming to press such a course upon you, but I am convinced that it might make all the difference and prevent a melancholy extension of the war.

That was just 3 days after your recommendation was made. Did you ever see this communication from Mr. Churchill?

[2787] General MARSHALL. I don't recall if I ever saw it.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was the same proposal, wasn't it, to make some kind of joint message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, that is the way I understand it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or some kind of threat to Japan as to what would happen?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your recollection is that no such recommendation, either from Mr. Churchill or yourself, or Admiral Hart, was actually carried out?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now go back to the question of preparations in defense of an air attack at Hawaii.

Admiral Richardson has testified that during 1940 he protested against keeping the fleet in Hawaii. He has also testified, and his documentary protests to the Secretary of the Navy show, that he based his protest not on the question of security of the fleet in port, but because the facilities for training, equipment and preparing the fleet for war were inadequate and he wanted to go back to the coast to do it.

Then it appears he testified when he went back to Honolulu, or Pearl Harbor, in December 1940, at the suggestion of Admiral Stark, he started the investigation as to the [2788] situation, as to the defense against an air attack, and we have in evidence what I call the Bloch report, which is a report that he sent in under date of December 1940 to the Chief of Naval Operations, which was signed by Admiral Stark who was the commander of the Fourteenth Naval District out there, and endorsed by Admiral Richardson.

Did you have that called to your attention when it came in, or do you remember seeing that before?

General MARSHALL. As nearly as I can recall, this is the first time I have ever seen it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, following that report the Secretary of the Navy wrote the Secretary of War under date of January 24, 1941—that is our exhibit 10—in which letter he had some very strong statements, and he said:

The dangers envisaged in their order of importance and probability are considered to be:

- (1) Air bombing attack.
- (2) Air torpedo plane attack.
- (3) Sabotage.
- (5) Submarine attack.
- (5) Mining.
- (6) Bombardment by gun fire.

He called on the Secretary of War to give his attention to the matter, and the Secretary replied that he thoroughly [2789] agreed with him, and from that time on the subject was considered ended.

Did you see that correspondence of the Secretary of War.

General MARSHALL. Yes. My recollection on this particular matter is that I must have been absent when the letter was received, but the draft of the reply for the Secretary of War's signature to the Secretary of the Navy came to me from the War Plans Division.

As I recall that draft, they did not think there was any matériel that could be made available, or virtually no matériel that could be made available earlier than October. I am not quite certain about that, but that is the impression I have now. That, I felt, whatever the circumstances, would put the Secretary of War in a rather impossible position, and therefore I started in with the War Plans Division, with General Moore, my Deputy for Supply, and with General Arnold on the air side, to see what radical measures we might take to meet, to a degree at least, some of the requirements set forth by the Secretary of the Navy.

I might insert here apropos of your question as to whether or not I had seen—did you call it the Bloch letter?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Bloch report, yes.

General MARSHALL. That I had thought it was not Admiral Bloch but it was Admiral Kimmel that had generated this letter [2790] from the Secretary of the Navy up until almost this moment.

The measures we took under the circumstances were, first, as to planes. After discussing the matter with General Arnold I made the decision that we would rob practically all the Combat Pursuit Squadrons of the United States of most of their P-36 planes which was our then most serviceable type as the new P-40 had certain engine defects which had not yet been eradicated.

My recollection is—General Arnold can give you the positive testimony—that we cut most of the squadrons in the United States down to three planes. The difficulty there was, of course, that stopped the training of the Air Corps, which had to be expanded from about 1,800 men to two million and a quarter.

I took up with Admiral Stark over the telephone the problem of getting these planes to Hawaii without the necessity for crating them, which takes time for disassembling and which takes time for assembling. Whatever the conversations were, it was determined that a carrier could come into San Diego in February and pick up those planes, and I think there were other naval and marine matériel to go on the same carrier.

A number of these planes were sent out, thirty odd, I think, sufficient, with the 19 P-36's then in Hawaii, to make an even 50.

[2791] I also directed General Arnold to take up with the Curtiss people in Buffalo the expediting of their production schedule, to turn out the new P-40, which had more modern equipment and presumably would have eradicated the engine difficulties of the original model, in time for them to be shipped out to Hawaii at an early date. The date was fixed as March 15, as I recall now, as the only time a carrier could be spared from Hawaii to come into San Diego to pick up the planes. Just why that time was fixed I do not recall now.

Therefore the schedule of the Curtiss-Wright plant had to be greatly expedited. General Arnold can give you the facts.

My understanding of the matter was that the head of the firm came to Washington to see General Arnold and stated that he could not expedite the program. General Arnold brought this to my attention and I directed General Arnold to go to Buffalo and bring heavy pressure to bear on those people to at least make the effort. He did that and was successful, they made the effort, and the last planes were cleared on March 9, in time to fly to San Diego and take off in the carrier on March 15.

The other details as to matériel are covered in the letter of the Secretary of War in reply to the Secretary of [2792] the Navy.

In all these matters the great problem was how we could meet the requirements of developing an army, which had to have the tools with which to train and without which it cannot train; how we could get something for the Philippines, which literally had nothing; how we could develop the Panama Canal defenses, which were very deficient, and how we could meet certain commitments that we had with our Allies, notably the British, in order that they might not be found wanting at a critical juncture in the coming fighting.

It stated—do you wish me to read the letter of the Secretary of War?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

General MARSHALL. This is addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, February—and I cannot read the date—1941.

In replying to your letter of January 24, regarding the possibility of surprise attacks upon the Fleet or the Naval Base at Pearl Harbor, I wish to express complete concurrence as to the importance of this matter and the urgency of our making every possible preparation to meet such a hostile effort. The Hawaiian Department is the best equipped of all our overseas departments, and continues to hold a high priority for the completion of its projected defenses because of [2793] the importance of giving full protection to the Fleet.

The Hawaiian project provides for 148 pursuit planes. There are now in Hawaii 36 pursuit planes; 19 of these are P-36's and 17 are of somewhat less efficiency. I am arranging to have 31 P-36 pursuit planes assembled at San Diego for shipment to Hawaii within the next 10 days, as agreed to with the Navy Department. This will bring the Army pursuit group in Hawaii up to 50 of the P-36 type and 17 of a somewhat less efficient type. In addition, 50 of the new P-40-B pursuit planes, with their guns, leakproof tanks and modern armor will be assembled at San Diego about March 15 for shipment by carrier to Hawaii.

There are as present in the Hawaiian Islands 82 3-inch anti-aircraft guns, 20 37-millimeter anti-aircraft guns (enroute), and 109 caliber 50 anti-aircraft machine guns. The total project calls for 98 3-inch anti-aircraft guns, 120 37-millimeter anti-aircraft guns, and 308 caliber 50 anti-aircraft machine guns.

With reference to the Aircraft Warning Service, the equipment therefor has been ordered and will be delivered in Hawaii in June. All arrangements for installation will have been made by the time the [2794] equipment is delivered. Inquiry develops the information that delivery of the necessary equipment cannot be made at an earlier date.

The Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, is being directed to give immediate consideration to the question of the employment of balloon barrages and the use of smoke in protecting the Fleet and Base facilities. Barrage balloons are not available at the present time for installation and cannot be made available prior to the summer of 1941. At present there are three on hand and 84 being manufactured—40 for delivery by June 30, 1941, and the remainder by September. The Budget now has under consideration funds for 2,950 balloons. The value of smoke for screening vital areas on Oahu is a controversial subject. Qualified opinion is that atmospheric and geographic conditions in Oahu render the employment of smoke impracticable for large scale screening operations. However, the Commanding General will look into this matter again.

With reference to your other proposals for joint defense, I am forwarding a copy of your letter and this reply to the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, and am directing him to cooperate with the [2795] local Naval authorities in making those measures effective.

Signed, "Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War."

Mr. MITCHELL. Now during the remainder of 1941 did you keep in touch with the resulting plans that were made for defense against air attack at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have in evidence as our exhibit 44 a joint estimate made by General Martin as commander of the Army Air Force at Hawaii, and Admiral Bellinger, who was commander of the Naval Air Force of the 14th Naval District, dated March 31, 1941.

[2796] The estimate was:

(a) Relations between the United States and Orange—that was Japan—are strained, uncertain and varying.

(b) In the past Orange has never preceded hostile actions by a declaration of war.

(c) A successful, sudden raid against our ships and naval installations on Oahu might prevent effective offensive action by our forces in the Western Pacific for a long period.

(d) A strong part of our Fleet is now constantly at sea in the operating areas organized to take prompt offensive action against any surface or submarine force which initiates hostile action.

(e) It appears possible that Orange submarines and/or an Orange fast raiding force might arrive in Hawaiian waters with no prior warning from our Intelligence Service.

In paragraph III they say:

Possible enemy action:

(a) A declaration of war might be preceded by:

1. A surprise submarine attack on ships in the operating area;
2. A surprise attack on Oahu including ships and installations in Pearl Harbor.
3. A combination of these two.

[2797] They say also:

It appears that the most likely and dangerous form of attack on Oahu would be an air attack. It is believed that at present such an attack would most likely be launched from one or more carriers which would probably approach inside of 300 miles.

They say also:

A single attack might or might not indicate the presence of more submarines or more planes waiting to attack after defending aircraft have been drawn away by the original thrust.

They say:

Any single submarine attack might indicate the presence of a considerable undiscovered surface force probably composed of fast ships accompanied by a carrier.

Then, they go on on at great length, and I will not read the rest of it, but visualizing the way the situation could be handled and the possibility of long-range reconnaissance, and keeping track of the Japanese the night before.

Do you remember seeing that report?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is another one that came in later by General Martin, a study of the air situation in Hawaii, addressed by him, under date of August 20, 1941, to the [2798] Commanding General, Army Air Forces, Washington, D. C., and forwarded by General Short. That is exhibit 13. Have you had your attention called to that?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, I recall seeing it at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL. He deals there very vividly with the possibilities of an air attack and the possible defense against it. You have that before you.

Now, I will offer in evidence as exhibit 53, a book containing the correspondence between—

General MARSHALL. May I interrupt?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, do so.

General MARSHALL. Before we pass these last two documents by, there was a memorandum from me regarding this air situation in Hawaii which more or less started up these various reports.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you that memorandum with you?

General MARSHALL. I haven't it with me, but I will obtain it and have it sent to you. I was shown it yesterday. It was signed by Colonel Orlando Ward.

Mr. MITCHELL. Signed by whom?

General MARSHALL. Signed by Colonel Orlando Ward, the then Secretary of the General Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will get that later.

[2799] Senator BREWSTER. It is dated July 17, 1941. That is in exhibit 13.

Mr. MITCHELL. Exhibit 13 is the letter from General Short to the Commanding General of the Air Forces.

Senator BREWSTER. The first paragraph.

Mr. MITCHELL. It says in the first paragraph:

In compliance with copy of corrected memorandum for the Commanding General, Army Air Forces, OCS, 17234-25, from the Secretary, General Staff, dated July 17, 1941—

General MARSHALL. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL (reading):

that a study be made of the air situation in Hawaii, there is attached for consideration of the War Department a plan for the employment of long-range bombardment aviation in the defense of Oahu. This plan clearly presents the air defense of the Hawaiian Islands. Attention is called to the recommendations therein.

That is the memorandum that you referred to, and that you prepared, that called for this report?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator BREWSTER. Has the whole memorandum been available?

General MARSHALL. I will obtain it and send it to the committee.

[2800] I interrupted you, Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad you did.

General MARSHALL. You started to read that correspondence.

Mr. MITCHELL. We were about to offer in evidence as exhibit 53, a book of correspondence between General Marshall and General Short, commencing in February 1941.

Before we go into that, I will call your attention to a memorandum dated February 6, 1941, of a conference in the Office of the Chief of Staff. The initials are "O.W."

Whom does that mean, do you remember?

General MARSHALL. I think that is Col. Orlando Ward, the Secretary of the General Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. This memorandum states that the conference was held and present were yourself and General Arnold, General Miles, and General Gerow, and the subject was defense of Pearl Harbor.

General MARSHALL. Do you wish me to read it, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will save your voice a little and read it myself.

General MARSHALL. I do not mind.

Mr. MITCHELL. Try it, then. I will relay you occasionally.

General MARSHALL. (reading):

Present: General Marshall, General [2801] Arnold, General Miles, General Gerow

Subject: Defense of Pearl Harbor.

General Marshall indicated that the Navy had insufficient nets for defense against either submarine or plane carried torpedoes. He further indicated that there was a possibility of a Japanese attack.

This is February 6, 1941.

General Miles stated that nothing in G-2 indicated any such probability.

General Marshall stated that the planes in Honolulu were, in general, obsolescent, and that we should have a reasonable number of top flight planes which would out-perform any the Japanese could bring on their carriers.

General Arnold recommended that 31 P-36s be sent immediately in a Navy carrier to Honolulu, and that 50 P-40Bs be sent as soon as available (in March).

General Marshall stated that we really had two active defense issues—one, Panama, and the other, Honolulu.

General Arnold was to make the necessary preliminary arrangements in connection with changing plans and report to the Chief.

Mr. MITCHELL. When you said we had two active defense issues: one, Panama, and the other, Honolulu, will you develop what your idea was at that time? What was your idea in [2802] mentioning those two points?

General MARSHALL. They were the great outposts of our continental defense. We had the Philippines at that time but the equipment there and the number of troops was so inadequate that no defense against a first class power was conceivable; it would be just a desperate sacrifice.

(The correspondence between General Marshall and General Short, referred to above, was marked "Exhibit No. 53.")

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a letter from you to General Short which is dated February 7, 1941, in this Exhibit 53, which I will read for you, General.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is addressed [reading from Exhibit No. 53]:

Lieut. Gen. WALTER C. SHORT,
Fort Shafter,
Territory of Hawaii.

MY DEAR SHORT: I believe you take over command today, however, the reason for this letter is a conversation I had yesterday with Admiral Stark.

He spoke of Admiral Kimmel, the new Fleet Commander, regarding his personal characteristics. He said Kimmel was very direct, even brusque and undiplomatic in his approach to problems; that he was at heart a very kindly man, though [2803] he appeared rather rough in his methods of doing business. I gathered that he is entirely responsive to plain speaking on the part of the other fellow if there is frankness and logic in the presentation. Stark went so far as to say that he had, in the past personally objected to Kimmel's manners in dealing with officers, but that Kimmel was outstanding in his qualifications of command, and that this was the opinion of the entire Navy.

I give you this as it may be helpful in your personal dealings with Admiral Kimmel, not that I anticipate that you would be supersensitive, but rather that you would have a full understanding of the man with whom you are to deal.

Admiral Stark said that Kimmel had written him at length about the deficiencies of Army matériel for the protection of Pearl Harbor. He referred specifically to planes and to antiaircraft guns. Of course the facts are as he represents them regarding planes, and to a less serious extent regarding caliber .50 machine guns. The 3-inch antiaircraft gun is on a better basis. What Kimmel does not realize is that we are tragically lacking in this matériel throughout the Army, and that Hawaii is on a far better basis than any other command in the Army.

The fullest protection for the Fleet is the rather than a major consideration for us, there can be little question [2804] about that; but the Navy itself makes demands on us for commands other than Hawaii, which make it difficult for us to meet the requirements of Hawaii. For example, as I told Stark yesterday—he had been pressing me heavily to get some modern antiaircraft guns in the Philippines for the protection of Cavite, where they have collected a number of submarines as well as the vessels of the Asiatic Fleet—at the present time we have no antiaircraft guns for the protection of Cavite, and very little for Corregidor. By unobtrusively withdrawing 3-inch guns from regiments now in the field in active training, we had obtained 20 3-inch guns for immediate shipment to the Philippines. However, before the shipment had been gotten under way the Navy requested 18 of these guns for Marine battalions to be specially equipped for the defense of islands in the Pacific. So I am left with two guns for the Philippines. This has happened time and again, and until quantity production gets well under way, we are in a most difficult situation in these matters.

I have not mentioned Panama, but the Naval requirements of defense there are of immense importance, and we have not been able to provide all the guns that are necessary, nor to set up the Air units with modern equipment. However, in this instance, we can fly the latest equipment to Panama in [2805] one day, some of it in four hours.

You should make clear to Admiral Kimmel that we are doing everything that is humanly possible to build up the Army defenses of the Naval overseas installations, but we cannot perform a miracle. I arranged yesterday to ship 31 of the P38 planes to Hawaii by aircraft carrier from San Diego in about ten days. This will give you 50 of this type of plane, deficient in speed compared to the Japanese carrier based pursuit, and deficient in armament. But at least it gives you 50 of the same type. I also arranged with Admiral Stark to ship 50 P40-B pursuit planes about March 15th by Naval carrier from San Diego. These planes just came into production this week and should be on a quantity basis of about 8 a day by the first week in March.

The Japanese carrier based pursuit plane, which has recently appeared in China, according to our information, has a speed of 322 miles an hour, a very rapid ability to climb and mounts two .20 mm and two .30 cal. guns. It has leak-proof tanks and armor. Our P40-B will have a speed of 360 miles an hour with two .50 cal. machine guns and four of .30 caliber. It will lack the rapidity to climb of the Japanese plane. It will have leak-proof tanks and armor.

We have an earlier model of this plane, the P40, [2806] delivered between August and October, but the Chief of the Air Corps opposes sending it to Hawaii because of some engine defect which makes it unsafe for training flights over water. Up to the present time we have not had available a modern medium bomber or a light bomber. This month the medium bomber will go into production, if not quantity production. This plane has a range without bombs of 3,000 miles, carries 2,000 pounds and has a speed of 320 miles an hour—a tremendous improvement on the old B18 which you now have. It can operate with bombs 640 miles to sea, with a safe reserve against the return trip. We plan to give you first priority on these planes. I am looking into the question of providing at least a squadron of Flying Fortress planes for Hawaii.

I am seeing what can be done to augment the .50 caliber machine gun set-up, but I have no hopes for the next few months. The Navy approached us regarding barrage balloons. We have three now under test, and 80 in process of manufacture and 3,000 to be procured if the President will release our estimates. However, this provides nothing against the next few months. I am looking into the question of possibly obtaining some from England, but they are asking us and not giving us these days. The first test of the first forty deliveries in June will probably be made in Hawaii.

[2807] You, of course, understand the pressures on the Department for the limited materiel we have for Alaska, for Panama, and, most confidentially, for the possible occupation of the Azores, not to mention the new leased bases. However, as I have already said, we are keeping clearly in mind that our first concern is to protect the Fleet.

My impression of the Hawaiian problem has been that if no serious harm is done us during the first six hours of known hostilities, thereafter the existing defenses would discourage an enemy against the hazard of an attack. The risk of sabotage and the risk involved in a surprise raid by Air and by submarine, constitute the real perils of the situation. Frankly, I do not see any landing threat in the Hawaiian Islands so long as we have air superiority.

Please keep clearly in mind in all of your negotiations that our mission is to protect the base and the Naval concentrations, and that purpose should be made clearly apparent to Admiral Kimmel. I accentuate this because I found yesterday, for example, in a matter of tremendous importance, that old Army and Navy feuds, engendered from fights over appropriations, with the usual fallacious arguments on both sides, still persist in confusing issues of national defense. We must be completely impersonal in these matters, at least so far as our own nerves and irritations are concerned. [2808] Fortunately, and happily I might say, Stark and I are on the most intimate personal basis, and that relationship has enabled us to avoid many serious difficulties.

Faithfully yours,

[Stamped] (Sgd) G. C. MARSHALL

Does that letter to General Short fairly reflected the difficulties you had at that time in obtaining matériel, planes, and other equipment?

General MARSHALL. I think it does, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. All through this letter in your discussions, were you considering equipment, planes, and guns needed for defense against an air attack?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention now to the minutes of a meeting of the General Council, February 19, 1941.¹

What was the General Council as it stood at that time?

General MARSHALL. I haven't the regulation here which creates the General Council.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was that established by some regulation?

General MARSHALL. It was established, I think, by General MacArthur. That involved all the principal chiefs of the War Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was a War Department council and not a general council?

[2809] General MARSHALL. Purely War Department. It was the basis for keeping all the various and numerous chiefs of the War Department coordinated and aware of the general situation and requirements.

Mr. MITCHELL. The minutes of this General Council meeting show you were present, Major General Bryden, Deputy Chief of Staff, Major General Moore, Deputy Chief of Staff, and the Chief of Infantry, the Chief of Cavalry, Chief of Field Artillery, Chief of Coast Artillery, Chief of Air Corps, General Brett, and many other officers.

The minutes start out with the statement that this is not a complete record of the minutes, but contains extracts and the statement which we understand you made there was:

To give you a further view of the special circumstances we have been pressed by the Navy to provide more security for the Fleet that has been gathering at Manila.

And you discuss the Manila situation and the general Philippine situation and then you proceed:

Out in Hawaii, the Fleet is anchored, but they have to be prepared against any surprise attack. I don't say any probable attack, but they have to be prepared against a surprise attack from a trick ship or torpedo planes. Our whole Navy power in general is concentrated there; they can't cruise for the next six months.

¹ Subsequently admitted to the record as Exhibit No. 54.

[2810] And you discussed at some length the question of anti-aircraft guns and planes which might be available.

General Mauborgne said that another question has to do with change in priorities;—

General Mauborgne, is that?

General MARSHALL. General Mauborgne, Chief of the Signal Corps.

Mr. MITCHELL (continuing):

these pursuit people can't work without their detectors and if the situation is such that you need guns for the protection of the Navy somewhere in Hawaii, that you are going to have to change priorities and get some aircraft warning units mobilized.

General Marshall said we are on that right now.

General Moore said that we are making a complete study of that whole question on aircraft warning and also with reference to priorities and where we are going to establish this service first. The question came up in connection with the Alaskan aircraft warning service.

General Marshall said that with reference to priorities, he had put the cards on the table with Admiral Stark and said, where do you want it. The protection of the Fleet is of major consideration. He said that Admiral Stark was quite embarrassed. When the next planes come out over and above the .50 millimeter planes, it is a question of where [2811] they go, to Panama or the Philippine Islands. That will be up to the Navy. "I am going to allow them to practically dictate where those planes should go until we reach a certain degree of security." We haven't any modern medium bombers. They are just beginning to come off the line. The question is where do they go. That is a Navy decision, for the protection of the Fleet, and at the present time for the protection of our shores. I don't think they want the first ones in Manila. They will probably say that they want them first in Hawaii. Then how many in Panama. The Navy can almost tell us. Those priorities will all have to be solved in terms of protection of the Navy in the immediate situation.

Was that your policy all through this period?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[2812] Mr. MITCHELL. Do you want to add anything to what the minutes of the meeting report?

General MARSHALL. I can think of nothing at the moment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to a letter from General Short to you under date of February 19, 1941, in this book we have just offered in evidence, Exhibit 53.

He says [reading from Exhibit No. 53]:

I was very glad indeed to have your letter of February 7, as it gave us some very definite information on aircraft we did not have.

He says that he is getting along well with Admiral Kimmel and Admiral Bloch.

I have told them that from my point of view there will be no hair-splitting, but that the one thing that would affect any decision where there is an apparent conflict between the Army and the Navy in the use of facilities would be the question of what could produce the greatest combined effort of the two forces.

As a result of my short study of the conditions here, I believe that the following are of great importance and I am taking steps to carry out the necessary changes.

1. Cooperation with the Navy.
2. Dispersion and protection of aircraft and the repair, maintenance and servicing of aircraft.

[2813] 3. Improvement of the antiaircraft defense.

4. Improvement of the Harbor Defense Artillery.

5. Improvement of the situation with reference to searchlights.

6. Provision for more rapid movement of supplies and reserves by improvement in roads and trails.

7. Bomb-proofing of vital installations such as Command Posts and Communications Centers.

8. Increase in the number of Engineer troops.

Then he discusses the dispersion and protection of aircraft and bomb ers; improvement of the antiaircraft defense; and other activities that didn't directly relate to antiaircraft defense.

He also mentions bomb-proofing of vital installations, such as command posts and communication service.

That is a defense movement against air attack, is it not, bomb-proofing of vital installations?

General MARSHALL. Against air attack, against, maybe, fleet bombardment and against, maybe, a landing, if it should take place.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you any comments to make on that letter, General Marshall?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. It did make you aware of the fact that [2814] General Short had taken your letter of February 7 to heart and was actively interested in aircraft, antiaircraft measures out there?

General MARSHALL. Very much so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to the minutes of a meeting of the "Conference in the Office of the Chief of Staff" Tuesday, February 25, 1941.

I think I did not offer this in evidence, the one of February 19, which I should have offered, as Exhibit 54. That is "Notes on General Council Meeting," February 19, 1941.

I offer it as exhibit 54 and I will offer the minutes of the conference of February 25, 1941, in evidence as Exhibit 55.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you go through that, General Marshall, and make any comments on it that occur to you. I will read it if you like.

General MARSHALL. No, sir. I am scanning it here.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think maybe I had better read it.

General MARSHALL. I can read it for you.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right, sir.

General MARSHALL (reading Exhibit No. 55):

Conference in the Office of the Chief of Staff at 10:00 a. m., Tuesday, February 25, 1941.

[2815] Present: Chief of Staff, General Emmons, General Arnold, General Brett, General Spaatz, General Gerow, Colonel McNarney, Colonel Anderson, Colonel Twaddle.

CHIEF OF STAFF. In view of the Japanese situation the Navy is concerned with the security of the fleet in Hawaii, and apparently the new commander of the fleet there has made a check and reported it to Washington and the Secretary of the Navy has outlined the situation to the Secretary of War. Their particular point is the type of air force in Hawaii, particularly Pursuit. They are in the situation where they must guard against a surprise or trick attack. It is necessary for the fleet to be in anchorage part of the time and they are particularly vulnerable at that time. I do not feel that it is a possibility or even a probability but they must guard against everything. We also have information regarding the possible use of torpedo planes. There is the possible sudden introduction of Japanese carrier-based planes of the Messerschmidt type which has a speed of 322 miles per hour, armored, etc. The Navy viewpoint is that the whole fleet is involved and that the sea power of the United States might be [2816] jeopardized. We have already arranged to send 31 P-36 ships there. The Curtis plant has moved up the delivery date of 50 additional planes to March 10th; the Navy is sending a Carrier back for these ships. The issue is the priority with regard to new equipment. Admiral Hart has six new submarines, one old cruiser, and not one AA gun. They have now brought up the question of moving some armament from Corregidor. The planes in the Philippines are of the Swedish type which the Chinese turned down. If we had a single squadron of modern planes in the Philippines, it would at least give the Japanese something to think about. Then we have the question of Panama—no modern planes. I understand that the P-40s have some engine trouble which makes them dangerous flying over water. Consequently, our original allocation will be changed by the Japanese situation. Also I have a memorandum with reference to a British request for 50,000 airplanes, to be delivered in 1942. We have a deficiency of 10,000 in organizing the 14,000 program. We are concerned with the reduction of the assignment to the GHQ Air Force. It was thought to our advantage to have as many as possible in foreign garrisons. I have just been talking about pursuit. We have started [2817] a proposition to fill up outlying garrisons, those close to home aren't so much of a problem.

Colonel ANDERSON. We have made a tentative allocation of planes as follows: First priority: to the Philippine Islands—one interceptor squadron, one medium bomber squadron. To Alaska—one composite group. To Hawaii and Panama—sufficient strength to meet a two-carrier attack. To Puerto Rico—one pursuit group and two bomber groups. Second priority: The equipment for an emergency force to South and Central America—three groups of heavy or medium bombers, two groups of light bombers, and two groups of intercept. Third priority: Remainder of the GHQ, minimum training requirements for the remainder of the 54 group program. We will complete training requirements before January 1942; will complete the 54 group in intercept pursuit in January 1942; fighter pursuit in July 1942; heavy bombers in April 1942; medium bombers in December 1941; light bombers in April 1942.

CHIEF OF STAFF. What do you think about this, Emmons?

He was the commander of the GHQ Air Force.

General EMMONS. We have little means to accomplish [2618] or plans in GHQ Air Force. We are 850 officers short on the 25-group program and we won't get the shortage made up until July, then we will only have graduates of training centers. If we make the normal assignments to staff echelons, we will have less than 100 officers with 2 years service to distribute over 34 groups. With respect to planes, we have 500 combat types for instance. With regard to the P-36 we had to get 31 to send to Hawaii, it took all we had (71) to get the 31 out, due to repairs, ships on the ground, etc. The backbone of our present airplane strength is the B-18 of which we have 140. Of the 193 P-40's we now have only 175, many are out of commission for lack of spare parts. We have 50 B-17's, also 4 P-39's and 5 A-20A. We are also short of spare parts. Although we have on paper about 500 planes, I doubt that we could put 300 in the air.

General ARNOLD. The 25 group program is supposed to be completed by July 1941; the 54 group by April 1942.

General EMMONS. With regard to sending equipment on foreign service it would be a mistake to send new planes overseas until the defects inherent with new materiel have been ironed out. We have changes on the 50 P-40B's to go to Hawaii, probably won't make much [2819] difference except with the engine.

General BRETT. The engine is improving all the time. The P-40D has a new engine.

CHIEF OF STAFF. How about the Air Depot in Hawaii?

General EMMONS. It functions very well.

General ARNOLD. With regard to this shortage of parts, we are going to have to manufacture parts in the depots—we used to do it before.

General BRETT. The shortage in parts is due to the fact that we have pushed the plane manufacturers so far the planes that they have been forced to neglect, in a measure, the production of spare parts.

General EMMONS. With regard to organization equipment, we are in pretty good shape. The only shortage is in cameras and octants. With regard to the allocation, I don't know what to say. With regard to a tactical point, Hawaii has a peculiar situation—pursuit is of little value at night, at which time—due to phosphorescence in the water—primary targets, dry-docks, the fleet, etc., stand out on the darkest night. They will have no warning service until they get detectors and pursuit would be useless. I would have long range bombers and not send pursuit, but bombers.

Conference Adjourned.

[2820] Mr. MITCHELL. Does that reflect the problems you were dealing with at that time?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you any comment to make on that situation that is developed by that conference?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I don't think of anything that isn't pretty well covered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention to a letter you wrote to General Short on March 5, 1941. It says [reading from exhibit No. 53:]

MY DEAR SHORT: I would appreciate your early review of the situation in the Hawaiian Department with regard to defense from air attack. The establishment of a satisfactory system of coordinating all means available to this end is a matter of first priority. General Chaney has prepared a report of recent exercises held in the United States and incorporated therein his views and recommendations based on his experience in these exercises and his observation of the system and method employed by the British. A copy of this report is being sent to you.

An air defense exercise is contemplated for the West Coast in the Spring. This exercise is to include an establishment similar to that which has been set [2821] up in the Air Defense Command exercise in the Northeast and tested during January. It is highly desirable that representatives from Hawaii be present to observe the details of this exercise. If this is found to be impracticable, we will consider having officers sent to the exercise who shortly thereafter are due for station in Hawaii.

Now, what inspired that request for an early review at that date from General Short of the situation in the Hawaiian Department?

General MARSHALL. The fact that we were beginners at the business of organizing for the meeting of air attacks, the employment of radar and operation of these boards where all the movements of the ships were kept graphically illustrated, the directions to meet varying attacks. The British, of course, had developed that to a high degree in the Battle of Britain. General Chaney was directed to observe all the details of their procedure in England. He was an air officer. I recalled him to the United States, stationed him at Mitchel Field in Long Island, with directions to develop there a practical method of handling aircraft and antiaircraft in resisting air attacks and the employment of radar.

He carried on quite a development and finally had maneuvers. We carried those maneuvers eventually down the entire coast [2822] and also finally out on the west coast.

I was concerned that everybody in the Air Corps, everybody concerned with the anti-aircraft, understood the technique and its application. I, therefore, wished General Short to be brought into the picture and to have the last word so far as we could determine as to the best method of meeting air attacks.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well now, your letter was dated March 5, and there appears in this book a letter from General Short to you dated March 6. That could not have been a reply to your letter. It doesn't so state. The letters probably crossed in the mail.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That letter to you of March 6, 1941, in it General Short says [reading from Exhibit No. 53]:

Dear General Marshall: One of the first projects which I investigated in this Department was the Aircraft Warning Service which I believe is vital to the defense of these Islands. At the present time the maximum distance an approaching airplane can be detected is about 5 miles. The radio detector equipment of the Aircraft Warning Service increases this distance to 120 miles, and in these Islands, the use of this equipment is the only way by [2823] which the detection distance can be increased. With the present international situation it seems to me that if this equipment is to be used at all the need for it is now here.

The Navy is vitally interested in this project. At present with the Fleet in Hawaiian waters, there is no adequate warning service. The Commander in Chief of the Fleet has expressed his concern about this and had communicated this concern to the Navy Department; as you know, the Secretary of War has advised the Secretary of the Navy that the equipment would be received in this Department sometime in June and the stations be operating shortly thereafter. I have discussed this matter with Admiral Kimmel and have assured him that personnel would be trained and the stations in operation within 30 days after receipt of the equipment.

I probably ought to read the rest of it.

All this leads up to a radiogram of 3 March 1941 just received from the Adjutant General regarding the Haleakala installation. A copy of this radio and a paraphrase of my reply are enclosed for ready reference. The Adjutant General's radio indicates to me that the seriousness of this situation has not yet been [2824] appreciated in the War Department. It lists certain restrictions regarding construction, and if it is necessary to comply with these, the completion of this station will be unduly delayed. The fixed station at the summit of Haleakala is one of the two most important in the warning net; its commanding location gives it greater coverage than any of the others, and its early completion is vital. I believe that this matter is sufficiently important to be brought to the attention of the Secretary of War to see if permission cannot be obtained from the Secretary of the Interior to construct the Haleakala installation without the necessity of submitting detailed plans for consideration by the National Park Service.

Defense of these Islands and adequate warning for the United States Fleet is so dependent upon the early completion of this Aircraft Warning Service that I believe all quibbling over details should be stopped at once. This project was very thoroughly studied by a Board of officers in this Department who made several personal investigations of each one of the sites. Now that basic decisions as to locations, types of stations, and general plans have been approved by the War Department, I strongly recommend that this project be [2825] decentralized and that I be authorized to give final approval to designs, layouts and other details to expedite its completion.

Do you remember that Secretary of War Stimson was especially interested in these radar detectors?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, he was very much interested in that particular development.

Mr. MITCHELL. It may be anticipating, but do you know how many mobile or fixed radar detector outfits were sent to Hawaii before December 6?

General MARSHALL. My recollection is that there were six mobile sets in operation at that time and three fixed sets known in operation.

Mr. MITCHELL. In your letter of March 13 to General Short you say:

The progress that you are making in reaching close coordination with local Naval authorities, and so insuring a maximum degree of readiness in your Department, is most gratifying.

Since the Navy deployment in Kaneohe Bay has exceeded the project originally contemplated, I agree with you that the Army should consider assuming responsibility for its defense, and meanwhile defend it within the means available.

[2826] The several letters which you have submitted to The Adjutant General requesting personnel, materiel and funds are being processed. To avoid delay in initiating projects that may be approved, I am tentatively including $3,000,000 in the estimates now being prepared.

Here is a letter from General Bryden to General Short, dated May 15. That wasn't one of your letters.

Senator LUCAS. March 15.

Mr. MITCHELL. March 15, 1941. It says.

The War Department appreciates fully the necessity for the early establishment of the Aircraft Warning Service stations in the Hawaiian Department. However, it will be necessary to comply with certain fixed regulations in those cases where facilities are to be established on lands pertaining to the Department of the Interior. The National Park Service officials are willing to give us the temporary use of their lands when other lands are not suitable for the purpose, but they will not waive the requirements as to the submission of preliminary building plans showing the architecture and general appearance. They are also very definitely opposed to permitting structures of any type to be erected at such places as will be open to view and materially alter the natural appearance [2827] of the reservation.

I have given these matters my personal attention, and have conferred with officials of the National Park Service. War Department radiogram of March 12, 1941 outlines what appears to be the most practical solution at this time. The War Department finds it necessary to ask the Department of the Interior for the use of many tracts of land in the National Parks, and for their cooperation in the transfer of large areas of public land. It is not believed that it would be advisable to attempt to alter the informal decisions of the Department of the Interior by carrying this matter to higher authority, or to prolong the discussion through official channels.

We are as anxious as you are to work out a solution for these problems with the least practical delay, and I know that I can count on you for fullest cooperation.

Signed "William Bryden, in the absence of the Chief of Staff."

Senator FERGUSON. Would counsel read the distribution of that letter?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. It says:

Distribution: 1 Chief of Staff.

Showing a copy of the letter went to the Chief of Staff.

[2828] Here is another letter from General Short to you dated March 15, 1941. It appears to be in answer to your request for a report from him about the air situation.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, before counsel proceeds, I am wondering if General Marshall would care to comment on that letter of March 15.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you. I should have asked him for a comment. I get so interested in these myself that I forget.

General, you heard me read this letter of March 15 which related to sites for the installation of fixed radar stations in Hawaii and the discussion as to the attitude of the Department of the Interior.

General MARSHALL. My recollection of the situation here was General Short pressing very hard to have early action taken to permit the installation of that radar. He had selected a point in one of the National Parks which was a volcanic peak to which the Department of the Interior, or the National Park Service, rather, on the ground objected, and that objection was supported for the time being at least by the Department of Interior National Park Service here in Washington.

[2829] Another site was proposed but that site would have involved about either 25 degrees or 25 percent of the total arc of observation or, rather, of registration of the radar, so that being the case any planes that approached within that arc could not have been detected.

Therefore, General Short was very much concerned to have the radar established on the peak, which gave all around service. He can, of course, tell you the details of this much better than I can.

He was pressing us to get the authority out of the Department of the Interior and the National Park Service. He was also pressing us to secure authority to proceed with the building without any delay which would be involved in sending the plans to the United States for approval here by the National Park Service in the Department of the Interior.

We had been endeavoring through the ordinary channels, so far as I can recall, that follow any business between two separate departments of the Government represented by Cabinet heads and had quite a difficult time obtaining authority to establish the radar section on the peak of the volcano most desired by General Short. That authority was obtained.

However, we were unable, and I think that was the situation at the time of this letter of General Bryden's, though I am not accurate about that, to secure authority for General [2830] Short to proceed with the building without the delay of submitting plans to Washington. General Bryden evidently wrote this letter in order to make clear to General Short our difficulties here and just why we could not obtain that necessary authority.

The records will show, I think, and my recollection is that General Short sent another message or two pressing again that we go after this more vigorously. I then personally went into the matter and talked by telephone with the head of the National Park Service, I believe it was the head, I do not remember the gentleman's name, to secure authority to go ahead with the construction of the station without the delay involved in sending the plans back to the United States.

He told me that could not be; that in each case, notably those where we were constructing similar radar station sites in Maine, along the coast of New England, each one had to be approved in the Department, in the Department of the Interior, before any building could be gone ahead with, if the site lay in any National Park area.

Mr. MITCHELL. This letter—

General MARSHALL. I might finish, though, by saying that that conversation ended with the statement that they could not grant the authority for General Short to go ahead; and, incidentally, what he was trying to do was to get the [2831] station installed and ready to receive the equipment that was then due in June.

Later, and as I recall that afternoon, word came either from the National Park Service or the Department of Interior or otherwise which permitted, as I recall, us to go ahead with the plan, sending just the general statement of the plan by air mail. I think the records will show that development.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, this letter from General Bryden to General Short states that the reason the National Park Service and the Interior Department require the structure plans to be submitted to them in full before they would permit the reservation to be used for such a purpose was based on the question as to whether they were architecturally attractive or altered the natural appearance of the reservation.

Is that your understanding of their basis?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, this letter of March 15, 1941, from General Short to you appears to be a report in response to your letter of the 5th in which you asked him for a review of the air defense situation there. He starts out and says (reading from Exhibit No. 53:)

The most serious situation with reference to an air attack is the vulnerability of both the Army and Navy air fields to the attack.

He develops that at length and reports on the anti- [2832] aircraft artillery. He says:

In general we have no serious shortage in 3 inch antiaircraft artillery, only 16 guns being required to complete our complement. As far as I know no provision has been made for 90-mm antiaircraft guns. 20 out of 135 37-mm antiaircraft guns have been received. The exact date of the arrival of the others is not known. We are still short 236 of .50 caliber machine guns. Perhaps the most serious shortage is 8 long range detectors (AWS)——

What does "AWS" stand for?

General MARSHALL. Air Warning Service.

Mr. MITCHELL (continuing to read from Exhibit No. 53:)

—which are supposed to arrive in June. Our present sound locators have a range of only 4½ miles so they are practically useless. The new detectors will have a maximum range of 120 miles.

Then he discusses the shortage in personnel, which he says is serious.

The coordination of antiaircraft defense. He says of that:

The coordination of Antiaircraft defense presents quite a different picture at Hawaii from that existing in most places on the mainland. The island is so small [2833] that there would not be the same degree of warning that would exist on the mainland. After the installation of our new detectors we shall have some warning from the different islands and almost continuous service in the most dangerous direction for approximately 75 miles. The pursuit aviation, however, will have to be prepared to take the air in the minimum amount of time.

On account of the congestion in the areas at Hickam Field, Pearl Harbor, and Barber's Point, the coordination of the Army and Navy aircraft and of the Antiaircraft Artillery presents a very serious problem. We have had a committee of the Army and Navy working on this subject.

Then he refers to the west coast defense exercise which you have mentioned and said he would like to send both General Martin and General Gardner.

When that report came to your attention did you consider that it showed a sufficiently lively and active interest in the antiaircraft defense on the part of General Short?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. You said in your letter to him of March 28 [reading from Exhibit No. 53]:

I was very glad to receive your letter of March 15 reviewing the air defense situation in your depart- [2834] ment.

Your proposal for relieving congestion by the construction of one additional field and by the dispersion of grounded aircraft in protected bunkers at existing airfields is undoubtedly sound. As soon as you have submitted sufficient details to support the defense of the anticipated expenditures, funds for these purposes will be included in estimates.

A company of aviation engineers will be sent to you during April, and further increases in your engineer garrison are contemplated when the necessary personnel can be made available.

Antiaircraft and aircraft warning service materiel to complete your project requirements is expected to be available for delivery as follows.

Then you give him a list of guns and their dates [continuing to read from Exhibit No. 53]:

I am hopeful of arranging for the early augmentation of your antiaircraft garrison.

I approved your proposal to send General Martin and General Gardner, or their Executives, to the West Coast Defense Exercise.

Have you any comments to make about that?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

[2835] Senator LUCAS. Those dates, Mr. Counsel, in the fourth paragraph are pretty important.

Mr. MITCHELL. The fourth paragraph?

Senator LUCAS. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I did not want to tire the committee or keep the general waiting on account of my reading too long [reading from Exhibit No. 53]:

Antiaircraft and aircraft warning service materiel to complete your project requirements is expected to be available for delivery as follows: sixteen 3" antiaircraft guns, December, 1941; one hundred and fifteen 37mm antiaircraft guns, February, 1942; caliber .50 antiaircraft machine guns, in 1942; four SCR No. 268, April, 1941.

That means four outfits?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were they mobile or fixed, those SCR's, or don't you happen to know about that?

General MARSHALL. I do not know offhand. I think they were mobile.

Mr. MITCHELL. (reading):

Five SCR No. 270 and three SCR No. 271, April and May, 1941.

Do you happen to remember whether those antiaircraft [2836] warning instruments, AWS, for radar were sent out there on the expected dates or would you have to look your records up on that?

General MARSHALL. I think you will have to go to the records for that. All I can tell you offhand at the moment is that there were six mobile stations in operation, as I understand it, on December 7, 1941 and three fixed setups not in operation.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only mention General Short's letter to you of April 14 to call attention to the fact that in that letter he concludes with this statement [reading from exhibit No. 53]:

Knowing that you are very much interested in the progress that we are making in cooperating with the Navy I am enclosing the following agreements made with them:

1. Joint Coastal Frontier Defense Plan Hawaiian Department and Fourteenth Naval District. Annex No. VII, Section VI, Joint Security Measure.
2. Agreement signed by the Commander of the Hawaiian Air Force and Commander, Naval Base Defense Air Force to implement the above agreement.
3. Field Orders No. 1 NS (Naval Security) putting into effect for the Army the provisions of the joint agreement.

[2837] Would you have had time to examine those documents at length, or do you remember having done so?

General MARSHALL. I think that I remember the documents, although I am not quite certain, that arranged for the coordination of air action and defense. I became somewhat familiar with them for the reason that the air officials of the War Department—I do not recall whether it was General Arnold personally or part of his staff, or both—brought objections to me to General Short's arrangements in the coordination in this matter with the Navy, which had to do with the Army Air Corps reluctance in regard to the over-water reconnaissance responsibilities which in this coordinated agreement was naval, and the Air Corps was thinking of their long-range four-engine bombers and what later developed into the great strategical air bombing force.

I did not think their position was sound and I thought General Short's arrangement was sound under the then circumstances which, incidentally, included the fact that he had very few B-17's, about 12 of them, and possibly some old B-18's, that the agreement with the Navy, with its PBV's of long range and considerable endurance at the time, supplemented as might be considered necessary by the Naval Chief by Army planes, was the efficient method of meeting the conditions under the circumstances.

[2838] Mr. MITCHELL. You thought that the long over-water reconnaissance ought to be handled by the Navy with such assistance as the Army Air Forces could give it?

General MARSHALL. Certainly, under the conditions that then existed as to equipment on both sides.

Mr. MITCHELL. You understood at that time then that the arrangement was between the commanders out there that if the naval commander needed additional long range planes to make reconnaissance he would call on the Army for them?

General MARSHALL. And those planes would operate under naval direction.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

General MARSHALL. The complicated part of the procedure, of course, was not that. It was the control of the various fighter planes and the antiaircraft in the very restricted area, particularly of Oahu, especially if the Fleet were there. That was made the responsibility of the Army commander and I thought in terms that were practical of accomplishment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you agree with General Short's conclusion when he spoke in his letter about radar equipment, that even if they had radar equipment of a range of maybe 130 or 150 miles it would necessitate very prompt take-off of pursuit planes in order to respond to such a warning?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I do not know just to what [2839] specific reference that you are referring in connection with that but this is certainly the case. One hundred and twenty miles represents a very few minutes of flying time and that study by General Martin presents possibly other factors which would make the issue even more complicated unless the force is picked up at a great distance.

The planes have to be ready all the time for immediate action and a certain number warmed up. We had that same problem in Panama where it went on week in and week out, almost year in and year out, making it a very difficult problem to meet, the more so where enemy action was not always evident.

Mr. MITCHELL. After he sent you his letter on the 14th enclosing the joint plans and estimates concerning possible air action you seem to have written General Short on May 5, 1941, as follows [reading from Exhibit No. 53]:

My dear Short:

Thank you for your letter of the 14th enclosing the joint plans and the estimate concerning possible air action. It is evident that you have been on the job, and I know that the Navy is delighted to have such generous cooperation.

You say at the end of the letter:

It is most gratifying to hear you say that everything is going along extremely well and do not hesitate [2840] to write at any time.

I take it you were assured by his report that this matter of anti-aircraft defense—I mean the defense against air attack—was being given very diligent attention out there?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a good time to stop. The committee will recess until 2 o'clock.

[2841]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Counsel may proceed with the examination of General Marshall.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, I know the reading of these documents is tedious, but there are only a few documents left that I want to call your attention to before I ask you some general questions.

The next one is a document signed by Harry J. Malony, brigadier general, addressed to the Chief of Staff on May 13, 1941.

I see that it generally relates to "installation of dispersed protection bunkers for 263 pursuit ships, and 95 bombers," and paragraph 3 says [reading from Exhibit No. 56]:

War Plans Division believes:

a. That the danger of sustained air attack against air fields in Hawaii from carrier based aviation is not serious.

Would you tell us what would be meant from a military standpoint by the word "sustained"?

General MARSHALL. My reaction to that at the moment— [2842] I couldn't tell you specifically what it might have been at the time—would be that he was referring to a continuous attack on Hawaii, such as occurred at Okinawa during the landing and heavy fire, rather than a raiding attack, which is of short duration.

Mr. MITCHELL. And he thought for that reason the bunkers against gas and bombs of secondary importance; is that the idea?

General MARSHALL. That would be my conception of it now. I don't recall what conception I had at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will offer that memorandum in evidence as exhibit 56.

The CHAIRMAN. So ordered.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 56.")

Mr. MITCHELL. I have here a memorandum of a conference in the office of the Secretary of War under date of May 19, 1941. Have you that before you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you mind reading it?

General MARSHALL. This is a conference on May 19, 1941, in the office of the Secretary of War:

Present: The Secretary of War—Mr. Stimson
The Under Secretary of War—Judge Patterson
[2843] The Assistant Secretary of War—Mr. McCloy
The Assistant Secretary of War for Air—Mr. Lovett
The Chief of Staff

myself—two deputies—three deputies at that time: General Bryden, General Moore, and General Arnold.

The Secretary, General Staff—Colonel Ward.

Mr. MITCHELL. You might omit the first subject.

General MARSHALL. The first subject relates to Martinique which I understand you wish me to omit.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. The next paragraph having to do with boats for the First Division.

General MARSHALL (reading):

The French cruiser in Martinique is a first class cruiser ship with a top speed of 40 knots.

The Secretary of War asked whether she was in good condition, and was informed that she was.

General Marshall indicated that it would take about ten days for the Navy to get boats for the First Division. He further indicated that it was primarily a naval mission but that the Army Air should participate, both for the help it could give and the experience it would gain. He indicated that the B-18's in Puerto Rico would be staged at St. Croix. Puerto Rico is almost 400 miles from Martinique.

General Marshall then indicated that there were now in the United States 14 B-17's of the most modern type which [2844] he thought should not be sent out of the country in view of the current situation. These had been withheld from the Hawaiian Department contingent.

The Secretary of War asked if this would affect the impregnability of Hawaii.

General Marshall said that it would not. He further said that we need some B-17's (but not of the most modern type) in Panama, and that he is recommending that 9 be sent there. This matter is under consideration.

General ARNOLD. There is now available 50 B-17's without leak-proof tanks and without armor.

General MARSHALL. High bombing is possible in the Caribbean area, due to weather conditions, and these ships without leak-proof tanks could be effectively used there.

[2845] Mr. MITCHELL. We will offer that in evidence as Exhibit 57.

The CHAIRMAN. That is dated May 19, 1941?

Mr. MITCHELL. May 19, "Conference in the Office of the Secretary of War."

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 57".)

Senator BREWSTER. You read it as if St. Croix was in Puerto Rico.

General MARSHALL. I missed the punctuation. I should have given the distance from St. Croix to Puerto Rico.

Senator BREWSTER. That is in the Virgin Islands, is it, St. Croix?

General MARSHALL. I am confused at the moment. I don't know.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call your attention further to a letter dated May 29 from General Short to you. Page 35. Have you found it?

General MARSHALL. I have a copy of it here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you kindly refer to that and read the first two paragraphs.

General MARSHALL. It is dated May 29, 1941, signed Walter C. Short (reading from Exhibit No. 53):

[2846] DEAR GENERAL MARSHALL: I know that you will not have time to look over a detailed account of our recent maneuvers but feel that you might like to have a birdseye view of what we did and the purpose back of it.

The maneuver was divided into three phases. The first phase consisted of the air action and the actual issue of one day's fire and of Engineer Supplies for Field Fortifications and of Engineer Tools. During the air phase our bombers acted under Navy command in cooperation with the Naval Patrol Squadrons and actually located and bombed airplane carriers 250 miles out at sea. The movement of the carrier was entirely free so that the Navy patrol planes had the mission of locating the ship and notifying our bombers and they then made the attack. Pursuit attacked enemy bombers represented by Naval planes and our own bombers when they came in to attack ground defenses. Upon receipt of the warning for this phase our bombers were sent to fields on outlying Islands and pursuit planes were dispersed. The Navy cooperated very fully during this phase and I believe we learned more about the coordination of the Army Air Force, Navy Air Force, and antiaircraft than we had during any previous exercise. Ammunition and engineer supplies had never been actually [2847] issued before and we got considerable data in regard to the time and transportation required to complete the issue.

Mr. MITCHELL. You understand that relates to training or practice, simulated attack by air on Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[2848] Mr. MITCHELL. The rest of the document relates to the other phases that were not related directly to the air attack, were they?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. On July 25 it appears that there was a joint Army and Navy dispatch to Hawaii about economic sanctions. That dispatch was sent by the Navy under date of July 25, from the Chief of Naval Operations to the commanding general of the—or to the commanding chief of the Pacific Fleet and others and it bears in it a statement that it was a joint dispatch from the C. O. and the Chief of Staff of the United States Army. It is on page 2 of Exhibit 32.

Was it the practice at that time occasionally for one department to send a dispatch and in it have a request that it be communicated to the other department in Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; that was a very common practice all the way through in order to protect our codes.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was the occasion of your notifying the Army and Navy commanders at Hawaii of the placing of these embargoes and restrictions?

General MARSHALL. I did not hear the last word.

Mr. MITCHELL. Through these embargoes and restrictions on commerce.

General MARSHALL. That was to apprise them of the developments of the situation in relation to Japan. [2849]

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, was there any idea in your head that the imposition of those embargoes might probably intensify the strain between Japan and the United States?

General MARSHALL. My best recollection is that it was as we say here:

Do not anticipate immediate hostile reaction by Japan through the use of military means but you are furnished this information in order that you may take appropriate precautionary measures.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a letter under date of August 19 from you to General Short. Would you kindly look at that?

General MARSHALL. Is that on page 40?

Mr. MITCHELL. Page 40, yes. You might read the whole letter, General.

General MARSHALL. All right, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it relates all to air matters.

General MARSHALL (reading from Exhibit No. 53):

AUGUST 19, 1941.

DEAR GENERAL SHORT: Your letter of July 11 has been received recommending the selection of Kipapa Field rather than the Kahuku Point Field as a base for the 15th Pursuit Group. The [2850] advantages and disadvantages of each site have been considered. As a result, I feel that the advantages of the Kahuku Point Field outweigh those of the Kipapa Field sufficiently to result in my decision to establish the base on Kahuku Point.

The following factors are among those having a bearing upon my decision:

a. Low clouds and ground mist frequently obtain over the Wheeler Field-Kipapa area, while at the same time on the north shore of Oahu visibility conditions are good. It is believed tactically unsound to place two pursuit groups in an area subject to the same adverse weather conditions. Pursuit operations in defense of Oahu would be seriously hampered during such weather conditions. Selection of the Kahuku Point site places one group in a location where relatively favorable weather may exist when the reverse is true in the Kipapa area.

b. The close proximity of two Army and two Navy air bases in the Schofield Barracks—Pearl Harbor area has resulted in a situation under present conditions which necessitates continuous coordination and control of air traffic in the interests of safety. The addition of a fifth air base in this area will appreciably aggravate [2851] this situation.

I feel sure that the Naval authorities comprehend fully the importance of adequate air defense of the Oahu Naval Installation and accordingly, will entertain favorably and proposal which will implement the efficiency of such defense. I hope, therefore, that they will be agreeable to our proposal to establish an air base at Kahuku Point to the extent of releasing any claim they may have previously established to any part of the area involved.

With best personal regards,

Faithfully yours,

(Stamped) (Sgd.) G. C. MARSHALL,
Chief of Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you happen to remember whether the site you recommended was actually selected?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall right, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will ask you to turn, General, to the letter from General Short to you dated October 14, 1941, appearing on page 43.

General MARSHALL. Do you wish me to read that, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, if you please.

General MARSHALL (reading from Exhibit No. 53):

[2852]

FORT SHAFTER, T. H., October 14, 1941.

General GEORGE C. MARSHALL,

Chief of Staff of the Army,

War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL MARSHALL: I have your letter of October 10th with reference to the use of men of the Air Force on other than strictly air duties. At the time our tentative Standing Operating Procedure was put out the Air Corps had 7229 men. Full Combat details and all overhead required only 3,885 men for the planes and organizations actually on hand. This left a surplus of 3,344 men with no assigned duties during Maneuvers. One of the main reasons for the assignment was to give these men something to do during the Maneuvers. Another reason was the belief that any serious threat of an enemy ground attack of Oahu would come only after destruction of our Air Forces. The fact that our planes had been destroyed would not mean that all the men had been put out of action. It is probable that several thousand men would still be left and it would not look plausible to have them sit down and do nothing while Infantrymen were detailed to protect them and their air fields. The training after the first two weeks takes up only about four hours per [2853] month of their time. It seems to me that they should continue to be trained as Riflemen in the immediate defense of air fields. As regards their use as Military Police that was not correct. The plan was to use them for guarding certain essential utilities, which did not require team training. However, this will be unnecessary as the Legislature has just passed the Home Guard Bill, which will go into effect very soon. They will be able to take over guarding of all essential utilities, highway bridges, railroad bridges, etc.

If it is not desired to train Air Corps men for their own protection and for the final defense of the air fields I would like to be so advised.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, that was a proposal of General Short's to train Air Corps men for guard duty, wasn't it?

General MARSHALL. Well, it was Military Police duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. And to defend the planes on the ground?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And on the next page I think is your letter in which you disapproved of that proposal.

General MARSHALL. I will read that if you wish me to, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

General MARSHALL (reading from Exhibit No. 53):

[2854]

DEAR SHORT: With reference to your letter of October 14, I can understand your motives in giving ground defense training to Air Corps personnel which at present are excess for the equipment provided. However, the present rate of expansion of the Air Force is such that they are having considerable difficulty in obtaining experienced maintenance men and it is important that they be permitted to concentrate on the technical training of all potential mechanics, regardless of available equipment. Also, it is equally important that they utilize all available time on this specialized training and the men not be left without assigned duties particularly during the maneuver period.

I suggest that you prepare a separate phase of your alert plan based on the assumption that the Air Force has been destroyed and a hostile landing effected. This plan could provide for the use of the necessary Air Corps personnel for ground defense and afford a means of indoctrinating them in ground defense tactics. It should, however, for the present at least, be subordinated to their own specific requirements.

It would appear that the best policy would be to [2855] allow them to concentrate on technical Air Corps training until they have completed their expansion program and have their feet on the ground as far as their primary mission is concerned. War Department Training Circular 47, which was issued July 18, 1941, can be accepted as a guide except in extreme situations.

Faithfully yours,

G. C. MARSHALL,
Chief of Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember how many divisions General Short had at the time? Were there two divisions?

General MARSHALL. I think he had a division and a fraction; roughly a reinforced division. I am not quite certain. That is readily obtainable from the figures.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand your idea was that he should use part of his Infantry divisions for work of that kind rather than the Air Corps?

General MARSHALL. To the extent indicated in that. What was going on there back of the letters was this: The Air Corps was engaged in an unprecedented expansion both as to the extent of expansion and the speed with which we had to make it and the Air Corps people themselves were very sensitive to anything that diverted their personnel from the development under that expansion and their representatives [2856] here in Washington, General Arnold and his staff, appealed to me to get this modification so that nothing should interfere with the completion of the technical training of the Air Corps personnel.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, there is just one other document I want to refer to and that is a dispatch from the Chief of Naval Operations dated November 24, 1941, addressed to the Commander in Chief of the Asiatic Fleet, Pacific Fleet, and commandants of the 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th naval districts.

It was a joint dispatch with instructions in it to inform the senior Army officers. It states:

‘ Chances of favorable outcome of negotiations with Japan very doubtful. This situation coupled with statements of Japanese Government and movements their naval and military forces indicate in our opinion that a surprise aggressive movement in any direction including attack on Philippine or Guam is a possibility. Chief of Staff has seen this dispatch concurs and requests action addressees to inform senior Army officers their areas. Utmost secrecy necessary in order not to complicate an already tense situation or precipitate Japanese action. Guam will be informed separately.

Do you remember having authorized that dispatch?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[2857] Mr. MITCHELL. Now, General Marshall, with all these documents before us showing your contacts with Hawaii and your knowledge about the situation there and the question of defense against air attack, will you cast your mind back, if you can, to the latter part of November 1941 and give us the estimate you then had as to the capacity of the forces at Hawaii to resist an air attack, an air raid? I am not asking you now whether you expected one but what your estimate then was of the situation and the capacity with the matériel they had to resist such an attack successfully.

General MARSHALL. The Hawaiian garrison on the Army side was short of four-engined bombers, only having 12; it was short a few three-inch antiaircraft guns and it was short more seriously in lesser calibers of antiaircraft guns. It had been built up to a considerable extent in fighter aircraft.

It had a moderate radar set-up of the portable type then functioning. It had what I thought were ample troops to defend the beaches successfully against a landing attack.

The military forces on Hawaii were in numbers and in equipment more nearly up to the desired standards than any other installation in the Army. My own impression was that the garrison was sufficiently established and equipped and organized to prevent a landing and to successfully resist an [2858] air attack and to defend the naval base.

I was always of the opinion, as indicated particularly by my letter to General Short of February 7, I believe, that the principal problem there was to be prepared against an emergency of a surprise attack which might come at any time, presumably with the least possible advance notice. In that letter I stated, if you recall:

My impression of the Hawaiian problem has been that if no serious harm is done us during the first six hours of known hostilities, thereafter the existing defenses would discourage an enemy against the hazard of an attack. The risk of sabotage and the risk involved in a surprise raid by Air and by submarine, constitute the real perils of the situation. Frankly, I do not see any landing threat in the Hawaiian Islands so long as we have air superiority.

Would you repeat your question again to me, please, to see if I got it straight?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I was trying to draw out your judgment as of the latter part of November 1941 and the early part of December as to the capacity of the forces at Hawaii, assuming they used all they had to the best advantage to—

General MARSHALL. I think they had a sufficient amount of matériel at their disposal there to successfully resist [2859] an enemy effort in the form of either a raid or a more serious attack.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, these reports of Admiral Bloch and the Martin-Bellinger reports and all these other documents we have in evidence dealt very heavily with the question of reconnaissance. The general tenor of them was the conclusion that if you wanted a complete, sure defence against a carrier-borne air attack you should have a reconnaissance the evening before and catch the carriers at dusk before they started their night run, and the alternative, if that was not done, was to try to get the planes out and break up the attack after the carrier planes left the carriers the next morning, which was not so certain.

Now, the studies that were presented there that we have been offering and considering this morning indicate that a pretty large number of patrol planes would be needed for the long reconnaissance and then a very large number of bombing planes would be needed to go out and smash the carriers after they were discovered and I notice that in the recommendation of General Martin made in his study of the air situation in Hawaii under date of August 20, 1941, exhibit 13, which we referred to this morning, he made this recommendation [reading from Exhibit No. 13]:

It is recommended that the War Department give [2860] immediate consideration to the allotment of 180 B-17D type airplanes or other four-engine bombers with equal or better performance and operating range and 36 long-range torpedo-carrying medium bombers to the Hawaiian Air Force for the performance of search and attack missions in an area bounded by a circle whose radius is 833 nautical miles and center is Oahu, as follows:

72 for daily search missions.

36 for attack missions (these airplanes will be in readiness daily, fully armed and loaded with bombs for a mission).

72 for maintenance and reserve from which 36 may be used to augment the attack force.

180 total B-17D's.

36 torpedo-carrying medium bombers of the B-26 or other suitable type.

Now, his report shows that he was considering a 360° reconnaissance, all around the circle and which was the extreme requirement for a perfect defense against any attack from any direction.

Now, there are other figures in his report as to reconnaissance over limited arcs.

Now, compared with what Martin recommended on August 20 for a complete security there against air attack we had [2861] a very slim equipment, did we not?

General MARSHALL. Well, I stated, if you recall, we had a serious shortage in four engine bombers. We only had 12.

[2862] Mr. MITCHELL. As an aid to Navy PBY air reconnaissance, that was practically nothing, wasn't it, or almost nothing?

General MARSHALL. Little more than that, sir. Not only a small supplement to the Navy reconnaissance, but it left no striking force.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it. After you located them, you had not any bombers to sink the carriers?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. It seems to be the fact, according to these figures, and your judgment is, isn't it, that as far as security by long-distance reconnaissance and bombing the carriers the night before the proposed air attack is concerned, the equipment was quite inadequate.

General MARSHALL. Was deficient.

Mr. MITCHELL. What would be the result of that—that they would have to confine their long-distance reconnaissance to the limited sector that you stated, or what could they do under those circumstances?

General MARSHALL. The provision of General Martin there is for complete and perfect reconnaissance. That is all right. That certainly is to be done, if you can provide the planes. I might, incidentally, say even at the top of our production, we were never able to give Hawaii, in 1943 and 1944, what the commander of Hawaii wanted, any more than [2863] we were able to give any commander all he wanted. That was an unavoidable situation always, in a war of the character we were involved in. However, there were ways to improve the situation by increased vigilance, by the operation of the attack planes, the interceptor planes, in every way we could in that fashion.

There was also this to be considered, which we always had in mind, and that is the great hazard the enemy undertook in sending his people so far from home. A surprise is either a triumph or a catastrophe. If it proved to be a catastrophe, the entire Japanese campaign was ruined, and advance into Malaysia, and advance into the East Indies would have been out of the question.

Singapore would not have been captured, the Burma Road would not be cut off, and the attack on New Guinea probably would not have occurred. So you have an enemy hazarding a great risk in this stroke. Therefore you measure somewhat your means of defense against the hazard he is accepting in doing it.

I agree with General Martin that if the planes were available that was a very appropriate assignment. It was on the side of conservatism which is certainly a good side to take in the defense of a fortress such as Hawaii, and the fleet more than the fortress against air attack. Does [2864] that explain my point of view?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. Your answer deals with two problems: One is the question whether you expected an attack and the other one, what position you were in to defeat it.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was intending to confine my first question to this proposition: Assuming the attack is made, to what extent, under the circumstances, and with the material they had available, would you conclude that they had adequate means for either breaking up the attack at sea, or on the carriers, or else destroying it, mitigating it the next morning.

General MARSHALL. I think they had at least the means to so have broken up that attack that it could do limited harm.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. What was your last answer?

General MARSHALL. I think they had sufficient means to sufficiently break up the attack so it could only have done limited harm.

Mr. MITCHELL. By that, you mean if everybody had been on the alert and the radar operating and reporting planes at distances of 130 to 150 miles, and every pilot was in the seat, the motor going, everybody on the alert, and the antiaircraft men with ammunition, with that amount of [2865] warning that you could get from that sort of reconnaissance, you could have mitigated the attack.

General MARSHALL. Roughly, sir. I would not say every pilot in his seat, but in a condition of alert.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your idea is with the forces available, they could have broken up the Jap planes in the air to an extent?

General MARSHALL. It would have greatly lessened the damage done.

Mr. MITCHELL. These reports which you had and considered laid a great deal of emphasis on the need for an aerial reconnaissance, did they not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I might add at this time the question was the availability of matériel. I think at that time we had about 148 B-17's of which an appreciable number were of the old model, without leak-proof tanks and with other deficiencies of equipment; we had 12 B-24's altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL. You do not mean in Hawaii, do you.

General MARSHALL. I mean altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL. The whole army?

General MARSHALL. The United States Army. We had four in Panama; we had 35 in the Philippines; we had 12 in Hawaii; we had a few on the West Coast, and we had 50 to 60 to [2866] develop the pilots for the production of planes then in prospect.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know here in Washington at that time, or keep track of the number of bombers that were in commission and those that were not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. That was a continual check with us, because we had so few, and everybody wanted them.

I might add there again in connection with this, that the greatest trouble was we had to have crews prepared to fly these planes as they came off the production line which, as I say, was then approaching the full quantity production. That demanded planes that had to be in the air almost constantly, and tremendous maintenance, while at this time we only had about 50 or 60 altogether to produce crews for the flow of planes then in prospect.

[2867] Mr. MITCHELL. The first days of our hearing we had figures introduced by Colonel Thielen and Admiral Inglis as to the types of planes, both Naval and Army planes, in Hawaii on December 7, and how many were in commission and how many were out. It is given by fields there in that data, but we attempted to total it, and while our compilation may not be absolutely correct, the way we calculated it, it means the Navy had available on the Hawaiian Islands on December 7 the following: Patrol planes, many of which were not in full condition for use—but I am giving you the total planes and some of them were out of commission—they had 54 PBV-1, 27 PBV-3, and 8 PBV-1, or a total of 89. And on that day there were in addition, I think, 7 fighter Naval planes left by carrier.

On the same day the Army had 50 bombers of various types. B-17's, they had a total of 12, and only 6 in commission. That is the four-engine bomber. Then the B-18, what is that?

General MARSHALL. That is a two-engine bomber of an earlier type.

Mr. MITCHELL. Fit for reconnaissance work?

General MARSHALL. They are good for reconnaissance, not because of great range, but they are a sturdy, reliable plane.

Mr. MITCHELL. There were a total of 33 there, of which 21 were in commission. The A-20, what type is that?

[2868] General MARSHALL. That is a fighter or interceptor plane.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the B-12?

General MARSHALL. That is a rather obsolete bomber type.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, they had in addition 152 fighters of various types, of which less than 100 were in full readiness for use, I mean fit to fly.

General MARSHALL. For operation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, for operation. So there was a great shortage of both fighters and bomber planes.

Now the Jap attack was made with six carriers, and I ought to remember but I think there were two or three hundred planes, which would greatly outnumber anything in the way of fighting planes that existed at Hawaii.

Is it your idea that with that very large power of the Japs in the air, with our limited fighter forces at Hawaii we could have mitigated the attack very considerably or only partially?

General MARSHALL. I think so. They could not stop it, but they could have greatly lessened the damage that was done. They could disorganize it, taken it off its targets.

Mr. MITCHELL. You say you had to weigh the situation there and the risk by considering not only the matériel that [2869] you had but the probability or possibility of the Japs risking an attack. Your idea, as you stated it, as I understand, was it would be a risky performance for the Japs and they might not have hazarded a considerable part of their carrier fleet for such an enterprise.

General MARSHALL. It was accepting a hazard to do that, for several reasons: One was the effect in bombing by a few planes on carriers. It does not take very many hits to do grievous harm. The other was the action of our shipping that was not damaged in the fight.

Mr. MITCHELL. It might turn out in a chase and sink the Jap task force?

General MARSHALL. We had some carriers in the Hawaiian district.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, with the Japs planning an attack down along the Asiatic Coast as their main venture, the smart officers over there would feel, would they not, that it would be a great stroke to protect their flanks and give them more time if they made a surprise attack that is temporary but at least it would cripple the United States Fleet at Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. That was the whole purpose of it. It was a subsidiary raid in order to protect the Japanese operations in the south against any action by our fleet.

Mr. MITCHELL. That would be an objective that any smart [2870] officer would think about as a thing to be attained, if he could, wasn't it? In other words, the Japs, in their plan of attack, stick that up as number one. Their proposal was to cripple the American fleet at Hawaii, if they could.

General MARSHALL. The distances in their advance south toward Singapore were very great. If there was an effective fleet on their flank their hazard would have been greater.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would your judgment as to the probability of the Jap attempt by air attack be affected by the knowledge that the Japs had an espionage system in Hawaii which made them completely familiar with our whole situation there, our forces, our movements, their habits and nonalertness, nonreconnaissance, and that they had, up to an hour of that attack, free use of commercial cables and other international means of communication to report that situation to their home country, would not that have encouraged them very considerably to take the risk that you spoke of?

General MARSHALL. It could have. My own reactions, as nearly as I recall them, which is extremely difficult to disassociate with the back sight, is that that specific operation was not visualized by me. I was more inclined to feel that the hazards were too great and that they would not risk it, which would mean that in their movement to the south they would have to proceed somewhat conservatively rather than [2871] dash in to great distances, as they actually did, once our fleet was crippled. I think that is, as nearly as I can give it, a fair estimate of my thinking at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL. In other words, you were 2,000 miles away and you might not visualize or be conscious of the local conditions, and you would expect your local commanders to be conscious of the local conditions?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not mean that. I mean regardless of the distance from here to Hawaii my thinking, as nearly as I can recreate it now, was that the hazard of coming in there, with the sizable naval force, was so great, in my opinion, that they would not risk it, but would rather proceed on a more conservative basis of actual operations to the southward, to the China Sea, toward Malaysia. As it was, they went without regard to any fears, and went out on the end of the plank through all of Malaysia, Indonesia, and the New Guinea district.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, if they knew exactly what the conditions were at Hawaii, the lack of reconnaissance and alertness and all that during the few days in December, their risk would not appear to them to be quite so great.

General MARSHALL. You have to take into consideration the length of time involved in that movement, and of course it could be recalled at any time by radio message, and the [2872] great change that had been effected if active offensive-defensive measures had been taken, as to what would happen to their air force, as to the loss of one or two carriers alone.

They knew we had other planes. Whether or not they knew they were en route there, whether or not they knew they were only passing through there, all those are factors to be considered.

As a matter of fact, as you know, the reinforcement planes from MacArthur, that finally took off after the delay due to adverse winds, arrived during the middle of the attack. All those were considerations that the Japanese general staff, the Japanese naval staff, would have to take into consideration themselves, and they could have made quite a difference in the result.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, all the time, I think the record shows or will show, they had complete data of the conditions right down to December 6.

General MARSHALL. No question about that at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. And they could have recalled their flight at the time if they got information that an alert really had been made?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were you aware of the fact that the merchant shipping had been diverted from the northern ship [2873] lanes and sent down to the Torres Strait area in October and that left a wide swath of the ocean without any traffic in it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I was aware of that situation, and the reasons for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know that during the end of November and the first week in December the Navy, particularly its direction-finding system in the Pacific, for a week prior to Pearl Harbor had lost complete track of all but one division of the Japanese carriers?

General MARSHALL. I have a faint recollection that I did not know all the time where all the Japanese ships were. I do not recall being aware of the fact that it was the carrier divisions that were the missing ones. It may be I knew it, but I do not recall.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have anything to do with the decision to shift the merchant fleet, merchant vessels into the Torres Strait area, or was that purely a naval matter?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall. It may have been discussed with me, and it probably was, but I have no recollection. I do recall the shift.

Mr. MITCHELL. The shift?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was it a safety measure, to prevent the [2874] loss of the merchant shipping?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. From Jap attack?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. Admiral Stark, of course, can give you more direct information on that, but that was the reason. It was a more secure voyage, in the light of the developing situation.

Mr. MITCHELL. You used the words "merchant shipping." I think technically it would be more correct to say the slow boats.

General MARSHALL. The slow boats?

Mr. MITCHELL. The slow boats.

General MARSHALL. It was those that made something around, probably, I will say, under 12 knots, maybe under 10 knots. The faster ships, like the Dollar Lines, went straight through to the north of Guam.

Mr. MITCHELL. During the last week or two in November and early in December did you have frequent conferences with the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Stark, and possibly the President about the situation?

General MARSHALL. I had practically daily conversations with Admiral Stark over the phone or personally, and the same with the Secretary of War personally, and very frequently with the Secretary of State, during which, I think on [2875] practically every occasion, the Secretary of the Navy was present, and usually Admiral Stark, when I was present.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did those discussions relate to? In other words, did they have anything to do with the imminence of war and prospects of an attack by the Japanese?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. They had to do with the measures to be taken diplomatically, on a high Government level, toward Japan. They had to do with the military situation, as Admiral Stark and I viewed it. They had very specifically to do with our hope that action, war action in the Pacific, could be delayed as long as possible.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will offer in evidence at this time as exhibit 58 a document labeled as follows:

1. List taken from President Roosevelt's appointment book specifying his engagements with the Secretaries of State, War and Navy, General Marshall and Admiral Stark, for period October 1 to December 7, 1941.

2. Telephone calls made from outside through White House switchboard on December 6, 1941, and December 7, 1941, as compiled from operators notes available.

I understand that means calls from outside through the White House switchboard with persons outside of the White [2876] House, not messages to people in the White House—

3. List of dinner guests at White House Saturday evening, December 6, 1941.

4. List showing the President's appointments Saturday, December 6, 1941.

5. List showing the President's appointments Sunday, December 7, 1941.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all exhibit 58?

Mr. MITCHELL. All that is exhibit 58.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be filed.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 58.")

Mr. MITCHELL. During these conversations you say they related quite often to the question of postponing Japanese attack, if possible, until you could get better prepared.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was the situation at Hawaii discussed specifically in any of those conversations or conferences?

General MARSHALL. I think so. We covered the whole Pacific: Alaska, Hawaii, the Philippines, Guam, Wake Island.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you tell us in your own way just what, if anything, you can remember about the conversations at those discussions?

General MARSHALL. From a purely military side Admiral [2877] Stark and I together endeavored to put forward the policy of the necessity of taking every measure that we could think of, politically or diplomatically, to carry along the situation in the Pacific without disruption, at least until we had an opportunity to prepare the forces there. The first consideration at that time in the matter of preparation was in relation to the Philippines, which up until April 1941 had literally nothing in terms of numbers and equipment. As early as February we had taken the women and children out.

I had gotten authority to double the number of Philippine Scouts from 6,000 to 12,000, and then I issued an order which stopped the return of men who only had 2 years, who had completed their 2-year tour, which I believe possibly was illegal; I do not recall now. In order to provide experienced people to assist General MacArthur, or to assist General Grunert at that time, in the development of additional scout organizations and also in the development of a Philippine Army, basic training, we also had to have the time to collect the shipping, to go through the lengthy procedure of withdrawing these ships from South American runs, against which there was very serious opposition from all sides virtually, and to obtain troops sufficiently trained at that time to be sent out there.

We were then in the process, beginning roughly the 1st [2878] of August, of receiving the first of real quantity production, and we were trying to rush that through to the Philippines primarily, until we gave them sufficient reinforcements to make it dangerous for the Japanese to make any movement either against the Philippines or, more particularly, to the south of the Philippines, leaving them free to be attacked on the flank.

We needed time for this. It was estimated that the principal reinforcements and matériel could be gotten out there by about the 5th of December. Of course, there were the delays in obtaining the ships, there were the delays in delivering the planes, and there were the delays produced by adverse head winds to that then difficult and considered dangerous flight by a B-17 in that period from the west coast to Hawaii.

On the naval side, Admiral Stark, of course, can speak for himself, but I recall very specifically he was struggling to get a delay until about the 1st of February, in order that the fleet could be outfitted. I believe the fleet training was the main consideration. That I cannot testify to with any authority. I refer to most of the items that pertain to the Army side of the affair.

Now in all these discussions we analyzed the situation as it changed from week to week, as delays developed which [2879] would not permit us to reach the stage of defensive security that we had hoped by the limiting date that had been suggested, some time in December, and a discussion of the measures that might be taken appropriately by the Government toward the Japanese which would at least maintain the status quo until we were in better shape.

Of course, in those matters I was not a factor, you might say, in the discussions, except where it had a military implication, although there was complete freedom for expression if I cared to inject myself into the diplomatic statement in the communications proposed.

But, of course, it was more appropriate for me to confine my observations to the phases of the discussion or the documents that had a direct military implication.

Does that give you a fair idea, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. That gives me a fair idea. You were kept informed, I suppose, of the diplomatic developments.

General MARSHALL. I think in the main I knew about all that was going on, because I not only sat in on a great many of the discussions personally, but in addition to that Mr. Stimson would always talk to me when he returned from any of his discussions with Mr. Hull.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember whether, in that latter period, the latter part of November and early December of 1941, [2880] in any of these discussions the question was raised about the security of the fleet at Pearl Harbor, or whether, because of lack of preparedness and the chances out there something ought to be done with the fleet, that it either put to sea or move back toward the coast? Was there any discussion of that kind?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall discussions of that kind once the fleet was in Hawaii. I have a very faint recollection, a very definite recollection, as a matter of fact, of a long series of discussions regarding the location of the fleet before it went out to Hawaii.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was in 1940?

General MARSHALL. Well, at the time it went out there. I must admit that I have forgotten a good many of the pros and cons that were being discussed at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Those discussions related to the suitability of Pearl Harbor as a training place for the ships. They did not have any question at that time, prior to December 1940, after the fleet had gone out there, as to the question of the security of the fleet in port. I am wondering whether in any of these conversations, as you approached December 7, you or Admiral Stark in your presence, or the Secretary of War or Navy raised any question about the dangers to the fleet in Pearl Harbor at that time, and the question whether, [2881] if air attacks were at all possible and you were not in perfect defense, you should do something about it?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that specifically, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember with whom you had your discussions in 1940 about the question of basing the fleet originally at Pearl Harbor in the spring of 1940?

General MARSHALL. I think they were with Admiral Stark, with the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and I believe the President, although I do not know whether the discussion was with him directly or whether I got the result of his statement and then we made the presentations, I do not recall.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember yourself what objections were made or advanced at that time toward putting the fleet at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. As I said a little previously, I am sorry to have to state to you that I do not recall the details well. I do not recall the argument between the Atlantic and the Pacific, which at that time was a great issue, as to how much of the fleet would be in the Atlantic, how much would be in the Pacific. We had a tremendous problem then of the sea lanes across the Atlantic, the deficiency of the British in guarding the convoys, and the hazardous position of the [2882] British Isles during that period.

Now I do not recall exactly, as I say, the pros and cons of that, but I know it was going on at that time and I was in the middle of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, now, we come up to this question of the modus vivendi. You and Admiral Stark had been working for more time. Were you aware that on November 20 the Japs had made a proposal to the United States that involved practically our termination of aid to China and our opening up of the freezing regulations and furnishing the Japs with oil?

General MARSHALL. I have no definite recollection, but I am quite certain there was.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have access to those diplomatic intercepts during that period, that is, the decoded Japanese messages to and from Tokyo and Washington?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. The majority of them went over my desk, those that were supposed to be critical.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember seeing any of those in which the Japs instructed their Ambassadors here to get an affirmative agreement first by the 25th of November and later at least by the 29th?

General MARSHALL. I remember that very well, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember those messages which said, if they did not get it signed, sealed, and delivered at that [2883] date something automatically would happen?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I remember that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, then, when the modus vivendi came up—what date was it, do you remember? Around the 25th or 26th?

General MARSHALL. I think it was earlier than that. About the 21st, was it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. The 21st?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. What part did you have in that discussion?

General MARSHALL. I was absent on that particular day on an inspection trip, as I recall, and I learned of the matter on my return from General Gerow. I believe there was a memorandum from him to me. He had attended the meeting with Admiral Stark and he had expressed a view in regard to the outcome.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

General MARSHALL. And he submitted the memorandum to me describing the conditions and giving me the data.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you agree with General Gerow's position?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Which he reported in that memo?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; particularly that portion where he states that he informed Admiral Stark verbally that [2884] he regretted the reference to Army Forces in the Navy comments on proposition A-1. He felt that no restrictions should be placed on the Army's preparations to make the Philippines secure.

The point was we had almost nothing there, we had everything to put there, and if we did not do anything we were helpless, and we continued helpless if the thing broke.

Mr. MITCHELL. You learned that that proposal had been dropped?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I learned that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you learn at that time of the fact that Mr. Churchill had wired him about it and that it was sent back for the Chinese, and did you know about Chiang Kai-shek's protest in which he said the Chinese Army would collapse if anything like that occurred?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of seeing Mr. Churchill's message, but I have a very clear recollection of Mr. Hull describing the Generalissimo's reaction. Whether or not I read his message I do not know, but I know I was clearly aware of his very energetic opposition to the proposal.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the light of what you just said and what you knew, were you reconciled to the Secretary's decision not to attempt the modus vivendi proposal?

[2885] General MARSHALL. I think I was, sir. I recall this, that we were very much disappointed that we could not get this through, because it looked like a very slender hope of delaying matters to give us more time, and as I also recall, and the records will show, we had movements on the ocean at that time that were very critical, Marines coming out of Shanghai, and hazard to some movement, a more serious one was a group, I think, of four vessels of fair speed that were moving to the north of Guam straight into the Philippines and a large convoy of slow vessels that was moving south toward Torres Strait.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now did you know, in advance of its submission to the Japanese, the contents of Mr. Hull's statement to them of November 26, 1941?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were you consulted about that?

General MARSHALL. I do not think I was, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. To go back shortly to something I omitted, I call your attention to a document called "Aide Memoire—Defense of Hawaii." It is a photostat. It seems to have some writing at the head of it. Do you know whose handwriting that is?

General MARSHALL. I do not think that is mine. The writing at the bottom is distinctly mine.

[2886] Mr. MITCHELL. That is a memorandum you gave to the President, is it, at or about the time that it is dated, 5-3-41?

General MARSHALL. I am told—this is purely hearsay—I am told that I was called to that conference at the White House to discuss—I have forgotten what the issue was, it did have a relation—I think it was the movement of the fleet—and I made a hurried call—this was sent me, and I made these notes on the face of it, and gave copies to the President. I made this note at the bottom of the page.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am told, and it will appear later, that this handwriting at the top is—

Mr. GESELL. General Watson's, the Military Aide to the White House.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will offer this in evidence as Exhibit 59.

The CHAIRMAN. Let it be identified and filed as Exhibit 59.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 59.")

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you mind reading it for us, General?

General MARSHALL (reading from Exhibit No. 59):

[2887]

AIDE MEMOIRE

Defense of Hawaii

The Island of Oahu, due to its fortification, its garrison, and its physical characteristics, is believed to be the strongest fortress in the world.

To reduce Oahu the enemy must transport overseas an expeditionary force capable of executing a forced landing against a garrison of approximately 35,000 men manning 127 fixed coast defense guns, 211 antiaircraft weapons, and more than 3,000 artillery pieces and automatic weapons available for beach defense.

Air Defense. With adequate air defense, enemy carriers, naval escorts and transports will begin to come under air attack at a distance of approximately 750 miles. This attack will increase in intensity until when within 200 miles of the objective, the enemy forces will be subject to attack by all types of bombardment closely supported by our most modern pursuit.

Hawaiian Air Defense. Including the movement of aviation now in progress Hawaii will be defended by 35 of our most modern flying fortresses, 35 medium range bombers, 13 light bombers, 150 pursuit of which 105 are of our most modern type. In addition Hawaii is capable of reinforcement by heavy bombers from the mainland by air. With this force [2888] available a major attack against Oahu is considered impracticable.

In point of sequence, sabotage is first to be expected and may, within a very limited time, cause great damage. On this account, and in order to assure strong control, it would be highly desirable to set up a military control of the islands prior to the likelihood of our involvement in the Far East.

Now, the footnote refers back to the paragraph, "Hawaiian Air Defense," which reads as follows:

Including the movement of aviation now in progress, Hawaii will be defended by 35 of our most modern flying fortresses * * *

Due to make a mass flight from mainland to Hawaii May 20. A number of this type of plane could be dispatched immediately if the situation grew critical.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, that number of the most modern flying fortresses that you visualized in May, did they arrive at Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. They did not, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. So this estimate was made then on the supposition—

General MARSHALL. As to the prospective delivery of planes.

[2889] Mr. MITCHELL. Which couldn't be made?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember how you happened to give that memorandum to President Roosevelt? What was the occasion of it?

General MARSHALL. That was what I was trying to recall. I have forgotten at the moment just exactly what the discussion was. I will try to stir up my memory. There was some definite thing that was under discussion. I have forgotten what it was. Rather, a definite consideration under discussion.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Watson has in his handwriting at the top:

Modern Planes have completely changed the situation as to defensibility.

Was that a subject of discussion on your part, that memorandum by him?

General MARSHALL. I had no discussion with General Watson at all that I can recall. I have a vague recollection that there was something about the capability of Hawaii to defend itself without the presence of the Fleet, but I will check up on that and try to refresh my memory.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice in the paragraph in the memorandum entitled "Air Defense," you assume here that "enemy [2890] carriers, naval escorts, and transports will come under air attack at a distance of approximately 750 miles." That visualized a sufficiently adequate patrol force at Hawaii, air reconnaissance to detect the enemy carriers at that distance?

General MARSHALL. It visualized the available reconnaissance force and also the available striking force,

Mr. MITCHELL. To hit them after they were discovered?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is pretty nearly the limit of the Martin-Bellinger requirement, isn't it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a reference in that memorandum to "sabotage is first to be expected and may, within a very limited time, cause great damage."

Was that your point of view in May 1941 that sabotage would be a greater peril than any other kind of an attack on Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. Not a greater peril, but it was, as expressed here, the first in sequence, because sabotage was always one of the difficult points—the disposing of troops to meet it without unduly exciting everybody, and the maintenance of them in that dispersed condition to control it. And, of course, military control of the islands would have exercised a very great restraint on all of the people, which [2891] would have lessened the hazard decidedly, just as was done when we got on a war basis.

Mr. MITCHELL. In this "Aide Memoire" you also assume a state of alertness and the best use of the equipment at Pearl Harbor, a state of alertness against air attack?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have, General, a memorandum for the President on the subject of ground forces, submitted to him by the Chief of Staff. It is undated. It does not seem to have so much to do with air attacks as the furnishing of additional ground forces for distant installations, and outposts. Have you a copy of it before you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; in skeleton form.

Mr. MITCHELL. The only thing it says about Hawaii is on page 3. In the first full paragraph, it says:

Hawaii. Authorized and present 41,000. Naval installation (Kaneohe Bay) being expanded requiring additional defenses. Presence of Fleet reduces threat of major attack. Reinforcements can be deferred as long as Fleet remains in Pacific. Reinforcements must be available in the United States to give Fleet freedom of action.

Did that paragraph refer wholly to the ground forces in Hawaii as distinguished from—when I say ground forces I mean forces to defend against landing attacks—or did it—

[2892] General MARSHALL. It is a résumé of the entire Ground Forces. The idea was to so build up that command in Hawaii that it required no naval assistance; that a secure base was maintained, with the task of defense resting in the hands of the Army.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the margin of the paragraph I read about Hawaii, are the words "O. K. Leave as is." It will later appear that that is in the President's handwriting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that made an exhibit?

Mr. MITCHELL. We will make it one now. Exhibit 60 is the memorandum to the President, subject "Ground Forces" just referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be filed as No. 60.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 60.")

Senator FERGUSON. Has the date of that been fixed yet? Could counsel place the date?

Mr. MITCHELL. I can't. It is a document we obtained from the White House files, but it is undated.

General MARSHALL. We have been unable to find any record of it in the War Department.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. This was a memorandum from General Marshall to the President?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right, on the subject of Ground [2893] Forces in all areas, a great many places.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Does the General have any idea what time it was submitted?

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you happen to have any idea yourself, General?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of it at all. It doesn't show here on this copy that I even signed it. Sometimes it was the case, and it may have been here, that the President would call me to appear very quickly to discuss a certain subject, on which I had no notes at all, and they would give me some papers that pertained to it and I would do the best I could with those papers.

There may have been something of that sort here. I don't know.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, we have here a transcript of proceedings before the Army Pearl Harbor Board, volume 35, as of Tuesday, September 26, 1944, and on page 4050 there is testimony given by Mr. Stimson about a statutory war council meeting in the Department.

Secretary Stimson said:

General Marshall read a long letter from General MacArthur in the Philippines, telling us of the progress of the reorganization of the Philippine Army and the construction of airports throughout the Islands.

[2894] Then again—I think Mr. Stimson was reading from his own diary here.

Well, I started too soon. I meant to start with November 25, 1941. He read:

'At 9:30 Knox and I met in Hull's office for our meeting of three. Hull showed us the proposal for a three-months' truce which he was going to lay before the Japanese today or tomorrow. It adequately safeguarded all of our interests, I thought, as we read it, but I don't think there is any chance of the Japanese accepting it because it was so drastic.'

Then we had a long talk over the general situation there which I remember.

Then he quotes from his diary:

We were an hour and a half with Hull, and then I went back to the Department, and I got hold of Marshall. At 12 o'clock I went to the White House where we were until nearly half past one.

He says:

That's an hour and a half.

Then the diary proceeds as follows:

At the meeting were Hull, Knox, Marshall, Stark, and myself. There the President brought up the relations with the Japanese. He brought up the event that were [2895] likely to be attacked perhaps as soon as—perhaps next Monday for the Japs are notorious for making an attack without warning, and the question was what we should do.

We conferred on the general problem.

The diary continues:

When I got back to the Department I found news from G-2 that a Japanese War had started. Five divisions had come down from Shantung and Shansi to Shanghai, and there they had embarked on ships, 30, 40, or 50 ships and have been sighted south of Formosa. I at once called up Hull and told him about it and sent copies to him and to the President, of the message.

Do you remember that conference?

General MARSHALL. I have no detailed recollection of the conversations back and forth, but I have a very distinct recollection of the situation that was developing at that particular moment in the China Sea.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you any recollection of this beyond the statement of President Roosevelt, have you any memory of that?

General MARSHALL. I don't remember, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was on the 25th.

Now, I call your attention to this message that was sent to General Short over your signature on November 27. Were you in the city on the 27th?

[2896] General MARSHALL. I was not, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Where were you?

General MARSHALL. I was in North Carolina.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was going on there?

General MARSHALL. General McNair was having a very large maneuver, I imagine about 300,000 troops, or thereabouts. It was a vital day, and I flew down on the afternoon of the 26th to see the operations on the 27th, and flew back late that evening, so that I appeared in the office on the early morning of the 28th.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before you left on the 26th, had this proposal to send a warning message out to the overseas outposts been discussed with you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. My recollection of it, which is rather confirmed by the memorandum of General Gerow under date of the 27th, I believe that we had a considerable discussion on the joint board on the morning of the 26th, at which it was decided that an alert should be drafted and dispatched immediately.

General Gerow had the task of drafting the alert. Whether or not he had a draft copy with him at the time or whether he was to prepare it after he returned to the War Plans Division I do not recall. I left in the afternoon following this meeting of the joint board in the [2897] morning. Present at the meeting was Admiral Stark, myself, the Deputy Chief of Staff of the Army, General Bryden, General Gerow, and I believe at that time the officers of the Air Corps, and their opposites were present from the Navy.

Mr. MITCHELL. The message was sent over your name then while you were away?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. When did you see the draft after you returned?

General MARSHALL. I saw it, the actual message, as it was sent, I think, the moment I reached my desk on the morning of the 28th.

Mr. MITCHELL. This memorandum referred to by General Gerow of November 27 is the one in which he states "The Secretary of War sent for me about 9:30 a. m. November 27, 1941." That is the one you refer to, is it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. When you saw the message of the 27th to General Short after you returned from maneuvers, what was your reaction as to its contents and sufficiency?

General MARSHALL. I concurred in the message and the manner in which it was drawn.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you see at the same time the [2898] identical message sent to the Commander on the West coast?

General MARSHALL. I saw the message—

Mr. MITCHELL. To all the commanders?

General MARSHALL. Pacific commanders.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you see General Short's response and the responses of the other commanders to the warning message that had been sent to them?

General MARSHALL. I assume I did. I find in looking at the copy I did not initial it. I assume I must have seen it.

[2899] Mr. MITCHELL. Have you seen this photostat?

General MARSHALL. Well, I saw the actual—

Mr. MITCHELL. The original of it?

General MARSHALL. The original of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. The photostat showing the report of General MacArthur of November 28 and the report of General Short on November 28.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is our exhibit 46.

You are not relying on your present recollection but on the existence of this document?

General MARSHALL. In what respect?

Mr. MITCHELL. To know whether you received it or not?

General MARSHALL. Well, I know I received this because there is my own reference of that to the Secretary of War and my initials on the copy, and the two were clipped together.

Mr. MITCHELL. You remember that they were both clipped together?

General MARSHALL. No; I don't remember the clipping together. When I checked back to find out about the thing I found them clipped together and noticed I had not initialed the under copy but I assumed that I saw it.

Mr. MITCHELL. How did you happen to route it to the Secretary of War?

[2900] General MARSHALL. Because I thought it was very important that he should see this particular message. It had been my custom always when there was anything up that was out of the ordinary that he might miss I always initialed it for him and had it taken directly to his room.

Mr. MITCHELL. The fact that he participated in your absence in the drafting of the message to which these were responses, did that have anything to do with your sending it to him?

General MARSHALL. It might have; I don't recall, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. What do you remember now about your appraisal of or reaction to General Short's message of the 28th?

General MARSHALL. I have not a clear-cut recollection at all because shortly after the attack—I presume about an hour and a half—I was in conversation with Colonel Bundy in regard to the measures we were then taking to reestablish ourselves on the west coast, to get the convoys straightened out, and see what other measures we had to take throughout the United States for security, and he mentioned this message, which he apparently had reexamined, and referred to the sabotage factor in it, and also referred to the implication he had gotten from the liaison with the Navy which is included in the message.

[2901] He did that while he was standing at my desk just before his departure from my room, when we concluded the other part of the conversation, which was the virtual redeployment of all our military sources to meet the situation as it developed.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was the date of that talk with Colonel Bundy?

General MARSHALL. I would say that was an hour and a half or an hour, thereabouts, after the news of the attack on Pearl Harbor.

Mr. MITCHELL. On December 7?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well then, at that time Colonel Bundy brought up with you the question of Short's report of November 28?

General MARSHALL. My recollection of it is that when we finished this business I had him in there for, he being the officer in immediate charge of all details relating to the Pacific, that was his subsection of the War Plans Division, or the section of the War Plans Division, he would be in charge, and so I was doing business with him direct as to what we were to do to reestablish the situation, and when we finished that, as I recall the incident he was leaving the room and stopped about halfway out of the room and made a reference to the message, which he evidently had looked back [2902] on it to see what was going on, and referred to this sabotage clause, and I have forgotten just what his reference to it was. I recall his reference to liaison with the Navy. He referred to that. They had gone ahead with the procedure.

[2903] Now, my difficulty in answering your question was it is very hard for me to associate myself with the statement about what came next because from that instant on I was completely involved in the most active period during the war, the next 6 weeks.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I was referring more especially to your appraisalment of or reactions to this message of Short's on November 28 when it was shown to you, or you saw it on the 28th?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you notice the brevity of it or the difference in contents—

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection regarding it at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. (Continuing)—by comparison with any of the other reports that you received?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection regarding it at all, other than the fact that I find the two messages together and that I signed the upper one.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the ordinary course of operations in the department of the General Staff where would the messages have gone for consideration?

General MARSHALL. It would have gone to the War Plans Division and by the Executive officer there would have [2904] been routed to the particular section that had that, which was Colonel Bundy's section.

Mr. MITCHELL. At no time between November 28 and the 7th of December did anybody ever come back to you and mention the Short report or question its sufficiency or anything of that kind?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of any comment.

Mr. MITCHELL. Had you any information that after the warning message was sent there was no air reconnaissance being conducted at Hawaii for any distance, any considerable distance?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I had no intimation of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, did you after November 27, when this warning was sent out, make any inquiry as to what measures were being taken at Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. None that I recall.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you make any inquiry, any further inquiry about what measures were being taken at these other posts where the warning message had been received, or one like it?

General MARSHALL. None that I recall. We were deeply engaged in the business of trying to get our matériel rerouted to General MacArthur as rapidly as we possibly could and we had, as you will see, in magic, picked up the fact of the [2905] report that he was unloading at night. I learned that from the Japanese. I did not learn that from MacArthur.

Mr. MITCHELL. To make my question clear, I was talking of the period between November 28 and December 7, as to what information, if any, you had about the stage of the alert or what steps were being taken in Hawaii for defense against—

General MARSHALL. I said as to Hawaii, I had no information and I thought you then asked me about the other places.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

General MARSHALL. And I said there, I think, that I had nothing regarding the alert but we had information regarding what was going on which we obtained through magic, as related to the Philippines. I have forgotten the date of the magic but it is in the record, as to unloading and rushing of supplies ashore being carried out at night so that the Japanese could not see exactly what was going on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I take it then that your recollection about Short's reply of November 28 in the very brief examination you made of it you are not in a position now to remember and to state what your reactions were to it?

General MARSHALL. I cannot state any reactions that I had to it. It came through the office.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was there any consideration given in the War Department that you had knowledge of after November 28 [2906] and before December 7 of sending any additional warnings to General Short or any other commander?

General MARSHALL. I had no recollection of such.

Mr. MITCHELL. What was the liaison committee?

General MARSHALL. The liaison committee was a group consisting of the Under Secretary of State, representatives of the War Department—usually two would go over—the same from the Navy Department, which met in the office of the Under Secretary of State and discussed matters pertaining to all three departments, largely attaché details, equipment for South American and Latin-American countries, sometimes Chinese matters, and it developed during the period after I become Chief of Staff and before the outbreak of the war for us into many larger considerations; but in the early stages it was engaged mostly in minor details regarding requests of Ambassadors and the desires of the State Department that affected the Army and Navy, particularly as to matériel and equipment to Latin-American countries. Eventually the larger matters were discussed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think you told us that you currently saw these decoded intercepts of the Jap diplomatic messages.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you also see these decoded intercepts of Jap messages relating to military installations and ship [2907] movements?

General MARSHALL. I would assume I would, yes, the same as the diplomatic.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the record shows, I think General Miles said that at a certain date about that time, in the summer or early fall of 1941, you ordered not only the G-2 evaluations of those messages but the raw material or original copies of dispatches should be shown to you.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember that at that time?

General MARSHALL. I have a recollection of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. He said it was commencing August 5, 1941.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. How did they come to you? Were copies delivered and kept in your files?

General MARSHALL. I beg pardon, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. Were copies delivered and kept in your files?

General MARSHALL. At first they came in somewhat of a loose-leaf arrangement and they were all returned and I stopped that and required that they be put in a locked pouch because I found in the various offices there was inevitable carelessness and also I felt inevitably the fact that we were doing this would leak out.

[2908] I had been told when I became Chief of Staff that my predecessor, General Craig, was very guarded in the matter, primarily because he thought it was illegal and that, therefore, if we were to continue we would have to be exceedingly careful. That factor, of course, more or less vanished from consideration and was replaced entirely by the urgent necessity, from our point of view, of guarding the secret.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that I understood that last statement of General Marshall. You mentioned the fact that your predecessor, General Craig, considered the practice, some practice, as being illegal?

General MARSHALL. The intercepting of these messages.

Mr. KEEFE. The intercepting of these foreign messages?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEEFE. As being illegal?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; contrary to the Espionage Act, I believe.

Mr. KEEFE. I wanted to be sure that I understood you.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you happen to know at that time of the provision in the Federal Communications Act which forbids the interception of communications?

General MARSHALL. What is that?

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know anything about it then?

[2909] General MARSHALL. I think that is the act I should have referred to. When I said the Espionage Act I should have said the Federal Communications Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. And that the Supreme Court held before December 1941 some time that that applied to Government Intelligence or police authorities as well as to private persons?

General MARSHALL. I think I knew that, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Were you aware of the fact that at Hawaii, for instance, there wasn't any legal way up to December 7, when the attack occurred, of obtaining copies of the Jap messages that the Japs sent from Hawaii to Tokyo or that Tokyo sent back to their spies in Hawaii that came over commercial cables?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I was aware of that, particularly because, as I recall, Mr. Stimson was very much concerned in his desire to obtain that information.

Mr. MITCHELL. But afterwards you were concerned with the question of security?

General MARSHALL. When you say "afterwards," I am not referring to December 7. I am referring to about a year back before that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Prior to that day.

General MARSHALL. Prior to that day.

[2910] Mr. MITCHELL. I mean after the remark had first been made to you about the matter.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the fear of war became apparent.

General MARSHALL. The minute the danger of war to America became apparent our intense concern was the secrecy of the source because its value was quite evident.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was there any regulation in the War Department that you established or knew about that forbade the people in the War Department, such as G-2 and War Plans Division, from sending of Hawaii not the text of any intercepted messages, nor a paraphrase of it, nor the fact that they had decoded it, but the substance of the information that they had derived by the intercept?

General MARSHALL. I am unaware of any regulation on that subject. As a matter of fact practically everything concerning magic was oral rather than written, in my recollection.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know that G-2 was not sending out the gist of those intercepted messages in all cases?

General MARSHALL. Was not sending out the gist?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not sending out the gist. General Miles testified that he never, of course, sent a copy of a message, [2911] of an intercepted Jap decoded message to Hawaii and he would not send a paraphrase of it and he did not want to let them know at Hawaii that he was cracking the code and he went further, I understand, and I think said that the information derived in that way could not in a covered-up way be passed on to Hawaii. Was that your understanding of the practice?

General MARSHALL. I do not know as I got that understanding but I know that the G-2 of the War Department, whoever he was, General Miles, General Strong, General McCabe or Colonel McCabe, General Lee and later General Bissell, always were emphatic in their safeguarding of the source and not advertising anything that was done, to hazard the source.

The extent to which they might transmit the information was one that I am not familiar with, just what they did, because there was a continual passage of data from the G-2 of the War Department in the performance of his mission to the G-2's of the various overseas divisions and as the security factor was always ever present in the mind of the Assistant Chief of Staff, G-2 of the Army, that thought that he would be reckless had never occurred to me. His fear was that I would be reckless.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember of ever seeing these intercepted Jap messages relating to dividing Pearl Harbor into area A, B, C, D, and E and locating the—— [2912] General MARSHALL. I do not recall the message. I know the one you are referring to.

Mr. MITCHELL. You have examined the book?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I saw it in the book.

Mr. MITCHELL. And you have no recollection of ever seeing it?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of that.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are you familiar with the decoded Jap message of November 19, translated November 28, which appears in the book of diplomatic intercepts at page 154, which set up an emergency system of communication between the Japs and their foreign representatives by the use of certain words and weather broadcasts?

General MARSHALL. I remember seeing this winds message at the time it came through. This is the winds message, I believe.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the message that established the code, the one on page 154. It is in Japanese there.

General MARSHALL. Oh, I see. I do not remember exactly that. I am familiar with that specific winds message which would utilize this code, I believe, would it not?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, there are two. There is this message which came in on the 19th of November and was translated on November 28th, it says here, in which the Japs said to [2913] their Washington diplomatic representatives:

Regarding the broadcast of a special message in an emergency.

General MARSHALL. I think I can say now specifically I did see it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember then that after that message was received that any attempt was made to alert monitoring stations to listen in to the Japanese weather broadcasts to see whether what we call an implementing message was later sent out?

General MARSHALL. I do not know whether I knew just what it was then but I know now what instructions were given by G-2, so whether I knew it then or not I am not prepared to say.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you ever see or know of any second message, an implementing message by which the Japs in the weather broadcast said the "East wind—rain" or "North wind—cloudy," indicating war with the United States?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of such a message or such data, rather.

Mr. MITCHELL. How?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of such data.

Mr. MITCHELL. The FCC, the Federal Communications Commission monitoring station which had been alerted to listen. [2914] for this implementing weather broadcast report shows that on December 7, after the Pearl Harbor attack, they did intercept an implementing message weather broadcast which contained not the expression "East wind—rain," which meant trouble with the United States, but "West wind—clear," which meant trouble with Great Britain. That was after the Japanese attack. Did you ever hear or know of that?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not know anything about that.

Mr. MITCHELL. What were your usual office hours during the first week in December 1941?

General MARSHALL. Well, at that period of short days and cold it was my custom to arrive at the War Department about 7:30 and to leave the Department somewhere between 4:30 and 5 and then ride in the evening from 7 to 9. On Sunday, which brings into question December 7, it was my habit to have breakfast about 8 and then ride after that and then go to the War Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then go to the War Department?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember this diplomatic message from Tokyo to their Ambassadors here, what we call for short the 14-part message and the 1 p. m. message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[2915] Mr. MITCHELL. Will you state in your own way just when you first knew about that, and under what circumstances?

General MARSHALL. I first was aware of this message when I reached the——

The CHAIRMAN. I suggest, General, it is now practically 4 o'clock.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, it is 4 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the General wishes to go on, the committee might wait until tomorrow.

General MARSHALL. What is your pleasure?

The CHAIRMAN. We have been adjourning at 4 o'clock. We will stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

(Whereupon, at 4 p. m. an adjournment was taken until 10 a. m., Friday, December 7, 1945.)

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The joint committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the caucus room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, Brewster, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, general counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[2917] The VICE CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. You may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, yesterday in connection with Exhibit 13, which is the Martin report on air defense, you mentioned that you had instituted an inquiry that resulted in that report and you were going to produce the memorandum. Have you the memorandum here with you this morning?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I have it here. Do you wish me to read it?

Mr. MITCHELL. If you will, please.

General MARSHALL. This is dated July 17, 1941 [reading]:

CORRECTED MEMORANDUM FOR THE COMMANDING GENERAL, U. S. AIR FORCES

The Chief of Staff desires that a study be made of the air situation in Hawaii to include:

"a. Provision for the increase of the permanent air garrison of Hawaii to bring the actual heavy bombardment strength (personnel and planes) of the Hawaiian Department up to one group.

"b. Any further increases to be limited to pursuit, light and medium bombardment and observation types, [2918] in order to reduce the concentration of air power in Hawaii by holding any additional heavy bombardment aviation required from Hawaiian defense in readiness on the mainland for rapid reinforcement of the Hawaiian garrison as required.

c. Outlying fields to be organized at operating strength by rotation of personnel and organizations from parent airdromes.

This study will be made in collaboration with the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, who is being furnished a copy of this directive.

(Signed) ORLANDO WARD
Colonel, General Staff,
Secretary, General Staff.

Mr. MITCHELL. This memorandum, General, speaks of one group of heavy bombers. What does a group mean in the Air Corps?

General MARSHALL. I think at that time a group consisted of about 3 squadrons of either 9 or 12 planes each. The organization changed quite frequently. I am sorry I cannot give you an accurate count on that but the Air Corps officers who will follow me can.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, I want to refer to some testimony you gave—[2919] The VICE CHAIRMAN. Does counsel intend to offer this as an exhibit?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, it was read into the transcript and I did not think I would waste another number on it.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to inquire about a matter you testified to yesterday in connection with the so-called "winds" implementing message.

In reading over the transcript I am not sure that it is as clear as it should be and I want to be sure it is clear. In the first place, I want to call your attention again to the message in Japanese code that we intercepted and translated appearing on page 154 of Exhibit 1, which is the intercepted diplomatic messages.

At the left hand bottom of the page it is dated November 19, 1941, translated November 28, 1941 and it reads this way:

Regarding the broadcast of a special message in an emergency.

In case of emergency (danger of cutting off our diplomatic relations), and the cutting off of international communications, the following warning will be added in the middle of the daily Japanese language short wave news broadcast.

[2920] (1) In case of Japan-U. S. relations in danger: HIGASHI NO KAZEAME", which translated, the record shows, means "East wind—rain."

(2) Japan-U. S. S. R. relations: KITANOKAZE KUMORI", which translated, according to the record, means "North wind—cloudy."

(3) Japan-British relations: NISHI NO KAZE HARE", which translated means "West wind—clear."

The dispatch continues:

This signal will be given in the middle and at the end as a weather forecast and each sentence will be repeated twice. When this is heard please destroy all code papers, etc. This is as yet to be a completely secret arrangement.

Forward as urgent intelligence.

Now, I spoke of that as the message which set up the code system. You understood that, did you? And on the next page, at the top of page 155, there is a second message from Tokyo to Washington intercepted on November 19, 1941, translated November 26, 1941, the Jap number on which is just the succeeding number to the previous message. That sets up a slightly different system of giving out this news. It says:

"When our diplomatic relations are becoming dangerous, we will add the following at the beginning and end [2921] of our general intelligence broadcasts:

"(1) If it is Japan-U. S. Relations, 'HIGASHI'"; that is the first word, you will notice, in the number 1 in the previous messages and I understand that means "East", just the word "East"; no "East wind-rain"; no "wind" about it.

"(2) Japan-Russia relations, 'KITA'." That is the first word or part of the first word in the second paragraph in the preceding message. That means "North."

"(3) Japan-British-relations, (including Thai, Malaya and N. E. I.): 'NISHI'." That is the first word in the third item in the previous message and means "West."

Now, those are what we call the initial messages which were received on the dates shown and in my questions I used the word "implementing" message which I intended to describe as any subsequent messages in which the Japs were using this code, in which the Japs using this code had sent out these warnings.

Now, I notice when I was inquiring on page 2912 of the transcript yesterday—my assistants have called my attention to the fact that one of my questions was not clear.

I called your attention to the first message this way:

"Are you familiar with the decoded Jap message of [2922] November 19th, translated November 28th, which appears in the book of diplomatic intercepts at page 154, which set up an emergency system of communication between the Japs and their foreign representatives by the use of certain words and weather broadcasts?"

"General MARSHALL. I remember seeing this winds message at the time it came through. This is the winds message, I believe."

Did you understand I was referring to the one at the bottom of page 154?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL (reading from transcript of testimony):

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the message that established the code, the one on page 154. It is in Japanese there.

"General MARSHALL. Oh, I see. I do not remember exactly that. I am familiar with the specific winds message which would utilize this code, would it not?"

"Mr. MITCHELL. Well, there are two. This is the message which came in on the 19th of November and was translated on November 28th, it says here, in which the Japs said to their Washington diplomatic representatives:

"Regarding the broadcast of a special message in an emergency."

And then without my having completed my question and [2923] shown what the other one was you said: "I think I can say now specifically I did see it."

Now, when I said "two" in that question I was referring to the one on the bottom of page 154 and the second one on the top of page 155.

General MARSHALL. Are you asking me now specifically did I see both of these messages?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, having that statement I would like to know if you remember knowing about these two messages of November 19th which set up these code systems? The first one had the "winds" word in it and the second one did not.

General MARSHALL. I have no distinct recollection of the break-down between the two messages.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see.

General MARSHALL. But I am quite certain I saw them both.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, I think maybe we have been clear on this on the next page, page 2914, but I will ask you again:

Prior to December 7, 1941, did you ever see or hear of any later message in which the Japs in using this winds code sent out word that there was "East wind—rain," which meant trouble with the United States?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of either seeing or hearing of such a message. [2924]

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, when we closed last evening I had just asked you a question. I will repeat it now:

"Do you remember this diplomatic message from Tokyo to their Ambassadors here, what we call for short the 14 part message and the 1 P. M. message?"

Your answer was, "Yes, sir."

"Will you state in your own way just when you first knew about that and under what circumstances?"

And you got as far as saying: "I first was aware of this message when I reached the"—and then we adjourned.

Will you give us now the answer?

General MARSHALL. When I reached the office on the morning of Sunday, December the 7th.

On that particular morning I presumably had my breakfast at about eight, and following the routine that I had carried out on previous Sundays, I went riding at some time thereafter.

I think in one of the previous statements I made in this investigation of Pearl Harbor incidents that I said I probably rode at 8:30. Discussions with the orderlies and also evidence that I had seen of other individuals leads me purely by induction and not by definite memory to think that I must have ridden later; just what time I do not know; but between [2925] 8 o'clock and the time I went to the War Department I ate my breakfast, I probably looked at the Sunday papers and I went for a ride.

Now, as to the probable duration of such a ride I can only say that there were very limited places to which one might ride unless you crossed from the Arlington side of the river up over Memorial Bridge and the park system on the Washington side, which I did not do but once, I think, in the previous 6 years. My rides took me almost invariably down to the site of the present Pentagon Building, which is the Government experimental farm.

On a few occasions I crossed the approaches to the Memorial Bridge, not the bridge itself, and rode along the Potomac about two-thirds of the way down to where the present National Airport is, but no farther. The average length of my rides was about, the time period of my rides is about 50 minutes because I rode at a pretty lively gait, at a trot and a canter and at a full run down on the experimental farm where the Pentagon now is and returned to the house, so I would say that the high probability is that the ride was an hour or less, generally or certainly not longer.

My recollection beyond that is that while I was taking a shower, either as I went into the shower or while I was actually taking a shower, word came to me that Colonel Bratton [2926] had something important and wished to come out to Fort Myer. I sent word that I was coming to the War Department, so I finished my shower, dressed and left for the War Department.

My average time of taking a shower and dressing would be about 10 minutes, possibly less. As to what time I arrived at the War Department is a matter of conjecture; I have no recollection.

[2927] On my arrival there Colonel Bratton handed me these intercepts which included the 14 sections of the Japanese message, and I started reading them through. You recall it is a rather lengthy document and of such a nature that there were portions of it that I read twice.

When I reached the end of the document the next sheet was the 1 o'clock message of December 7.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the message that directed the Ambassadors to deliver this thing at 1:00 p. m. Sunday to the American Government?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, that message. That, of course, was indicative to me, and all the others who came into the room, of some very definite action at 1:00 o'clock, because that 1:00 o'clock was Sunday and was in Washington and involved the Secretary of State, all of which were rather unusual put together.

I think that I immediately called Admiral Stark on the phone, and found he had seen the message, and I proposed a message to our various commanders in the Pacific region, the Philippines, Hawaii, the Caribbean, that is the Panama Canal, and the west coast, which included Alaska. Admiral Stark felt that we might confuse them, because we had given them an alert and now we were adding something more to it.

I hung up the phone, which was the White House phone, [2928] and in longhand wrote out the message. My recollection was that he called me back. I am told now that the White House telephone records show that I called him back. I had no recollection of reading the message to him. I thought, on the contrary, he called me just as I finished the message, saving the last sentence.

However, one way or the other, there was a call or conversation between Stark and myself, the effect of which was he wished me to add to the message specifically "Show this to your Naval officers," which I did in longhand.

I then directed Colonel Bratton to take it immediately to the message center and start it. There was a proposal then that we have it typed. The decision was there was no time for typing, and Colonel Bratton left with the message.

On his return I questioned him as to the length of time involved and I could not make out whether or not he was talking about the time of encoding as well as the time of dispatching and the time of receipt, so I sent him back accompanied by Colonel Bundy, the officer in charge of the immediate details of all Pacific affairs.

They came back and gave me the estimates of the time of deliveries in these various parts of the world. My recollection is that I sent at least Colonel Bundy back again, and I thought Colonel Bratton with him. I believe [2929] others state that there was no third trip. There were certainly two—my own recollection is there were three. However that may be, that was the procedure on the dispatching of the message.

Do you wish me to go ahead?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

General MARSHALL. The next information I had was the notification of the actual attack on Pearl Harbor. Of my own recollection I do not recall whether I was at the War Department or at the house. I am told on one side by the Secretary of the General Staff at that time, the Acting Secretary at that time, General Dean, that I had returned to the house. I am told, on the other hand by my orderly that I was at the War Department. I do not know where I was.

Anyway, shortly thereafter, if not immediately then, I was at the War Department, because it was a very quick drive, and on Sunday there was no traffic. It was a matter of about 7 minutes from my house to the Munitions building.

The information then came in in fuller detail, and telephone communication was established and I talked to General Short's Chief of Staff, Colonel Phillips. You could hear the explosions at the time. He was endeavoring to tell me what was actually happening.

[2930] My questioning, as I recall, was with relation to a report that had come from somewhere—and there were many reports of course at that time, rumors and authentic, confusion—that a Japanese landing was being attempted, as I recall, below Barber Point, and my recollection is my inquiry of Colonel Phillips was to the facts in regard to that.

I talked to Colonel Phillips because, as I recall, at that time General Short had gone to his command post and therefore was not able to talk to me directly.

The procedure on the dispatch of the messages did not come to my attention in detail until I was before the Roberts Board. The fact that the one message had been sent by the Western Union to San Francisco on a direct line, relayed by the RCA and presumably teletyped, which was not done in Hawaii, I did not know about that.

Admiral Stark tells me, and I am quite certain he is right—I do not recall it but he is undoubtedly right—that he asked me at the time of our second conversation that morning, or he said that they had rapid means of communication and if I wished to use it, and I told him no. That must be a fact—I do not recall—that must be a fact.

That, I think, covers the main details.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now do you remember your movements on the evening of December 6, as to where you were?

[2931] General MARSHALL. I can only account for them by sort of circumstantial evidence. The only definite thing I have is that I had no dinner engagement. I found our engagement book, or Mrs. Marshall's engagement book, and between the 1st of November and 7th of December I had one dinner engagement, that was the 2d of December.

Also they checked on the post movie. It was about our only recourse for relaxation, and I had never seen the picture. So I was not there.

We were not calling. We were leading a rather monastic life. There was also in that record the affairs of the day for her, which involved, I think, an old-clothes sale, I think, all day long, to raise money for one of these industries they had down there, so the probability is she was tired and we were home.

[2932] Mr. MITCHELL. You are sure you were not at the White House that evening?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a statement in the Army Board report that the warning message that you got out on the morning of the 7th you telephoned to the Philippines. Is that your recollection?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I talked to Colonel Phillips, as I explained here, after the attack was going on, because we could hear the explosions at the time.

Mr. MITCHELL. You did not telephone any such message yourself?

General MARSHALL. I did not telephone anywhere.

Mr. MITCHELL. After you drafted this warning message to the outposts that you were prepared to send as the result of having seen this 1 p. m. message, is it your recollection that you called Admiral Stark first before he called you? Originally, I mean.

General MARSHALL. I am quite certain of that. I called him first.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did you say to him?

General MARSHALL. As nearly as I can recall, I asked him if he had seen the message. He stated that he had, and I proposed that we send a message apropos of this to the [2933] various commanders concerned, and he replied as I have outlined, he feared that that would tend to confuse them, that we had given them an alert and now we were putting something else into the picture.

I then went ahead and wrote the message, and I don't think I said to him in concluding that first conversation whether or not I was going to do it, but I did write it out immediately in longhand.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then your recollection is he called you?

General MARSHALL. My recollection is he called me, but the records of the White House telephone exchange show I called him.

Mr. MITCHELL. And what was the subject of the second conversation?

General MARSHALL. I had thought that he called me to say he wanted this shown to the naval officer. It would seem from the record at the White House that I called him and maybe read the message. In any event he did ask me, and I am specific about that, he did ask me to put into the message that it be shown to the naval officer.

Mr. MITCHELL. Have you exhibit 58 before you?

General MARSHALL. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will have to show it to you, General.

This is a record of telephone calls on December 7 by [2934] outside parties through using the White House exchange.

It says, and I will show it to you—the record says “11:40 A” which means “A. M.,” I suppose.

General Marshall cld Ad'm Stark—O. K.

11:30 A—Gen. Marshall cld Ad'm Stark—O. K.

In that particular instance, according to the White House records, these hours are reversed. The 11:40 A is ahead of 11:30, which does not seem to be the practice, and we are not sure just what it means.

Will you look at it and see if it means anything to you? That is exactly what the record shows there, that the time 11:40 precedes the entry of the 11:30 message.

General MARSHALL. I would not know what the significance of that is.

Mr. MITCHELL. You would not know anything about it?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. It does this, though. It gives the time one way or another of the completion of the message following the reading of the 14-point thing and the preparation of this other message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then at least you did read the message and were in the act of preparing a warning by 11:30 or 11:40?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; 11:40 would be quite evidently the completion of it, because I had it all written [2935] except the last sentence.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will offer now, as Exhibit 61, a photostat which reads as follows: “December 7, 1941.” It is typed.

1112 CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ADJUTANT GENERAL (Through Secretary, General Staff)

Subject: Far East Situation

The Secretary of War directs that the following first priority secret radiogram be sent to the Commanding General, U. S. Army Forces in the Far East; Commanding General, Caribbean Defense Command; Commanding General, Hawaiian Department; Commanding General, Fourth Army;

And the message is this:

Japanese are presenting at one p. m. Eastern Standard time today what amounts to an ultimatum also they are under orders to destroy their Code machine immediately stop Just what significance the hour set may have we do not know but be on alert accordingly stop Inform naval authorities of this communication.

MARSHALL.

It has the signature of General Gerow on it. Has the committee a copy?

[2936] The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the committee will note that underneath it is a record:

"Radios as follows dispatched 11:52 AM, 12-7-41 by Code Room, WDMC."

General MARSHALL. War Department Message Center.

Mr. MITCHELL. And another was dispatched 12:05 to Manila; another one to Hawaii at 12:17; the one to the Caribbean Command is blurred. It looks like 12:00 o'clock, and the one to the Fourth Army at San Francisco at 12:11.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is Exhibit 61?

Mr. MITCHELL. Exhibit 61.

[2937] Mr. MITCHELL. Did you give any instructions to the Communications Center as to the means of transmitting this message to Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. Their business was to dispatch it in the most efficient and rapid manner possible. This photostat of this document of General Gerow's should be read in the light that it was written after the event. The message was sent from a longhand pencil copy on an ordinary ruled sheet of paper—which, incidentally, was before the Roberts board.

Mr. MITCHELL. The original message was in your hand-writing and you gave directions that it should not be typed?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. It was carried by hand by Colonel Bratton and checked on the second trip by Colonel Bratton and Colonel Bundy, and then I thought there also should be a third trip by Colonel Bundy, but there was a difference of opinion on that.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the message center it was necessary to take your handwritten draft and encode it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; encode it first.

Mr. MITCHELL. And then put it on the way?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was there any report made to you at that time that there was any difficulty in reaching Hawaii on [2938] the telephone?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I mean before the attack?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. I did not ask the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. You didn't ask the question as to means of transportation?

General MARSHALL. I didn't ask the question about the telephone.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did they estimate to you would be the required time for delivery to Fort Shafter of the Hawaiian message?

General MARSHALL. I don't recollect, sir. I have a faint recollection of being told that it would take 8 minutes to get it through, but I think you will have positive testimony on that.

Mr. MITCHELL. You sent the message to all the commands without any special selection of Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. Exactly. I sent each commander involved in the Pacific situation. The Western Defense Command, which is the Fourth Army, the Caribbean Command, the Philippine Command, and the Hawaiian Command.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you make any inquiry of the communications people or your subordinates as to the prospective time of delivery of that message to Hawaii?

[2939] General MARSHALL. That was the reason I sent Colonel Bratton back with Colonel Bundy, to give me a clear picture of what the time involved was, because when I first questioned Colonel Bundy I couldn't tell whether he was including the time necessary to encipher the message, and so I sent him back to determine that for me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, what report did he make to you, do you remember, about that?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall the minutes. I think it is shown in one of the documents. I couldn't tell you offhand. I think they are prepared to give you that, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did anybody in your office, when you were reading the 14-part message and the 1 p. m. supplement, on the morning of the 7th, make any mention of the fact that 1 p. m. in Washington would be about 7:30 a. m. in Honolulu?

General MARSHALL. There was no mention of the 1 p. m. message until I came across it at the end of the pile. I am quite clear about that, because I was very much taken back by the time I had spent on the preceding lengthy message in trying to understand its significance, and then arriving at this, to me, very critical one of 1 p. m.

Mr. MITCHELL. You thought you ought to have been shown the 1 p. m. part first?

General MARSHALL. I don't know about that. I am just [2940] talking about my own reaction.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, was any discussion had when you saw the 1 p. m. message? Any discussion about the corresponding time of day in Honolulu or the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall that. I don't recall that at all. The whole thing was, it was a significant message, and what would we tell these commanders, and I went ahead and wrote it out myself.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you talk to the President on the morning of the 7th before the attack?

General MARSHALL. Not to my recollection. I think I had an appointment, I think the records show it, and that is my only source for speaking now, that I had had a previous appointment for 3 o'clock that afternoon. I had no recollection of that until I was shown the record. I know I went to the White House that afternoon.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have your staff organized at that time so that if an especially significant or important intercept was made of a Jap message, was there anyone on duty who had authority, if they were unable to reach you, to send a warning message out?

General MARSHALL. No, sir, I don't think there was a set-up for that special purpose. We had always had an arrangement there whereby the officer on the receiving end, at the [2941] central point in the War Department, knew where the principal people were, where to reach them. In my own case, for example, during that period and for about a year thereafter, I always maintained an orderly at the house at the telephone. If I left the house to go to a moving picture, which was about the only place I went, he was there and knew where to reach me. These various sections of the War Department Staff, notably the G-2 section, were all working pretty much overtime. General Gerow's section, I know, was working at that rate practically all the time. Too much so, as a matter of fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. If they had not been able to reach you on the morning of the 7th, or at any time when an important message came in, was there anybody but yourself that had authority to send a warning message to the outlying post?

General MARSHALL. Yes. The authority was vested, for instance, in the Deputy Chief of Staff. Or even the head of War Plans Division. There is no dispute about that, I do not think, because the actions always had been on a very decentralized basis. We selected the men and we trusted them. That does not go down the line, of course.

I was asked on one of the investigations if Colonel Bratton would have had authority to send such a message. I would think that would be asking a great deal of him, to do that. I don't think that would apply in this case. He would [2942] certainly not be responsible for sending such a message.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was General Miles high enough up in the list to have authority to send out a warning message to G-2?

General MARSHALL. General Miles had responsibility for dispensing information. He could not issue a command message. This goes as a command message.

The same information, of course, might have been sent as just information of what was happening.

Mr. MITCHELL. The thing that made this a command message — General MARSHALL. Was the positive direction.

Mr. MITCHELL. A direction to be on the alert accordingly?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. He would only have authority to send the facts. As to any deductions he might make, he couldn't tell them what to do.

Mr. MITCHELL. But the War Plans Division would have operational authority to send a message that involved action?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was the Deputy Chief of Staff the only other one that had authority to send a message without reaching you?

General MARSHALL. I think that would be the accurate way of stating it, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have, of course, been speaking of the [2943] military officers. The Secretary of War, if he had information, for instance, he wouldn't have had to ask your permission. He would have directed an order.

Secretary Stimson, if this think had come to him, and he had felt a warning ought to be sent out, he would have had authority to send it out?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have any talk on the morning of the 7th with Secretary Stimson before the news of the attack came in?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall it. He was at the State Department I knew, but I can't recall that I saw him before lunch.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you know at the time that a meeting was being held at the State Department?

General MARSHALL. I think I did, but I am not certain. You see, my time, when I reached the Department, was completely taken up in reading this lengthy message and trying to digest it, and nobody could talk to me while I was reading it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you have any meeting with the President, or an appointment with him, on the 6th of December? The White House records say; 10 a. m., Justice William O. Douglas 11:15, Director Harold Smith. Those are under the head of President appointments. Nobody else for the 6th [2944] General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of any contact with him.

Mr. MITCHELL. When one of these Jap intercepts was translated there was a system of delivering copies of the translation to you, was there not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was that done at your office?

General MARSHALL. My office desk.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was it the practice to send copies of those intercepts out to your quarters, your home?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that we ever did that. That would have been strongly opposed by the G-2 people. I don't recall ever having received any at my home.

Mr. MITCHELL. You stated that the first time you saw this 14-part message and the 1 p. m. message was when you arrived at your office on the morning of December 7; is that correct?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Had you learned prior to that time of it, prior to the time you actually saw a copy, did you learn that any such dispatch had been received, had it been told or telephoned you?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you remember whether you had been told [2945] or telephoned or informed in any way on the evening of the 6th, late in the evening, that any arrangement had been made for a meeting between Secretary Stimson and Mr. Hull on the next morning?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I have no such recollection.

[2946] Mr. MITCHELL. General, I want to go back a little bit over the question of the estimates as to the possibilities of the success of a Japanese air attack on Pearl Harbor, and the estimates as to the possibility of whether an attack might be made by the Japs.

The record here shows that the question of a possible air attack on Pearl Harbor had been carefully considered. There is the Martin-Bellinger report, and the Martin report, and others.

Those reports show that an assured, complete defense that would practically guarantee the safety of the Fleet in Pearl Harbor could only be accomplished if you had a long-range reconnaissance which caught the enemy carriers at sea at a distance of 800 or a thousand miles the evening before, followed up by a bombing attack on them to destroy the carriers before the planes had left.

The conclusion in all those reports was that the probable selection by the enemy of the hour would be to reach a distance at a point some thousand miles or so, or 600 miles, the night before and then run in the dark, and discharge their planes early the next morning.

I think the reports make it clear that the quantity of patrol planes needed to make a daily reconnaissance out that distance in all directions was something more than [2947] double the number of patrol planes they actually had, and bombers available for a striking force were quite few.

Now, on the basis of those reports and the available matériel on December 7, isn't it fair to say, first, that the best that could be done with the available patrol forces was what you might call a sector long-distance reconnaissance each afternoon, choosing one sector one day and another sector another.

Isn't that the conclusion you draw?

General MARSHALL. That is, I would say, roughly the case. They had to, certainly, modify the procedure according to the means available, which, however, is a common situation with any commander.

Mr. MITCHELL. That necessarily involved some element of luck. If you selected one sector for a long-distance reconnaissance one day and another for another day, you took some chance of missing the Japs.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. You have to accept that.

Mr. MITCHELL. So, with the available matériel, there would necessarily be considerable risk of their not being able to run such a reconnaissance as would locate the Jap carriers; is that the way you judge these reports?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, that meant that there was no definite [2948] assurance that they could strike the carriers and destroy the attack before it got launched?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. The alternative to that, if they couldn't reach them, was to hit the Japs in the morning, put our fighters out with radar detection, or some other reconnaissance, spot the Jap attack coming in or just leaving the carrier, and try to destroy their planes and break up their attack; that is the alternative, is it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. It would be the alternative in one sense, but also your dispositions might be changed to meet that situation. Your degree of alert arrangements might be altered accordingly. The dispositions, Naval, as well as Army, might have been modified to meet that.

Of course, what the modifications would be, I don't know, but certainly you make various adjustments to meet a critical weakness in order to lessen the possibility of damage.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, all of my questions are based on the assumption that there was a complete alert, that everything was ready that could be ready. Of course, if you are not, that presents a different problem, but I am assuming in [2949] my questions that they are completely on the alert in the light of everything they had to face.

Now, the Japs had 6 carriers in this attacking force and their records show around 360 planes. The record isn't quite clear as to whether they sent all of them in, or whether they may have kept some as a screen. But the number of planes that we had available in service to resist their attack seems to be less than a third of the Japs'.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; assuming on the Japanese side that they knew where our carriers were which also had some planes, and which also necessitated their holding certain planes on their Japanese carrier force.

Mr. MITCHELL. I naturally assumed that because the daily ship reports which were intercepted kept reporting whether the carriers were in and out.

General MARSHALL. And, as I recall, the carriers were out.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Now, with the available matériel at Hawaii, there wasn't sufficient in the way of air forces, bombers, and so forth to insure that the Japanese air force could not get in to the fleet, was there? Wasn't there a risk that some of the planes would get through and that damage would be done?

General MARSHALL. There was always that hazard.

[2950] Mr. MITCHELL. It was a question then, under the conditions, of whether if they had been completely on the alert, the air forces we had would have been able to break up the Japanese attack in such a way as to minimize or mitigate the damage?

General MARSHALL. It was a question of the deployment, the status, alertness, the various arrangements made with the means available.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, then, would it seem that under the circumstances, if it had been definitely expected that an air attack would be made, would you have felt, considering what I have just said, knowing or believing that an attack was going to be made, that the risk ought to be taken of keeping the fleet in the port. Have you any estimate of that?

General MARSHALL. You are getting, Mr. Mitchell, into a very technical naval question, which I do not think I am competent to answer, because how you might otherwise have disposed those vessels is distinctly a naval problem involving considerations of which, as a land man, I do not have the information to speak, and therefore I am not prepared to answer that. I will merely say that we created what we thought was a fair defensive set-up for our islands which was quite unusual for our degree of unpreparedness at [2951] that time and that everybody there was aware, as indicated by the communications of the hazard of an air attack or a submarine attack.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, then I think it comes down probably to what you said yesterday, that considering what was to be done, the question of the hazards of an air attack and the lack of complete assurance that it could be wholly defeated, was tempered with a question of judgment as to whether or not an attack ought to be expected at all in sizing up the situation; the two things blend, do they not?

General MARSHALL. I don't know as I quite understand your question, but I would say this as to the problem of the attack not being expected at all, the question of whether or not there is an attack depends on what you do yourself, to a great extent, on which the enemy makes his estimate, and you always have to suppose that he will do the thing that is most embarrassing to you.

Perfection of defense is seldom ever achieved. Even in our most carefully laid-out operation, in which we took about 2½ years to prepare for the landing in Normandy, we were short of LST's, and there was a bitter battle over getting them from the Pacific and the Mediterranean.

I presume had that failed, there would have been an investigation as to why we went into Normandy until we had [2952] the full number of LST's necessary for the operation.

Mr. MITCHELL. You stated in your testimony before the Army Board, I think you used this phrase. I think "we" did not expect the attack at Pearl Harbor. When you said "we," were you speaking generally of the high officers in the War Department?

General MARSHALL. That was a rather careless expression. I will make that "I."

Mr. MITCHELL. And when you say the enemy would judge whether he would attack on whether he knew you were going to be ready, did you, in that conclusion take into account the fact that the Japs knew we weren't alert?

General MARSHALL. I didn't take that into consideration because I thought we were on the alert.

Mr. MITCHELL. Your estimate that you didn't expect it was based on the theory that what you had was ready and if ready, the Japs probably knew it was ready?

General MARSHALL. It is a little bit like, in my mind, the present discussion as to the postwar organization of our Army. If we are ready, the other man will not involve us.

Mr. KEEFE. I would like to have that last answer read. I didn't quite get the purport of it.

(The answer referred to was read by the reporter.)

[2953] Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, it appears here from the record that commencing with Admiral Stark's letter to Admiral Richardson of November 22, 1940, directing him when he got back to Hawaii to start in motion facilities for air defense against an air attack, from that time, the Bloch report, the Knox and Stimson letter, and all those plans, and the Martin-Bellinger report, and right up to the end of August, at least everybody that had anything to do with the subject, both in the War Department and the officers at Hawaii, seemed to be worried over the possibility of an air attack; people out there were reporting that they were vulnerable and were demanding new matériel and you were doing your level best to shoot matériel out there to help them prepare, and the thing was batted back and forth right up to that time, everybody seemed to be on his toes about an air attack, and the possibility of it.

Have you anything you could say that would help this committee by way of explanation that after all that stir, when it came to the last critical days, the people at Hawaii, certainly the people in the War Department had gotten into a frame of mind where at least some of them, I don't say all, where they feared, or dreaded—thought—the danger of an air attack had faded away? To a layman that is the [2953-A] thing that is interesting, and if there is anything you want to say on that, we would like to have it.

General MARSHALL. Possibly I can explain it in this way:

In the first place, taking the latter part of your question—your statement—the fear of an air attack, as far as the War Department was concerned, had not faded away. The point was this. A new commander for the Fleet had been appointed. A new commander for the Air Forces in Hawaii had been appointed. They had brought up various things they wished to have done in order to insure capability of carrying out their missions. We were then in a state of woeful inadequacy of all such material. Also, combined with that fact, what little we had, a material proportion had to be used or we couldn't develop an Army or air force. We couldn't prepare the crews for the new planes which were soon to appear.

Therefore, through the late winter, at least beginning in February, and running up into the summer, we did our utmost one way or another to provide the things that the Navy thought were needed and the Army commander in Hawaii thought were needed. We did our utmost to provide the material that was needed. We had gone to the point where we thought they were reasonably prepared in meeting the [2954] requirements they had stated.

The last one, of course, was this Martin-Bellinger report, which we never did come up to, up until the end of the war.

We then, as quantity production came in, turned for the first time to try to send something to General MacArthur. The indications, the positive indications, by observation, by reconnaissance, by magic, were definitely a Japanese evil intention south of the China Sea. We had that, as I say, by reconnaissance. We had it by many sources. By magic.

General MacArthur had little or nothing. If we could make the Philippines then reasonably defensible, particularly with heavy bombers in which the Air Corps at that time had great faith, in their action against hostile shipping, we felt that we could block that Japanese advance and block their entry into the war by their fear of what would happen if they couldn't take the Philippines, and we could maintain heavy bombers on that island. So from the latter part of August, having given Hawaii all we could afford to give them up to that time, and there having been elaborate arrangements made, modifications, readjustments one way or another, we turned and tried to do something for General MacArthur, and most of that went through the Hawaiian Islands, incidentally, by Navy or by air. So our struggle from that [2955] time on was to give the Philippines an adequate defensive set-up. Theretofore they had little or nothing.

[2956] I might put in the record here now the fact that on at least two occasions and possibly three the President, a long time back, in 1940, and Admiral Stark, in the presence of the President and to me personally, had expressed the hope that we could do something for the Philippines and in each case I had given them the reply that we could not; that it would be the seed corn.

We first had the defense of the continental United States. Hawaii was a vital factor in the defense of the United States; the Panama Canal was a vital factor, a great bottleneck in connection with the defense of the United States. To create the necessary forces we had to have experienced people, we had to have matériel, we had to create those forces not so much to arm them as to permit them to prepare themselves.

Therefore, anything we sent to the Philippines that could have had any possible effect on the situation out there would practically deny us the ability to create an Army, to create a defense out there that was in any degree effectual.

Now, as I have said, quantity production was making its first appearance really in about August 1941 and, as I have said, we turned from the meeting of the demands in Hawaii and not fulfilling the Martin-Bellinger request for 180 B-17's of which in all we possessed all over the world 148 [2957] at that particular time. We turned to our endeavor to set up a sufficient force in the Philippine Islands to guard the islands to be a threat to any Japanese movement through the China Sea and to possibly avert a war in the Pacific.

We had equipped, so far as we thought it possible to equip and instructed, so far as we thought it was necessary to instruct, the garrison in the Hawaiian Islands. We were now engaged in trying to do for General MacArthur that what he so urgently required.

I think that is a reasonable explanation of why from August on we were working in the Far East rather than a continuation of discussions of one kind and another and of matériel items to the Hawaiian garrison. Have I made that fairly plain, sir?

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears that some B-17's were flown from the Pacific coast to Hawaii leaving December 6 and that arrived at Pearl Harbor during the Jap attack. What do you know about that?

General MARSHALL. We had succeeded in getting 35 Flying Fortresses to the Philippines, incidentally, sending them via Wake Island and then Port Moresby or Rabaul or Port Darwin or Balikpapan in Borneo, north of the Philippines.

Those had been made available by reason of the additional funds that were appropriated by Congress to expedite production, which always costs a great deal more money. [2958]

The result of that was that the following deliveries, which we had assumed would immediately come after those 35 from the plants, were delayed several weeks, I think about 3 weeks. There was a gap, in other words, in the delivery of the B-17's.

Not only that, but after we got the crews into the delivered ships we then found that the adverse winds at an unexpected period between Hawaii and California prevented the flight.

I might add that the flight of the 35 was the first time that a B-17, in other words, a land-based plane, had attempted a crossing from 24 to 27 hundred miles. It became a common thing later on with wider cruising radius.

So these ships were held on the west coast, the B-17's. General Arnold can give you practical testimony regarding this. From my point of view and memory, I sent him out personally to the west coast to see if they were doing everything possible, first to get these planes completed with the extra tanks and the things that it required, and next to take off for the flight.

Naturally, the young men, the squadron leaders, could not be told all the various factors in the case except that we wanted them to leave as quickly as possible.

[2959] So General Arnold made the trip personally. My recollection is he called me up on the 'phone shortly after he had arrived out there and he said, "These damn fellows don't realize how serious this thing is," and I told him, "Well," I said, "you are there and they are your people. You start them out." And he drove the harder to make an early departure.

His criticism, of course, must be moderated to the point that they were doing their best and it was a very dangerous flight. The limitation on the quantity of gasoline you could carry was very decided and it gave them a small factor of safety, so it was not one to be stepped into lightly unless a great emergency was in existence. The question was how thoroughly the great emergency was realized by the senior officers directing the men.

Actually, under his urging and presumably under a moderation of the winds, the adverse winds, the flight of the first squadron took off and arrived in the middle of the Japanese attack.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did you say the first flight was the one that got there during the Jap attack?

General MARSHALL. My understanding is that they arrived in the air over Hawaii while the Japanese were bombing Pearl Harbor.

[2960] Mr. MITCHELL. The record shows that those planes were unarmed; that is, they were not provided with ammunition.

General MARSHALL. I think they did not have any ammunition. That was explained, I think, by the fact these pilots were trying to get every gallon of gas they could in the plane and they did not anticipate fighting this plane on that long hop from California to Hawaii.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you know anything about their actual equipment at the time they left the west coast with regard to arms or anything like that?

General MARSHALL. I do not know that. General Arnold can probably tell you that specifically. My recollection is that they had their arms but they were covered with cosmoline to protect them against the salt air and that they did not carry ammunition.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will ask you to consider the suggestion about unity of command in Hawaii. There has been a memorandum introduced here, General Gerow's, dated November 17, 1941, reporting to you about the efforts of the Army and Navy in joint conference to reach some agreement in respect to unified command at various posts, including Hawaii.

Will you tell us what you know about that? There was also offered in evidence with that a letter you wrote on the 20th. Is that attached to that file?

[2961] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. There is missing from this my endorsement on General Gerow's paper, though. My recollection is that I wrote a specific endorsement to General Gerow on his paper; on his proposal. If you haven't got it here I will obtain it for the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish you could get it from the War Department. Will you please tell us what you know about the situation dealt with in that report and your letter of the 20th?

General MARSHALL. We had been endeavoring for a long time to reach a more efficient command basis where the Army and the Navy were both in the same area. It presented, of course, certain very definite complications along the coast because you had the close-in defense, the coast defense guns, you had, we will say, the fighter planes which operated fairly close in and you had naval reconnaissance planes which go tremendous distances out to sea and may become involved with the fleet or naval task forces in a sense remote from the coastal defense itself, so it presented a complication in working out a system which would enable control without producing confusion.

Admiral Stark and I—I am certain for myself and I am quite certain from his point of view—were endeavoring all the time to find a basis of unity in control of these matters.

[2962] As has always been the case, you could do more at the top than you could down through the line because there a hundred complications would come up and differences of view, very decided.

I had considered a long time before this of a proposal to the Navy that they take unity of command in Alaska and the Aleutians because I thought that if there was an actual landing attempt up there by an enemy that the matter was predominantly naval. For various reasons it was not accepted. I do not know, I do not recall at the moment, I do not know that I knew at the time exactly why. I thought possibly—I may be utterly wrong—that they had felt that that would be taken as the basis for carrying the thing further on.

We thought it was very important that we have unity of command in the Panama Canal on the part of the Army, where its interests are so predominant, we felt, though the Canal was for the service of the Navy.

There was no question in my mind but what Hawaii was a predominant naval factor. The question was how you worked this out.

I have said this before; I will repeat it again. It is a very simple thing to have unity of command if you give it to the other man but that also applied in all of our dealings with the British and among ourselves and always will [2963] continue to be so.

So we made every effort to bring this to a head and as I think I stated in my letter to General Emmons when it was finally determined, I covered a good many of the reasons. I will read the particular paragraph. This is the letter of December 20 to General Emmons, then in Army command in Hawaii, an air officer who had been the commander of the GHQ air force and for that reason I had sent him out there.

Unity of command had just been ordered and it was to be a naval command in that region. The same occurred in Panama. It was to be an Army command in that region. (Reading:)

For your confidential information, this action was taken in the following circumstances: In the first place, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy were determined that there should be no question of future confusion as to responsibility. Further, the efforts I have been making for more than a year to secure unity of command in various critical regions had been unavailing. All sorts of Naval details, such as the operations of ships and submarines, the coordination of efforts to locate purely Naval objectives, and similar matters had been raised in objection to Army control wherever that was proposed. I must say at the same time [2964] that some of the Army staff brought up somewhat similar objections to Naval control. Both Stark and I were struggling to the same end, but until this crash of December 7th the difficulties seemed, at least under peacetime conditions, almost insurmountable. However, the two decisions I have just referred to—have been made and further ones are in process of being made, all of which I feel will add immeasurably to our security, whatever the local embarrassments. Also, I regard these as merely stepping stones to larger decisions involved in our relations with Allies.

That is Hawaii and Panama—

I am giving you this information in order that you may better appreciate the problem and, therefore, be better prepared to assist me by endeavoring to work with Nimitz in complete understanding.

Whatever difficulties arise that cannot be adjusted locally, should be brought to our attention here for consideration by Admiral Stark and myself. These days are too perilous for personal feelings in any way to affect efficiency.

[2965] Now I will add this further item in connection with that. After Pearl Harbor and preceding this letter I brought General Eisenhower in and he worked on the details, as I recall, and drew up what I might designate a bill of particulars or exceptions in Panama to meet various naval objections, things that we would guarantee on the Army side we would not do, we would not do this, we would not do that, with these reservations in favor of a naval situation. It was quite a long list. I know he worked most of the night on it, and I worked with him part of the time.

When we turned to the Hawaiian side we put in no Army proviso, and bringing them in that way the net result was, as I recall, there were no provisos on either side, and we accomplished unity on that basis.

It might be interesting to the committee, although it is not pertinent to this hearing, that we ran into exactly the same situation in determining unity of command in the western Pacific with Wavel. We had to write a great many provisos and restrictions in the document in order to get a general acceptance of the proposition. Later on those were almost forgotten. The minute we had unity the solutions became evident and resolved themselves right within the command. But the start was always the same, and in that case also General Eisenhower helped me with the details of [2966] provisos in order to get the acceptance by the other party to the proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has unity of command at Hawaii been maintained up to the present time?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I say the present time—I do not know what has happened in the last 10 days.

Mr. MITCHELL. Without asking you any questions about the unity of command, complete unity of command generally in the Army and Navy Departments, limiting it to the question of posts like Hawaii, or Panama, for instance, do you want to express any views as to the wisdom of maintaining such unity of command in peacetime as compared with war?

General MARSHALL. I think it is an imperative necessity.

Mr. MITCHELL. During this period, from what you learned about the operations of the intelligence branches of the Navy and Army, and what not, and the question of uncertainty or difficulty in exchanges and assurance of having all branches informed of all information, have you any views to express about unity of consolidation or centralization of the Military and Naval Intelligence?

General MARSHALL. I think it is very necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may have some more questions of the General but not until after lunch anyway, and if the committee want to inquire they can start in.

[2967] It is 10 minutes of 12.

The CHAIRMAN. It is 10 minutes to 12, and while some members of the committee might properly inquire of General Marshall in that 10 minutes, suppose we hold 10 minutes later this afternoon and make up for that lost time?

Therefore we will recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 11:50 o'clock a. m., the committee recessed until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

[2968]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Counsel may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding further with General Marshall there is one point on which I would like the instructions of the committee.

In September 1944 General Marshall wrote some letters to Mr. Dewey during the Presidential campaign. Without going into details I will say that I think that these letters are material to this inquiry and the incident ought to be gone into and the letters put in evidence but, unfortunately, in those letters there is a sentence or two, a few words, which disclose technical cryptoanalytical methods which we had adopted to break the Japanese code and the question arises whether those words should be deleted or whether the whole letter should go in.

I have here copies of the letters that are complete. I also have here copies of the letters in which those statements of our technical methods of cracking the Japanese codes are deleted.

The deletion, in my judgment, does not change the tenor of the letters or their continuity and for the purposes of [2969] this case I should think that the deletions have nothing to do with what you are interested in.

My own feeling is that in the interests of national security the deletions should be made but I do not think all the members of the committee have yet seen these letters.

I am bringing that question up now so that I can have the instructions of the committee as to whether we should offer in evidence the complete letters or those copies which have that cryptoanalytic information deleted. I can supply the committee with copies if anyone has not seen them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to make a statement in that connection which he thinks ought to be made on behalf of the committee and in justice to General Marshall and to the counsel for the committee.

In September 1944, during the Presidential campaign, it is the understanding of the Chair that General Marshall received information that the question of cracking the Japanese codes might become involved in the campaign; whereupon he wrote a letter or two letters to Governor Dewey who was a candidate for President.

In the letter or letters General Marshall referred to the cracking of certain codes which was then current. That is, they were in progress then in September 1944.

General Marshall felt that in view of the fact that this [2970] information was confidential and was not related necessarily to the Pearl Harbor situation but dealt with a situation that was current in 1944 and may be even current now in 1945, that there was a sentence and a phrase or two in that letter to Governor Dewey that might well be deleted so far as this record is concerned.

The committee met this morning in executive session to discuss that question and it transpired that there was a division within the ranks of the committee as to whether these parts that General Marshall felt that so far as he was personally concerned, due to relations existing between our Government and one of our allies, might well be omitted from the transcript.

I think the committee recognized the fact that unless they could unanimously agree to the deletion and even though they unanimously agreed to the deletion, that it would be difficult to maintain that situation in view of the avenues by which information is obtained, that notwithstanding General Marshall's feeling about it that so far as he was personally concerned that this information was given in confidence and notwithstanding the view of the counsel that it should be maintained in confidence, the committee was unable to agree that it should be and in effect decided that the letter should be made a part of the record and that it should be made a [2971] part of the record without deletion and that the committee accepts the responsibility of whatever consequences may ensue in regard to our relations with any other country among our allies for the publication of the full letter and its inclusion here in the record.

I think that it is fair to General Marshall and to counsel and to the committee to make that statement and, therefore, it is the viewpoint of the committee as a whole that the whole letter should be placed in the record at this time and made public.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson, the Senator from Michigan.

Senator FERGUSON. I think the record should also show that I was unable to bring my thought to the conclusion that I should attend the executive session where there was a witness who wanted to give statements or testimony to the committee as a committee in executive session. Therefore, I am not familiar with the contents of this letter.

I felt that because of the statements of the Chairman previously on the floor and my own stand that all meetings should be public meetings and that all evidence should be produced in the public and for that reason I am not familiar with the contents of this letter.

[2972] The CHAIRMAN. The Chair might also state—

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

The Chair will also state that the Senator from Illinois also took the same position and excused himself from the executive session.

The object of the executive session was to discuss the very question involved here because it was thought it could be more freely discussed in executive session than here in an open session, as to whether the entire letter should go into the record or as to whether there should be eliminated the sentence or two to which I have referred and to which General Marshall called our attention.

Now, the Senator from Illinois may amplify that statement in any way that he may see fit.

[2973] Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, the position taken by the Senator from Michigan is not the same position that the Senator from Illinois takes. The Senator from Michigan absented himself from the committee meeting and refused to participate in executive session and hear General Marshall's statement upon this question.

The Senator from Illinois also absented himself from the executive session. I know nothing about the contents of the letter. The Senator from Illinois was not willing for one member of the committee to absent himself from the meeting without himself going out with the General.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Congressman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURPHY. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion it was a question whether or not the rules of this committee, or the feelings of any individual on this committee should come before the security of the Nation.

Senator BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Maine.

Senator BREWSTER. I think in order to complete the record, it ought to appear that the members of the committee who remained excused General Marshall at the same time that we excused the Senator from Michigan, or the Senator from Illinois, so no information of any character was received [2974] from General Marshall aside from that given in the letter, with the underlining of the passages which he previously stated he thought perhaps might be left out.

The CHAIRMAN. That statement is correct. The committee excused General Marshall simultaneously with the excusing of the two Senators, who had excused themselves. The Chairman might suggest if we had excused anybody else we might not have had a quorum present.

The upshot of the whole thing is the entire letter will be read into the record and made public. I might say that the committee accepts responsibility for that procedure.

I might also say it was the viewpoint of the Chairman that notwithstanding any possible embarrassment that might accrue between our Government and an allied nation over the publication of confidential information contained in General Marshall's letter, that in the long run, it would be less embarrassing to publish the whole letter than to be required later to explain why we left any of it out, and for that reason the Chair felt, and now feels that the entire letter should be made part of the record, and made public.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Clark.

Mr. CLARK. I, of course, accept my part of the responsibility to which the Chairman has just referred, but I [2975] regret exceedingly that some sensible and perfectly simple plan could not have been adopted, as I think it could, to the satisfaction of everybody who is reasonable about it, rather than to put us up against exposing a matter here that is wholly irrelevant to Pearl Harbor, that may have consequences that we cannot foresee.

Under the circumstances, while I accept my part of the responsibility, I regret the circumstances that make it necessary.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I might add one more sentence.

While I feel it is the responsibility of this committee at the present time, the occasion with which we were confronted this morning, was occasioned by two people other than people who are in this room, and one of whom will be before this committee later, at which time I wish to question him about the circumstances that brought about this morning's meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. We will cross that bridge when we reach it.

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Michigan.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to make it clear that my only reason this morning, as I stated, was not that General Marshall was a witness—I have the highest respect for [2976] General Marshall—but it is the fact that I was unwilling to take any testimony in executive session, no matter what it was about, or who was the witness.

I sat on the sofa outside with General Marshall. We were very friendly, and we discussed a portion of Pearl Harbor, and things relating to it. It was not the question that General Marshall was the witness, it was merely that all meetings, in my opinion, should be open meetings, no matter what is to be discussed with the witness. They should be here and be sworn as witnesses. We should get our testimony from the witnesses in sworn statements, in an open hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, it is obvious that probably from time to time there will have to be executive sessions of the committee to determine with respect to testimony brought out in the open hearing.

The Chair might volunteer this suggestion. In view of this situation, it is his opinion that the result would have been the same in this particular instance if the entire committee had remained present and if General Marshall had been permitted to remain in it too, that the result would have been the same as we now face, and therefore the Chair is ready to suggest to the counsel that he proceed along the line of the committee's suggestion to inquire about [2977] this correspondence that he mentioned.

Mr. MITCHELL. The only thing I have left to say is there are two members of the committee now in the position of never having seen the letter or the proposed deletions, and their judgment has not been asked as to whether the deletions should be made or not.

The CHAIRMAN. I think, gentlemen, it is the consensus of opinion, and the Chair is going to take that responsibility—if the committee decides otherwise, we will abide by the decision, but in view of the discussion, it is the view of the Chair that the committee decided these letters should be made a part of the record without deletion.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, did you have some correspondence with the Honorable Thomas E. Dewey in September 1944?

General MARSHALL. I did, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand you wrote him two letters.

General MARSHALL. I did, sir, and I have the letters here.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you read the two letters, first the one of the 25th of September, and then the one of the 27th of September?

These are complete copies, are they?

[2978] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

On the 25th of September I addressed the following letter to Governor Dewey, who at that time was traveling in Oklahoma.

[2979] Senator LUCAS. Will you read the top two words, General Marshall?

General MARSHALL. "Top Secret. For Mr. Dewey's Eyes Only."

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may understand this letter at the beginning, and before General Marshall starts reading, he is referring to the fact that he addressed the letter to Governor Dewey on the 25th of September, and another on the 27th.

I would like to have the record show, Mr. Mitchell, at the start as to whether or not this letter was sent through the mail or by courier, or delivered in some other way?

Mr. MITCHELL. I will cover all that, Mr. Congressman, as to just how the letters were delivered and all the rest. I just want to get the letters in first.

Mr. KEEFE. All right, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will go right to that. Please read, General, the first letter of September 25th; every word on it.

General MARSHALL. The heading at the top of the paper is "Top Secret." To the left in capitals "FOR MR. DEWEY'S EYES ONLY." It is dated the 25 September 1944.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR:

I am writing you without the knowledge of any [2980] other person except Admiral King (who concurs) because we are approaching a grave dilemma in the political reactions of Congress regarding Pearl Harbor.

What I have to tell you below is of such a highly secret nature that I feel compelled to ask you whether to accept it on the basis of your not communicating its contents to any other person and returning this letter or not reading any further and returning the letter to the bearer.

I should have preferred to talk to you in person but I could not devise a method that would not be subject to press and radio reactions as to why the Chief of Staff of the Army would be seeking an interview with you at this particular moment. Therefore I have turned to the method of this letter, to be delivered by hand to you by Colonel Carter Clarke who has charge of the most secret documents of the War and Navy Departments.

In brief, the military dilemma resulting from Congressional political battles of the presidential campaign is this:

The most vital evidence in the Pearl Harbor matter consists of our intercepts of the Japanese diplomatic communications. Over a period of years our [2981] cryptograph people analyzed the character of the machine the Japanese were using for encoding their diplomatic messages. Based on this a corresponding machine was built by us which deciphers their messages. Therefore, we possessed a wealth of information regarding their moves in the Pacific, which in turn was furnished the State Department—rather than as is popularly supposed, the State Department providing us with the information—but which unfortunately made no reference whatever to intentions towards Hawaii until the last message before December 7th, which did not reach our hands until the following day, December 8th.

Now the point to the present dilemma is that we have gone ahead with this business of deciphering their codes until we possess other codes, German as well as Japanese, but our main basis of information regarding Hitler's intentions in Europe is obtained from Baron Oshima's messages from Berlin reporting his interviews with Hitler and other officials to the Japanese Government. These are still in the codes involved in the Pearl Harbor events.

To explain further the critical nature of this set-up which would be wiped out almost in an instant if the least suspicion were aroused regarding it, the [2982] battle of the Coral Sea was based on deciphered messages and therefore our few ships were in the right place at the right time. Further, we were able to concentrate our limited forces to meet their naval advance on Midway when otherwise we almost certainly would have been some 3,000 miles out of place. We had full information of the strength of their forces in that advance and also of the smaller force directed against the Aleutians which finally landed troops on Attu and Kiska.

Operations in the Pacific are largely guided by the information we obtain of Japanese deployments. We know their strength in various garrisons, the rations and other stores continuing available to them, and what is of vast importance, we check their fleet movements and the movements of their convoys. The heavy losses reported from time to time which they sustain by reason of our submarine action, largely result from the fact that we know the sailing dates and routes of their convoys and can notify our submarines to lie in wait at the proper points.

The current raids by Admiral Halsey's carrier forces on Japanese shipping in Manila Bay and elsewhere were largely based in timing on the known movements of Japanese convoys, two of which were caught, as anticipated, in his destructive attacks.

[2983] You will understand from the foregoing the utterly tragic consequences if the present political debates regarding Pearl Harbor disclose to the enemy, German or Jap, any suspicion of the vital sources of information we now possess.

The Roberts' Report on Pearl Harbor had to have withdrawn from it all reference to this highly secret matter, therefore in portions it necessarily appeared incomplete. The same reason which dictated that course is even more important today because our sources have been greatly elaborated.

As a further example of the delicacy of the situation, some of Donovan's people (the OSS) without telling us, instituted a secret search of the Japanese Embassy offices in Portugal. As a result the entire military attaché Japanese code all over the world was changed, and though this occurred over a year ago, we have not yet been able to break the new code and have thus lost this invaluable source of information, particularly regarding the European situation.

A recent speech in Congress by Representative Harness would clearly suggest to the Japanese that we have been reading their codes, though Mr. Harness and the American public would probably not draw any such [2984] conclusion.

The conduct of General Eisenhower's campaign and of all operations in the Pacific are closely related in conception and timing to the information we secretly obtain through these intercepted codes. They contribute greatly to the victory and tremendously to the saving in American lives, both in the conduct of current operations and in looking towards the early termination of the war.

I am presenting this matter to you, for your secret information, in the hope that you will see your way clear to avoid the tragic results with which we are now threatened in the present political campaign. I might add that the recent action of Congress in requiring Army and Navy investigations for action before certain dates has compelled me to bring back the Corps commander, General Gerow, whose troops are fighting at Trier, to testify here while the Germans are counter-attacking his forces there. This, however, is a very minor matter compared to the loss of our code information.

Please return this letter by bearer. I will hold it in my secret file subject to your reference should you so desire.

Faithfully yours,

(Sgd.) G. C. MARSHALL.

[2985] The second letter is dated the 27th of September, 1944, and is headed "Top Secret", and "FOR MR. DEWEY'S EYES ONLY".

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Colonel Clarke, my messenger to you of yesterday, September 26th, has reported the result of his delivery of my letter dated September 25th. As I understand him you (a) were unwilling to commit yourself to any agreement regarding "not communicating its contents to any other person" in view of the fact that you felt you already knew certain of the things probably referred to in the letter, as suggested to you by seeing the word "cryptograph" and (b) you could not feel that such a letter as this to a presidential candidate could have been addressed to you by an officer in my position without the knowledge of the President.

1130 CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

As to (a) above I am quite willing to have you read what comes hereafter with the understanding that you are bound not to communicate to any other person any portions on which you do not now have or later receive factual knowledge from some other source than myself. As to (b) above you have my word that neither the Secretary of War nor the President has any intimation whatsoever that such a letter has been addressed to you or that the preparation or sending of such a [2986] communication was being considered. I assure you that the only persons who saw or know of the existence of either this letter or my letter to you dated September 25th are Admiral King, seven key officers responsible for security of military communications, and my secretary who typed these letters. I am trying my best to make plain to you that this letter is being addressed to you solely on my initiative, Admiral King having been consulted only after the letter was drafted, and I am persisting in the matter because the military hazards involved are so serious that I feel some action is necessary to protect the interests of our armed forces.

I should have much preferred to talk to you in person but I could not devise a method that would not be subject to press and radio reactions as to why the Chief of Staff of the Army would be seeking an interview with you at this particular moment. Therefore I have turned to the method of this letter, with which Admiral King concurs, to be delivered by hand to you by Colonel Clarke, who, incidentally, has charge of the most secret documents of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. Chairman, the remainder of the letter is a repetition of what I read in the first letter. Do you want me to read it?

[2987] The CHAIRMAN. No. I suppose it will be published in full as it is without the necessity of reading it. It is exactly the same?

General MARSHALL. It is exactly the same.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will have it copied straight through in the transcript.

The CHAIRMAN. These two letters will be printed in full as they appear in the transcript at this point.

(The letters referred to follow.)

TOP SECRET

For Mr. Dewey's eyes only.

27 September 1944.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Colonel Clarke, my messenger to you of yesterday, September 26th, has reported the result of his delivery of my letter dated September 25th. As I understand him you (a) were unwilling to commit yourself to any agreement regarding "not communicating its contents to any other person" in view of the fact that you felt you already knew certain of the things probably referred to in the letter, as suggested to you by seeing the word "cryptograph," and (b) you could not feel that such a letter as this to a presidential candidate could have been addressed to you by an officer in my position without the knowledge of the President.

I am trying my best to make plain to you that this letter is being addressed to you solely on my initiative, Admiral King having been consulted only after the letter was drafted, and I am persisting in the matter because the military hazards involved are so serious that I feel some action is necessary to protect the interests of our armed forces.

I should have much preferred to talk to you in person but I could not devise a method that would not be subject to press and radio reactions as to why the Chief of Staff of the Army would be seeking an interview with you at this particular moment. Therefore I have turned to the method of this letter, with which Admiral King concurs, to be delivered by hand to you by Colonel Clarke, who, incidentally, has charge of the most secret documents of the War and Navy Departments.

In brief, the military dilemma is this:

The most vital evidence in the Pearl Harbor matter consists of our intercepts of the Japanese diplomatic communications. Over a period of years our cryptograph people analyzed the character of the machine the Japanese were using for encoding their diplomatic messages. Based on this a corresponding machine was built by us which deciphered their messages. Therefore, we possessed a wealth of information regarding their moves in the Pacific, which in turned was furnished the State Department—rather than as is popularly supposed, the State [2987E] Department providing us with the information—but which unfortunately made no reference whatever to intentions toward Hawaii until the last message before December 7th, which did not reach our hands until the following day, December 8th.

Now the point to the present dilemma is that we have gone ahead with this business of deciphering their codes until we possess other codes, German as well as Japanese, but our main basis of information regarding Hitler's intentions in Europe is obtained from Baron Oshima's messages from Berlin reporting his interviews with Hitler and other officials to the Japanese Government. You will understand from the foregoing the utterly tragic consequences if the present political debates regarding Pearl Harbor disclose to the enemy, German or Jap, any suspicion of the vital sources of information we possess.

The Roberts' report on Pearl Harbor had to have withdrawn from it all reference to this highly secret matter, therefore in portions it necessarily appeared incomplete. The same reason which dictated that course is even more important today because our sources have been greatly elaborated.

[2987F] As another example of the delicacy of the situation, some of Donovan's people (the OSS) without telling us, instituted a secret search of the Japanese Embassy offices in Portugal. As a result the entire military attache Japanese code all over the world was changed, and though this occurred over a year ago, we have not yet been able to break the new code and have thus lost this invaluable source of information, particularly regarding the European situation.

A further most serious embarrassment is the fact that the British government is involved concerning its most secret sources of information, regarding which only the Prime Minister, the Chiefs of Staff and a very limited number of other officials have knowledge.

A recent speech in Congress by Representative Harness would clearly suggest to the Japanese that we have been reading their codes, though Mr. Harness and the American public would probably not draw any such conclusion.

I am presenting this matter to you in the hope that you will see your way clear to avoid the tragic results with which we are now threatened in the present political campaign.

Please return this letter by bearer. I will hold it in my most secret file subject to your reference should you so desire.

Faithfully yours,

(Sgd) G. C. MARSHALL.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Marshall, what means did you take in presenting your first letter of September 25 to Governor Dewey?

General MARSHALL. It was sent by the hand of Colonel Clarke who flew out to some point in Oklahoma and he boarded Governor Dewey's train at some point in Oklahoma and saw Governor Dewey personally.

Mr. MITCHELL. When Colonel Clarke came back did he bring back with him your letter of September 25?

General MARSHALL. He brought back the letter with the statement that Governor Dewey felt he could not accept the proviso of the first paragraph, which I will read again in order to make it clear:

What I have to tell you below is of such a highly secret nature that I feel compelled to ask you either to accept it on the basis of your not communicating its contents to any other person and returning this letter or not reading any further and returning the letter to the bearer.

[2989] Mr. MITCHELL. Did Colonel Clarke report that Mr. Dewey had stopped there and read no other part of the letter?

General MARSHALL. He read no further, according to Colonel Clarke.

Senator BREWSTER. I wonder if you are clear that the letter of the 27th, the remainder, is the same. It seems to me there is a paragraph missing between the reference to Mr. Donovan, and the reference to Mr. Harness on the third page. That paragraph is left out.

Mr. MURPHY. It is shifted over on the other page. It is in a different place in the second letter.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that General Marshall read the rest of the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any question about it, suppose you begin where you left off in the second letter, and read the rest of it.

Mr. KEEFE. It is all in there, only it is on the third page.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is in there, but it is in a different place in the second letter.

General MARSHALL. I will continue reading.

Senator BREWSTER. I think it is important in connection with any copies that have been given out that we be clear [2990] for the information of everybody as to whether or not the paragraph which appears in the second letter appears in the first. I don't see where it is in the first.

Mr. MITCHELL. What paragraph do you refer to, Senator?

Senator BREWSTER. With reference to the British—"a further most serious embarrassment."

Senator LUCAS. The second paragraph on page 3 of the September 27 letter.

Mr. MITCHELL. Go ahead, General, and read the letter of the 27th completely so there won't be any mistake about it.

General MARSHALL. Shall I go back to the beginning?

Mr. MITCHELL. How far did you read?

General MARSHALL. I read to the words "in brief, the military dilemma is this."

Mr. MITCHELL. Continue then with the letter of the 27th commencing with the words "in brief, the military dilemma is this."

General MARSHALL (reading):

The most vital evidence in the Pearl Harbor matter consists of our intercepts of the Japanese diplomatic communications. Over a period of years our cryptograph people analyzed the character of the machine the Japanese [2991] were using for encoding their diplomatic messages. Based on this a corresponding machine was built by us which deciphers their messages. Therefore, we possessed a wealth of information regarding their moves in the Pacific, which in turn was furnished the State Department—rather than as is popularly supposed, the State Department providing us with the information—but which unfortunately made no reference whatever to intentions toward Hawaii until the last message before December 7th, which did not reach our hands until the following day, December 8th.

Now the point to the present dilemma is that we have gone ahead with this business of deciphering their codes until we possess other codes, German as well as Japanese, but our main basis of information regarding Hitler's intentions in Europe is obtained from Baron Oshima's messages from Berlin reporting his interviews with Hitler and other officials to the Japanese Government. These are still in the codes involved in the Pearl Harbor events.

To explain further the critical nature of this set-up which would be wiped out almost in an instant if the least suspicion were aroused regarding it, the battle of the Coral Sea was based on deciphered messages and therefore our few ships were in the right place at the right time. Further, we were able to concentrate our limited forces to meet their [2992] naval advance on Midway when otherwise we almost certainly would have been some 3,000 miles out of place. We had full information of the strength of their forces in that advance and also of the smaller force directed against the Aleutians which finally landed troops on Attu and Kiska.

Operations in the Pacific are largely guided by the information we obtain of Japanese deployments. We know their strength in various garrisons, the rations and other stores continuing available to them, and what is of vast importance, we check their fleet movements and the movements of their convoys. The heavy losses reported from time to time which they sustain by reason of our submarine action, largely result from the fact that we know the sailing dates and routes of their convoys and can notify our submarines to lie in wait at the proper points.

The current raids by Admiral Halsey's carrier forces on Japanese shipping in Manila Bay and elsewhere were largely based in timing on the known movements of Japanese convoys, two of which were caught, as anticipated, in his destructive attacks.

You will understand from the foregoing the utterly tragic consequences if the present political debates regarding Pearl Harbor disclose to the enemy, German or Jap, any suspicion of the vital sources of information we possess.

[2993] The Roberts' report on Pearl Harbor had to have withdrawn from it all reference to this highly secret matter, therefore in portions it necessarily appeared incomplete. The same reason which dictated that course is even more important today because our sources have been greatly elaborated.

As another example of the delicacy of the situation, some of Donovan's people (the OSS) without telling us, instituted a secret search of the Japanese Embassy offices in Portugal. As a result the entire military attaché Japanese code all over the world was changed, and though this occurred over a year ago, we have not yet been able to break the new code and have thus lost this invaluable source of information, particularly regarding the European situation.

A further most serious embarrassment is the fact that the British government is involved concerning its most secret sources of information, regarding which only the Prime Minister, the Chiefs of Staff and a very limited number of other officials have knowledge.

A recent speech in Congress by Representative Harness would clearly suggest to the Japanese that we have been reading their codes, though Mr. Harness and the American public would probably not draw any such conclusion.

[2994] The conduct of General Eisenhower's campaign and of all operations in the Pacific are closely related in conception and timing to the information we secretly obtain through these intercepted codes. They contribute greatly to the victory and tremendously to the saving in American lives, both in the conduct of current operations and in looking towards the early termination of the war.

I am presenting this matter to you in the hope that you will see your way clear to avoid the tragic results with which we are now threatened in the present political campaign.

Please return this letter by bearer. I will hold it in my most secret file subject to your reference should you so desire.

Faithfully yours,

(Sgd.) G. C. MARSHALL.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, I think I asked you if Colonel Clarke brought the earlier letter of September 25th back to you.

General MARSHALL. He did. I discussed the matter with him, Governor Dewey's comments, and also with General Bissell, head of the Army Intelligence. I came to the conclusion that the matter was so important that we must make it a matter of record,¹ and I sent Colonel Clarke—incidentally, in civilian clothes—to Albany. He there secured [2995] an audience with Governor Dewey, and he telephoned me, as I recall, from Governor Dewey's office that the Governor was unwilling to read the letter until he had at least one adviser similarly aware of the circumstances I was bringing to his, the Governor's, attention, and also that he felt he must keep the letter in his file, because he did not know what might happen to me, and he would have no record whatsoever of the occurrence.

Governor Dewey, as I recall, then came on the phone, I having told Colonel Clarke that I was ready to make those agreements. The

Governor spoke to me personally about a Mr. Bell, who was, I think, the State Bank Examiner——

Mr. MITCHELL. Superintendent of Banks.

General MARSHALL. Something of that sort, who was thoroughly to be trusted, and he, the Governor would see that it was locked up in his most secret file case, whatever that might be.

He also said that he must keep the letters to have with his records.

I then agreed to that, and on that basis the letter was left in his hands. There was no discussion between us as to what his decision might be. As a matter of fact, I do not think he read the letter beyond the first paragraph at the time of this conversation.

[2996] Colonel Clarke returned to Washington and reported to me that the Governor had read the letter, had discussed it with Mr. Bell in the presence of Colonel Clarke,¹ and I do not recall that he gave us any assurances. All I know is that there seemed to be no further reference to the matter in the campaign.

Do you wish me to go on?

Mr. MITCHELL. Go ahead, General.

General MARSHALL. Do you wish me to go into any further conversations with Governor Dewey?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

General MARSHALL. After the election and the defeat of Governor Dewey, I thought it was due him that he should know more the basis of this letter, so I had General Bissell proceed to Albany, gain an audience with the Governor, and General Bissell took with him a number of copies of magic showing at that time the movements of the various Japanese convoys, and of the Japanese naval craft on which we were basing our operations, so that the Governor could gather some idea of just how important the matter was. As far as I know, he was greatly interested. It was more or less in appreciation of the action he had apparently taken.

[2997] I saw Governor Dewey for the first time in connection with this incident at the funeral, I think, of Mr. Roosevelt. At the end of the funeral services we were thrown together there and I asked him to come to the War Department with me. He did and we showed him the situation out in the Pacific. Showed him also the current magic, giving the Japanese movements at that time, and made as plain as we could to him just what the importance of these matters were.

His attitude was very friendly and very gracious.

At a later time—no, I am wrong.

When General Bissell returned from Albany, having gone up in effect to see Governor Dewey and to show him these copies of magic as to the current operations in the Pacific, the Governor told him and he, General Bissell, told me orally on his return that he, the Governor, understood there was going to be a further discussion in the near future in the Congress regarding Pearl Harbor and he, Governor Dewey, inquired of General Bissell to me as to whether I desired him to intervene to the extent that he might be able to suppress such debates.

General Bissell was telling me this on his return to Washington. He suggested that I telephone Governor Dewey but I thought it was better that General Bissell should have the conversation, and I told him what to say. He called up. [2998] This is all hearsay.

Mr. MITCHELL. Tell us what you told him to say.

General MARSHALL. I told him to tell Governor Dewey that I had already embarrassed him with requests which had affected his personal actions and that I would not make any further request of him. I told General Bissell that Governor Dewey would probably say that didn't matter, that he would be interested in the conduct of the campaign, the successful conclusion of the war, and if he said that to again repeat that I had anticipated that response and that I still had no request to make of him.

That is exactly the way it took place. General Bissell told him what I had said. He replied that that was not the point, it wasn't a question of personal embarrassment, it was a question of the progress of the war.

General Bissell told him that I had anticipated some such reply and I still had no request to make.

And I will add that, so far as I know, certainly not in the immediate future after that, there was no debate on the question in Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL. I notice in these letters there is a reference to the fact that at some time prior to September 1944 as a result of the OSS getting into the Japanese Embassy offices in Portugal, the military attaché Japanese codes [2999] all over the world were changed. Was that just one of the Japanese codes?

General MARSHALL. That was one of their codes, which we had broken down.

Mr. MITCHELL. You continued to decode up to the time this letter to Mr. Dewey was written, the diplomatic codes that we have had here in evidence?

General MARSHALL. We continued right through that time, and, I might add, it played a very important part, the decoding of these messages, deciphering of these messages, played a very important part after the termination of the Japanese struggle in connection with our movement of troops into Japan and particularly into Korea, because we had the communications of the Japanese officers and we knew whether we had to go in with a regiment or an Army corps.

We went into Korea with—that was General MacArthur's action but I think this is approximately correct, on September 3 with, I believe—only a regiment, when the original plan was September 23 with a whole Army corps, because we had the communications of the Japanese commander in Korea appealing to his own government to expedite the movement of the American troops into Korea, which meant to us we need not anticipate any violent reaction from the Japanese.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was about what date in 1945?

[3000] General MARSHALL. That was after VJ-day. That was some days in August and possibly early September.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the exception of this change—

General MARSHALL. Also I might add that in the final phase of the war we obtained information regarding the campaign in Manchuria which was helpful to the occupation of the Allied troops.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the exception of this military attaché code which you lost the ability to decode, prior to 1944 had you, since Pearl Harbor, lost the ability to crack these other Japanese codes?

General MARSHALL. They lost some of them from time to time due to the regular changes. Then it would take a while to bring it down to date. But on that attaché code the whole code went out. Almost all codes have frequent changes, some daily.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a sentence in your letter of the 27th of September, at the bottom of page 1, which reads:

Therefore we possessed a wealth of information regarding their moves in the Pacific which in turn was furnished the State Department—rather than as popularly supposed, the State Department providing us with the information—but which unfortunately made no reference whatever to intentions toward Hawaii until [3001] the last message before December 7th which did not reach our hands until the following day, December 8th.

Now, I would like for you to look in the intercept book, Mr. Hannaford, and find the messages you marked, and—

General MARSHALL. I can tell you the character. The only message I had in mind was where they were talking about lights in the windows. That was the first one that came to my attention regarding the Pearl Harbor affair.

Mr. MITCHELL. That pointed at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. Of course, at this time there had not been the exhaustive search of all of these various records.

(A document was handed to General Marshall by Mr. Hannaford.)

General MARSHALL. It is a lengthy message from Honolulu to Tokyo. 3 December 1941, from Kita to Tokyo.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. What is the page in the book?

General MARSHALL. Page 22.

Mr. MITCHELL. That message we are showing you, about the lights in the windows, appears not to have been translated until December 11, and your letter refers to a message that didn't come into your hands until the 8th.

General MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, the point was, I didn't [3002] go back and check on these dates and translations, but was speaking from memory three or four years afterwards in dictating this letter to Mr. Dewey. It may have been that it didn't get to me until the 11th. I was not looking at any record. I was talking three years later. But it was a message that came to my attention after the event and this was the one I was talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL. At page 27 of the book you are looking at there is a message that was sent from Honolulu to Tokyo, December 6, and was translated December 8. That is the message which says:

I imagine that in all probability there is considerable opportunity left to take advantage for a surprise attack against these places.

General MARSHALL. The one I am referring to is this lengthy one.

Mr. MITCHELL. You don't identify the one I have read?

General MARSHALL. I don't have a recollection of that. I have a definite recollection of this elaborate message here on page 22 though I didn't read it at the time, I didn't have it available, I have never seen it from that day until now.

Mr. MITCHELL. In your letter of the 27th you refer to the last message before December 7 "which did not reach our [3003] hands until the following day, December 8." As I understand it you were not referring to this 14-part and 1 p. m. message?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I am referring to this message, as nearly as my recollection permits, and am quite clear this was the one, beginning at page 22, dated the 3d of December, 1941, from Honolulu to Tokyo; and I repeat I have never seen the message from the time I looked at it until today and I was dictating a letter offhand in a very few minutes to Governor Dewey.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will you tell the committee what occasioned your writing Mr. Dewey at all?

General MARSHALL. It was reported to me by the Chief of Army Intelligence that these various comments were being made on the floor of Congress referring to Pearl Harbor, and the comments being made at frequent intervals in the campaign speeches of the various members of the parties were leading inevitably to the conclusion, the Chief of Army Intelligence, General Bissell thought, that other Governments would decide that we had a method of breaking their code, and the matter was growing more pointed as the campaign was becoming more violent, and some action ought to be taken in a hurry or we were going to lose our tremendous source of information in the Far East.

[3004] The recommendation made to me by General Bissell—and you can call him as a witness—was to go to the President for some assistance in the matter. I didn't think that would do. I thought it over overnight. The next morning I dictated this letter of September 25 and sent for General Bissell, read the letter to him, and asked him his view on this procedure. He thought that was all right.

I then sent him, as I recall, with the letter personally to Admiral King to let Admiral King see it and get his reaction. His reaction was to concur. Then the discussion was how to get the letter into Governor Dewey's hands without attracting attention to procedure. I have described the method we took.

In explanation of that procedure of addressing the letter to Governor Dewey, I felt, and Admiral King concurred, that it was absolutely necessary that Governor Dewey feel that no one other than ourselves, that is, that the President, the Secretary of War, and other officials of the War Department or the Navy Department, had no knowledge whatever of this action, and its success would depend entirely on Governor Dewey feeling that that was the case.

Therefore, we followed a purely nonpolitical procedure entirely in the interest of the conduct of the operation. That is the way, I understand, Governor Dewey accepted the approach. I never told the President, I think he died with- [3005] out knowing anything about this, I am quite certain he did, and I have no recollection after the event of ever telling the Secretary of War.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think I have finished, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. General Marshall, I have two or three questions I would like to ask.

Going back into the spring and summer of 1941, I think you stated on yesterday that not only you but other officers of the War Department and also officers of the Navy Department, insofar as you felt it proper to do so, were urging that everything be done to postpone any clash that might result in armed hostilities between the United States and Japan?

General MARSHALL. That is the case.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you present during any of the discussions in the latter part of 1940 or any part of 1941 with reference to the location of the Fleet in the Hawaiian region?

General MARSHALL. I was present at some discussions with reference to the fleet changing its base from Long Beach and San Diego to Hawaii and with regard to portions of the fleet being drawn into the Atlantic.

[3006] The CHAIRMAN. What was the general understanding, what was your understanding of the general opinion of those responsible in the various branches of the Government, that is, the President, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of Navy, with respect to the maintenance of that fleet, Pacific fleet, as it finally came to be called, in the region of Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall, as I said before in my testimony, the pros and cons of the argument regarding the fleet at Hawaii. I heard it—I am sorry to tell you that I don't remember. I think I had a very definite view in the matter. I know I had a very definite view in relation to the reinforcement of the naval forces in the Atlantic, and I am rather foggy about that.

So much happened after that, and it was a naval issue, that I have lost the thread of the discussions. I know that I was intensely interested in the development of the fleet train, as it was then called, and I recall specifically taking it up in a liaison meeting in an effort to assist Admiral Stark in getting the necessary craft which would have to be drawn from commercial use, particularly Latin America, at that time.

I am sorry I can't give you any definite reactions regarding the movement of the fleet from the west coast out [3007] to Hawaii, or regarding the reinforcement of the Atlantic portion of our Navy from ships in the Pacific, though I sat in on a good many of the discussions.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall what your own view was during the progress of the Japanese encroachments from Japan down to the south in the direction of Indochina, Thailand, and the Kra Peninsula, as to whether that encroachment endangered the security of our interests in the Philippine Islands, and other regions of the Southwest Pacific.

General MARSHALL. My view was that it clearly did endanger our interests, endanger the security of the Philippines, if the Japanese moved in force into the south of the Philippines, southern Indochina, Borneo, Thailand.

The CHAIRMAN. And your view was, as I understand it, that while attempting to postpone any actual clash, while attempting to play for time, as we might say, in the relationship between Japan and the United States, such efforts might be, would be taken, or should be taken as would in some measure convince Japan that it was hazardous for her to proceed further south?

General MARSHALL. That was the effort that we were making in connection with the reinforcement of the Philippines, which began in a material way in August 1941 for the [3008] purpose of so strengthening the Philippines that the Japanese would think it unsafe to proceed further south.

The CHAIRMAN. Did I understand you to say that, taking the Panama Canal, the Caribbean area, into consideration, and the Pacific Coast of the United States into consideration, and the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands into consideration, in view of the limited material we had for distribution to all of those points, that Hawaii was better taken care of in the way of matériel than any of these other points that I have mentioned?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. At that time, I think, to which you referred, virtually nothing had been done about the Philippines, and Panama had been about halfway developed up to the standard we thought necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. So that you began to make some intensification of effort to give General MacArthur in the Philippines something of the matériel and supplies which he had been for quite a time requesting?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. There were two factors.

One is, we had reached in the delivery of matériel or troops, or both, to Panama and to Hawaii to the degree where we thought they were reasonably safe, and, quantity production just coming in, we started to build up the Philippine Island defenses.

[3009] The CHAIRMAN. Was it in pursuance of that policy that these unarmed airplanes had left the west coast on the 6th of December for the Philippines? Were dispatched?

General MARSHALL. That is correct. That was the first squadron reinforcement of 45 flying fortresses, to be added to the 35 which had already reached the Philippines in early September.

The CHAIRMAN. They left from some point in California?

General MARSHALL. They left Hamilton Field, right near San Francisco.

The CHAIRMAN. Destined for the Philippines, but with a view of stopping in Hawaii to refuel.

General MARSHALL. Refuel and have the engines gone over and give the pilots a rest.

The CHAIRMAN. I presume it is safe to say that it was obvious to those planes, inasmuch as they were unarmed, they did not expect to run into a war in Hawaii on their way to the Philippines.

General MARSHALL. No, sir. That was a natural reaction on their part.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, this morning, I believe you said, or yesterday, that when General MacArthur's dispatch to you of November 28, which was in reply to yours to him of the 27th, and General Short's dispatch of the same date were handed to you, you did not recall whether they were attached [3010] together by a clip or not, as they now appear.

General MARSHALL. I don't think I said I did not know whether they were attached together, or not. I do not know. All I do know is that I initialed the first upper copy, and apparently they came in in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. Did I understand you to say you did or did not remember whether you saw General Short's reply?

General MARSHALL. I do not remember whether or not I saw General Short's reply, but the presumption must be that I did. In any event that was my opportunity to intervene which I did not do.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you sent on the 27th almost identical messages to Panama, Hawaii, the Philippines, and the Pacific Coast of the United States.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. There was apparently one difference, I think. In your message to General MacArthur in the Philippines you did not caution him with reference to alarming the civil population, which you did include in your message to the Hawaiian Islands. Do you recall that?

General MARSHALL. There is that difference between the two messages. The reason, quite evidently, is that Hawaii had quite a mixed population, including 130,000 Japanese, which is quite a different situation from that in [3011] the Philippines, and the position of vital installations which related to the city proper presented a condition in Hawaii considerably different from that in the Philippines.

Clark Field is to the north of Manila, and Corregidor at the entrance of the bay, 35 miles from Manila. And, may I add, a very definite reason in connection with that was to try not to upset the procedure that Mr. Hull was following in an effort to stall action in the Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN. In your conversations with the War Department and the Navy Department, and the President, with reference to obtaining time, as much time as was possible in order to prepare better before there might possibly be any clash of arms between Japan and the United States, do you recall what the President's attitude was toward that approach to the subject in conversations you had?

General MARSHALL. As far as I can recall, it was identical with ours, and Mr. Hull's. "Ours" meaning Admiral Stark and myself; the Secretary of War, Colonel Knox.

The CHAIRMAN. In your message to these various areas on the 27th of November, after calling attention to the fact that the negotiations with Japan appeared to be on the verge of termination, to all practical purposes, and so forth, you gave them what apparently amounted to instructions [3012] with respect to reconnaissance, and the taking of all other steps necessary in their judgment to meet an attack or to meet the situation as it might develop in view of that situation. That instruction, or that directive, was present in all these dispatches from you to Panama, Hawaii, the west coast, and the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, you received a reply from General MacArthur on the 28th, the next day after you sent it, in which he stated:

Pursuant to instructions contained in your radio 624 air reconnaissance has been extended and intensified in conjunction with the Navy. Ground security measures have been taken within the limitations imposed by present state of development of this theatre of operations. Everything is in readiness for the conduct of a successful defense. Intimate liaison and cordial relations exist between Army and Navy.

Do you regard that reply of General MacArthur as responsive to your message to him of the day before?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3013] The CHAIRMAN. On the same day on which you sent these various messages, General Miles as Chief of G-2 sent this message to Hawaii:

Japanese negotiations have come to practical stalemate. Hostilities may ensue. Subversive activities may be expected. Inform Commanding General and Chief of Staff only. Signed "Miles".

You received from General Short on the 28th of November, the day following your message, this message:

Report Department alerted to prevent sabotage. Liaison with Navy—there is some word there which I do not understand—"four seven two twenty seventh."

Did you say in your testimony yesterday that you remembered whether you saw that reply from General Short?

General MARSHALL. I said I could not remember whether or not I saw it but the presumption must be that I did see it.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, whether you saw it or not, looking at it now as it is and comparing it with your message to him of the day before, do you now regard it as having been an adequate response to the instructions that you gave him?

General MARSHALL. In the light of all the events, Senator, it is quite evident it was not adequate.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the fact that General Miles wired him tage and in view of the fact that his message to you mentioned only on the same day, the 27th, to look out for some [3014] sabo-sabotage, would it have been possible for him to have confused General Miles' message with yours and replied to General Miles but sent it to you?

General MARSHALL. I understand that you have the exact records here.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General MARSHALL. Or, rather, I am told that the records show that the dispatch of General Short's, his message was dispatched prior to the receipt of General Miles' message. I did not know that, of course, nor did I know of General Miles' message.

The CHAIRMAN. Then if General Short's reply was sent before he received General Miles' dispatch, obviously it could not have been intended as a reply to General Miles.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. That would be a matter of record, I presume. The point here, I think, Senator, is this: that the fact that General Miles sent that message—because it was not known to me I presume it may have been known in the Operations Section, I do not know, but the G-2 was charged with the dissemination of information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Operations Section, that was the section that was originally called the War Plans?

General MARSHALL. War Plans.

[3015] The CHAIRMAN. War Plans Division.

General MARSHALL. War Plans Division. I am sorry. I misnamed it before. The War Plans Division.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the section or division of which General Gerow was the head?

General MARSHALL. He was the head. Whether or not he saw that I do not know, but, you see, G-2 was charged with the dissemination of information but not permitted to issue directives, and that was a report on the dissemination.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there any rule existing in the General Staff or in the War Department that required messages received in reply to messages like that which you sent on the 27th should be called to your personal attention?

General MARSHALL. No specific rule. I was supposed to be given the opportunity to see the important messages.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

General MARSHALL. I do not know just what the situation was at that time but at least since they sometimes came in a thousand or more a day and the important ones are brought to my attention; and, of course, specifically anyone that would be as important as this, because the directive went out over my name, presumably from my office.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, was there anything in General Short's reply referring to sabotage, being seen by an officer [3016] in the Operations or in the G-2 division, would have identified it as a reply to your message to him which did not mention sabotage but which did specifically mention reconnaissance and "all other measures that you deem necessary to be taken under the circumstances?"

General MARSHALL. I do not know quite whether I understand your question, but in the message there from General Short I think is a word that you said you do not understand, "REURAD", "referring to your radio", which gave the number and which identified the message that was sent to him.

The CHAIRMAN. And that answer gave the number of the message?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. From the reply it would seem that was a reply to your message?

General MARSHALL. Yes. That says directly that is what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Now, let me ask you this further question in regard to your view in reference to the facilities, men and equipment in the Hawaiian Islands with respect to the ability of those in charge of that operation, charged with the responsibility to have met the attack or have retarded it or have minimized its effects, if what was there in men and material had been reasonably alert and reasonably [3017] active and reasonably ready to meet any such possible attack, what was your conclusion about that—not that every gun had to be in its place and every man had to be in his cockpit, but if under ordinary circumstances, in view of the information which had been sent to them and particularly on the 27th, and the general attitude of alertness that it seems had been invoked, what was your conclusion, that they could have retarded or minimized the effect of the attack or they could have defeated it altogether? I would like to get you to draw the distinction on it.

General MARSHALL. My conclusion is, and I might say was, that the utilization of all the means at hand, means and men, and the deployment of the matériel and the ships, and so forth, to the best advantage under the terms of the alert, that the attack could have been seriously interfered with, its damaging effect greatly limited; and I do not know whether the carriers could have been brought into a position to operate or not, I am unfamiliar with that, but they were great potentials out in that region at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The testimony of Admiral Inglis and Colonel Thielen shows, I think, that on the 6th day of December there was no reconnaissance whatever in Pearl Harbor or on the Island of Oahu. There was on that day some type of reconnaissance from the carrier Enterprise which was some two [3018] hundred miles west of Oahu.

Have you received any information, or have you any information that would offer an explanation as to why there was no reconnaissance of any kind on the 6th day of December, the day before this attack?

General MARSHALL. No, I have not, Senator, and I should explain that I haven't discussed this with anyone. I haven't discussed it with General Short or Admiral Kimmel. I haven't discussed it with my own people. I might say that I haven't discussed it with General Gerow. I haven't seen General Gerow since October 1944. The event occurred and my interest and my obligation brought me to the activities necessary to meet the situation which developed and which continued on, of course, as you know from one serious state to another.

I would also add that in my own mind I never could grasp what had happened between the period when so much was said about air attack, the necessity for anti-aircraft, the necessity for planes, for reconnaissance, the necessity for attack planes for defense and the other requirements which anticipated very definitely and affirmatively an air attack, I could never understand why suddenly it became apparently a side issue. I do not know just what the reason was. I have never inquired of the individuals concerning it.

The CHAIRMAN. Following your directive, or order, or instructions of the 27th of November, did you receive any further information that seemed to you to make it necessary to reiterate those warnings—

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I did not.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing): Until you received the message on the 7th with reference to the 14-part dispatch and the 1 o'clock dispatch?

General MARSHALL. After I saw the alert message of November 27, which was brought to my attention on the morning of November 28, I recall nothing coming in from the Hawaiian Department or any other matter which required an additional dispatch.

It is very important that you do not confuse a command direction. Better completely cancel it and issue a new one, because the amendments are dangerous things in relation to military operations. Once the commander is alerted, the question then was when did you reduce the alert. Of course, the G-2 functions of the War Department as well as out in the commands were to furnish material as it developed, but the command direction stood unless you dared to amend it, or what would be a better procedure, completely cancel it and issue a new directive.

The CHAIRMAN. Reference has been made all through this examination to Rainbow Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

[3020] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Rainbow No. 5 seeming to be the ultimate plan. Did that mean that Rainbow No. 1 was cancelled or modified or completely changed when a new Rainbow plan was promulgated, or was it a modification or change?

General MARSHALL. Senator, I will not try to answer that without actually looking at the papers and I would have to get the records of the War Plans Division. The presumption would be absolute that if a new plan was issued the other is cancelled by a certain date.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, probably General Gerow can explain that in greater detail.

General MARSHALL. He can tell you that direct.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is all. Congressman Cooper?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire briefly.

When, did you state, General, you were appointed Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. I was appointed Acting Chief of Staff on July 1, 1939, and on the formal occurrence of the vacancy in the position of Chief of Staff by the retirement of General Craig on the 1st of September 1939 I then was nominated and confirmed as Chief of Staff.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, you had been Assistant Chief [3021] of Staff while General Craig was Chief of Staff, had you?

General MARSHALL. I came to Washington on the 6th of July 1938 and became the head of the War Plans Division. In October 1938, I think about the middle of the month, I became Deputy Chief of Staff; therefore, the immediate assistant to General Craig.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I understood you to state something the other day about General Craig taking the position that the interception of these Japanese messages was illegal. Is that correct?

General MARSHALL. That was his view of the matter.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That was his view of the matter?

General MARSHALL. He considered that that was forbidden by the terms of the Federal Communications Act.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I see. But the practice continued right on of intercepting all the Japanese messages that could be intercepted?

General MARSHALL. With such secrecy as could be enforced.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Sir?

General MARSHALL. With such secrecy as could be enforced.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. My interest was challenged, General, while General Miles was before us with respect to these intercepted messages, especially with respect to the period of time that elapsed between the time the messages were sent—and [3022] of course, I assume they were intercepted at the time they were sent—and the time they were decoded and translated.

Had that attracted your attention at any time?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that that attracted my specific attention because I was aware of the fact that they were short-handed and it was very difficult to obtain people that we could trust and that had the necessary qualities.

I looked up several days ago what the status of that was and, as I recall, on December 7, 1941, there were some 44 officers and about 180 men, women, civilians and soldiers, in Washington in the Army engaged in this work and some 150 out in the field at what they call the monitoring stations, that is, merely intercepting the material.

Now, I compared that to see what the change was with the situation at the end of the war and there were in Washington some 666 officers and a total of 10,000 individuals here in Washington at this work. The British had 30,000. The Navy of ours here I think had 6,000.

Now, that had to be built up, of course. You had to have the right people, with the qualifications; you had to have them all examined by the FBI. It was a very slow procedure; and, of course, also at that time we had a shortage of personnel in all of our activities, and I recall at an earlier [3023] date they had a small group down at Fort Washington—I think, which is near Mount Vernon just on that side of the river, at least I think that is where it was; if it was not there it was across the river—and some 26 men, I believe; and one man was picked up or checked up endeavoring to sell this information up in Boston, I think, and we had the FBI nab him.

It was very difficult to get trustworthy personnel at that particular time in the state of general disregard of security matters and of interest and of an appreciation of the importance of what was going on in the United States with relation to the possibility of war. So I thought, if I might add, I thought that what they were doing was very unusual that they were able to turn out the critical messages in the manner that they did.

Now, there was always a backlog of messages which did take a long time to reduce. There was always the hazard—I presume that General Miles is the best witness—of some particular message being overlooked. There was always, as far as I was concerned, the possibility that the messages that might seem to me with very sober consideration as most important for me to see, that I might not see them all and there was always the possibility that in going through this mass of information, of which this was only incidental to my desk every day, that I might not absorb the true significance [3024] of each matter.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I just noticed, while General Miles was before us here, that, as shown in exhibit 2, messages received from November 28, that were translated after December 7, 1941, the time varies all the way from 2 days to about 28 days, do they?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I saw that record.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And you say that during that time we had a hundred and some odd people engaged in this work?

General MARSHALL. We had, I recall rather accurately, we had 44 officers here in Washington at work at it and I think some 180 soldiers and civilians, but the exact numbers can be easily obtained for you by General Miles or others.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And later you say that number—

General MARSHALL. Increased to 10,000 on the Army side.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. 10,000. And the British had 30,000?

General MARSHALL. Yes, and our Navy I think—I am not the witness for them—had about 6,000. The growth of that was comparable to the growth of the Army. It was changing every month.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, I was just wondering at the time I examined those how this information could be very valuable to you, with the great responsibility that you had resting on you, if it came to you a week or two weeks or [3025] three weeks after the message was intercepted.

General MARSHALL. Well, that is natural, sir, but I was rather impressed with the fact that under the conditions under which they were then operating, which were pretty much unavoidable, they were able to pull out the most critical messages almost immediately.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Then another question if I may, General. Were you kept fully advised as to diplomatic developments all through the latter part of November and on up to the first part of December?

General MARSHALL. I, of course, did not know all of the matters, but I would say that I was kept very fully advised; and so far as Mr. Hull personally is concerned, I remember hearing him say with considerable emphasis in those last day apropos of his discussions with the Japanese envoys, "These fellows mean to fight and you will have to watch out."

The VICE CHAIRMAN. You heard him say that?

General MARSHALL. I heard him say that and I have a very distinct recollection of it.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, he stated before the committee that he considered, to use his words, "Japan was hell bent on conquest and aggression."

Did you entertain that view, that they were determined on conquest and aggression?

[3026] General MARSHALL. My appreciation of the situation, as nearly as I can recall it—I am trying to avoid the back sight things—was that they were going to profit in every conceivable way by the opportunities presented on the destruction of Russia by the German Army and the fact that the German submarines had England by the throat, as it were, in the Atlantic, which widely affected the absolutely necessary reinforcement of England by matériel from the United States.

What I could not quite decide in my own mind, because of the peculiar way in which the war had been conducted in the entry into Austria and the entry into the Sudeten lands and later Czechoslovakia, in the movement into China which would have started a state of war, in the occupation of Indochina, in the beginning of the infiltration into Thailand, I could not be quite certain in my mind how far they were going by that method before breaking out into an overt act.

I was certain if given the opportunity, that is, security against Russian attack at their backs, that they would take as much as they could get for nothing and probably would fight for more if their position was a favorable one for it, which the occupation of Thailand would have been. Once they had their air fields, their gasoline, their bombs, and their maintenance established in Thailand, the Malay Peninsula, meaning Singapore, the Kra Isthmus, they were virtually at their [3027] mercy because Great Britain had very little they could send out there, very little in planes they could possibly afford to that theater. They were completely committed to the desperate battle that was going on in the European theater.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Then did you consider war with Japan as inevitable?

General MARSHALL. It appeared to me that it would be inevitable if the Russian Army fell, if the Russian Army fell and my own conclusion before the end of the war, 2 years before the end of the war, was that the Japanese thought that Russia was going to be destroyed in December of 1941 with the capture of Moscow and they became committed in the Pacific thinking they were safe from any Russian involvement later in Manchuria.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Well, about when did you reach the conclusion then that war between Japan and the United States was inevitable?

General MARSHALL. Well, that absolute conclusion would hinge somewhat on what happened to Russia, and Japan launched its overt act against us before the decision of the moment in the Russian campaign.

The anticipation was, if you go back, that Hitler's forces would attack Moscow before the middle of December, that was the announcement at that time. Instead of that they [3028] collapsed due to a terrific cold spell and there began the turning of the struggle in Russia which meant that the Japanese need not expect with a certainty that they would not eventually have a strong Russia at their back door, but they had committed themselves to the war, I think, on the assumption that the collapse of Russia was going to take place in the next 2 weeks. It did not take place. Had they not attacked on December 7, had they waited, for example, until January 1, there is a possibility that they would not have launched the attack, I do not know, because it appeared quite a definite possibility that Russia might get to her feet, which she did.

I hope I haven't confused you.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. No, that is all right, I am glad to have that.

Well, where did you think the first Japanese attack on the United States would occur?

General MARSHALL. I thought it would occur in the Philippines. I thought the first Japanese attack was going to be directly south towards Singapore, that that would be the main campaign, and the Philippines, of course, would become involved in it. Just when they would strike and their method of striking with landing forces rather than just air, I did not know, but the air strike might occur very early, [3029] which it did.

I assumed that Guam would fall almost immediately and I assumed that Wake would fall almost immediately.

[3030] The VICE CHAIRMAN. Did you think the first Japanese attack would be at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. I did not anticipate that. I thought they would not hazard that. That, of course, was a raiding attack, to strike a crippling blow, which did not involve any landing, or any possible landing.

Their campaign was headed south through the China Sea. It was to cover their flank with that stroke. Those same carriers appeared quite quickly in the China Sea operations.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I do not want to detain you too long, General, because I know other members of the committee want to ask you questions, but I have one or two questions, if I may, about what occurred immediately before the attack.

I understood you to state that you were out of Washington on November 27.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I was down in North Carolina.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Reviewing maneuvers in North Carolina?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I went down on the afternoon of the 26th, following a Joint Board meeting on the morning of the 26th.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And the message about which you have been examined here at some length, which was sent over your name on November 27 to the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, and the other commanders mentioned—that message [3031] of November 27, 1941, to the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department, was brought to your attention early the next morning, the 28th, when you returned?

General MARSHALL. I saw it about 8 o'clock on the morning of the 28th.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Did you consider that message an adequate warning to the Commanding General, Hawaiian Department?

General MARSHALL. I did, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Was there ever any doubt in your mind at any time—

General MARSHALL. There was not.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That that was adequate warning?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. And it was your opinion at that time that there were sufficient forces and sufficient material in Hawaii to defend that fortress?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I believe General Short, in command of the Hawaiian Department at that time, was a lieutenant general, wasn't he?

General MARSHALL. He was lieutenant general by virtue of that appointment.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Was he one of the senior officers of the United States Army?

[3032] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; he was one of the two corps commanders at that time, who had actually had something resembling an Army Corps to command, and had had the benefit of training and maneuvers with the corps that they commanded.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Back at that time we did not have many officers with the rank of lieutenant general, did we?

General MARSHALL. We had none except those who were assigned to their territorial Army commands, of which there were four in the United States, one in Hawaii, and one in the Caribbean.

As long as they held the post, they held the rank. When they left the post, they lost the rank. He proceeded to Hawaii as major general and became lieutenant general on his arrival there.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. By reason of the fact that he took command of that post?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Several questions have been asked you about these messages received on the 28th from General MacArthur and General Short. I believe you stated you presumed that you saw the message from General Short at the same time that you saw the message from General MacArthur.

General MARSHALL. Yes, I think that must be presumed.

[3033] The VICE CHAIRMAN. But your attention was not attracted by the message from General Short, as to whether it was responsive to the message of November 27.

General MARSHALL. I said I had no recollection of it.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I notice in the message of November 27, these three words "Report measures taken."

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I believe you stated, in response to a question by the chairman, that certainly in view of subsequent events, you recognized that the message from General Short was not an adequate response to the message of November 27.

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. But you do not recall that that was checked on any further, or any further messages sent?

General MARSHALL. I am quite certain there was no further message sent. I might say here, Mr. Congressman, that the people working with him had sent an alert direction which all in the War Department then and now, I think, thought was a sufficient directive, and the comment out there, as far as we knew, from all our communications, had been insistent on measures to meet an air attack and submarine attack.

The thought of merely expecting an alert direction for [3034] sabotage was not in anybody's mind at all, which undoubtedly, in my opinion, may account for the fact that that word did not register, and when they spoke of liaison with the Navy that did register as to the assumption that the reconnaissance was on. That is merely a conjecture.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I understood you to state in reply to a question of the chairman that the reply from General Short was not considered as a reply to the message from General Miles, G-2 of the General Staff of the War Department to G-2 of the Hawaiian Department.

General MARSHALL. I testified to that purely because that message there says "Re so-and-so," which is the alert message.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That is true. The message from General Short states, "Re your radio 472," and the message of November 27 bears the number 472.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. So that was regarded as a reply to your message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. I believe that is all. Thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator George.

Senator GEORGE. General Marshall, I would like to ask you just one or two questions.

[3035] What proportion of the fleet in the Pacific, the entire Pacific area, was concentrated at Pearl Harbor? It is a naval question, I know, but I thought perhaps you would be able to answer it.

General MARSHALL. I could not answer that in detail. I happen to know that there were no carriers at Pearl Harbor. Two were at sea, one of them proceeding towards or in the vicinity of Midway and the other one returning to Pearl Harbor, and a third carrier was, I believe, at San Diego. Other than that I could not give you the data.

Senator GEORGE. But the main strength of the Pacific Fleet was at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. I believe that is correct, sir; but of course I am a poor witness on that.

Senator GEORGE. General, reference has been frequently made to a message, one of the intercepted messages from Tokyo to Honolulu dated September 24, 1941, actually translated, according to the notation at the foot of the message, on October 9, 1941, in which specific inquiry is made about the waters in Pearl Harbor, and the suggestion of a rough division of the waters into five subareas, and specific inquiry made regarding the fleet.

Presumably that message might have had for its inspiration a submarine or other attack other than air, but is it not [3036] rather strongly suggestive that an air strike must have been contemplated by Japan?

General MARSHALL. In the light of what happened that is quite evident, Senator. But I may say as to that, we were getting messages making very specific inquiries about naval vessels of ours all over the Pacific, and to that extent it dispersed the attention.

However, it is inescapable, looking at this message and knowing what happened, that it must have had a direct relation to the planning of the attack.

Senator GEORGE. General Marshall, Secretary Hull in his testimony before the committee, specifically directed attention to his appearance before the War Council on November 25, 1941, which he described as consisting of the President, the Secretaries of State, War and Navy, Chief of Staff and Chief of Naval Operations, and further described it as a sort of clearing house for all the information and views which were under current discussion by the State Department and any other Departments of the Government.

I merely wish to inquire if your recollection accords with this statement of Secretary Hull (reading):

At that meeting I also gave the estimate which I then had that the Japanese military were already poised for attack. The Japanese leaders were determined and desperate. They were likely to break [3037] out anywhere at any time at any place, and I emphasized the probable element of surprise in their plan. I felt virtually the last stage had been reached, and that the safeguarding of our national security was in the hands of the Army and Navy.

Does your recollection accord with that statement?

General MARSHALL. I do not remember all those details, sir, but I got the general impression from Mr. Hull of his telling me "These fellows mean to fight and we should get ready."

Senator GEORGE. And immediately after that you approved the message of November 27, although it was actually sent on the day when you arrived from Washington?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; it was discussed on the morning of the 26th in the Joint Board by Admiral Stark and myself and the Deputy Chief of Staff and his opposite in the Navy, and General Gerow and his opposite in the Navy.

Senator GEORGE. General Marshall, of course the Fleet in the Pacific, or so much of our Navy as was in the Pacific and based at Pearl Harbor in November and December 1941 and sometime prior to that was of course a long distance from the southward movement of the Japanese forces. Isn't it almost compelling that we must have kept constantly in mind that Japan would make an air strike at the main naval forces [3038] in the Pacific as long as they were sitting out on their flank?

General MARSHALL. I would not put it quite that way, sir. They certainly would if they thought they had the opportunity. They would have to be on their guard against that Fleet. Of course they would know presumably the extent to which the Fleet was prepared to go to sea for operations a long way from its base. The Japanese would know conclusively we had no means in Manila Bay to shelter the Fleet. We had virtually no antiaircraft at all. There were no guns at Cavite.

The submarines and small groups of ships of the Asiatic Fleet could offer not even one gun of antiaircraft fire in the Cavite naval region. Therefore the Fleet would have to be based at Hawaii, though it might operate a couple of thousand miles west of Hawaii, which is a very difficult procedure.

The Japanese of course would know that. They would know that if our Fleet moved out into the far Pacific it would be in a very tenuous position where any unfavorable action could result very seriously because of the distance of the Fleet from its base.

All of those were considerations in relation to what Japan would probably do. Given the opportunity to strike a crippling blow at the Fleet, it is useless to say she would [3039] probably do it, because she did do it.

Senator GEORGE. I have no further questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Clark I believe is absent.

Senator Lucas.

Senator LUCAS. General Marshall—

The CHAIRMAN. Before you begin, Senator, may I ask General Marshall, for the benefit of the committee and to determine about its sittings a little later today and tomorrow, in an effort to conclude with you, what are your plans, as far as you have made them, to leave for China?

General MARSHALL. All I can do, sir, is have a plane in readiness as soon as you release me.

The CHAIRMAN. So your plans are to go forward at once as soon as we are completed?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it be agreeable for the committee to sit a little longer today, in view of General Marshall's situation? Of course, we contemplate tomorrow anyway.

Senator BREWSTER. What is your question?

The CHAIRMAN. Would it be agreeable for the committee to sit a little later than 4 o'clock today to accommodate General Marshall, in the hope we might conclude with him tomorrow?

Senator GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, we ought to go on a reasonable length of time. [3040]

Senator BREWSTER. I suggest 4:30.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we will go at least until 4:30.

Go ahead, Senator Lucas.

Senator LUCAS. General Marshall, I should like again to direct your attention to exhibit 32, dealing with the message you sent General Short on November 27, 1941. I will ask you if the same message with the same identical language was not sent to the Commanding General of the Western Defense Command, San Francisco, Calif?

General MARSHALL. The message is not identical.

Senator LUCAS. Will you point out the difference between the two, sir?

General MARSHALL. As I get it here in reading it, in the latter part of the message it states, "A separate message is being sent to G-2, 9th Corps Area, re subversive activities in United States. Should hostilities occur you will carry out the tasks assigned in Rainbow 5."

That is a repetition of the message to Hawaii.

Calling attention to the "G-2 of the 9th Corps Area re subversive activities" was not included in the message to General Short.

Senator LUCAS. For all alerting purposes, as far as the commands are concerned, they are the same?

[3041] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, I think this has already been put in the record a time or two, but I should like to have the record show at this point General Short's reply and General DeWitt's reply to those two respective messages.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be printed in the record again at this point.

Received: November 28, 1941. 11:18 PM

From HQ WDC Presidio of San Francisco, Calif.,

To General George C. Marshall

NOVEMBER 28TH.

Report following measures taken as per your radio Nov twenty seven: Your radio paraphrased to Commanding Generals ADC, Second Air Force, Fourth [3042] Air Force, Ninth CAD. Pacific Coastal Frontier Sectors, Ninth Corps Area and Commandants Eleventh Twelfth and Fifteenth Naval Districts. All harbor entrance control posts continuously manner. One gun battery each harbor defense continuously alerted. Protection against sabotage and other subversive activities intensified. Six infy battalions and necessary motor transportation alerted so as to be instantly available to CG NCA to carry out his missions under rainbow five. Constant contact being maintained with corps area and naval district commanders and full cooperation assured. PCF, sector and subsector plans rainbow five practically completed and necessary reconnaissance being made to carry out defense of critical areas. Two rifle companies furnished CG SF P of E for guard duty and one company furnished to CG NCA for internment aliens at Angel Island. Paren in connection this report see my radio to CG GHQ Nov twenty fifth which recommended that WPL five two be extended to include Pacific coast and Japanese vessels and which outlined steps taken by me in preparation therefor. As air forces as well as other Army forces will be involved in the execution of WLP five two or the preparatory stage of rainbow five it is strongly urged that I be authorized to [3043] direct operations of air forces in defense of the PCF or that instructions be issued specifying air action and that I be furnished a copy of such directive. Should hostilities occur this command now ready to carry out tasks assigned in rainbow five so far as they pertain to Japan except for woeful shortage of ammunition and pursuit and bombardment planes which should be made available without delay.

DeWitt, Commanding.

Senator LUCAS. I should like to call your attention also to page 13 of Exhibit 32 which purports to be a message sent out by the Adjutant General Adams, I believe, to the Hawaiian Department on November 28, and directing your attention to the last two lines, the following words (reading): "Telegrams are being sent to all air stations but this does not repeat not affect your responsibility under existing instructions."

In the previous part of that message they have been talking about sabotage, subversive activities. Would you care to explain to the committee what that last portion of that message means, if anything?

General MARSHALL. I am merely hazarding an opinion. I was not aware of the wording of this message at the time [3044] it was sent, or the fact that it was actually sent.

Senator LUCAS. What, in your opinion, did Adams mean?

General MARSHALL. My opinion is he was trying to make certain that this message in no way affects the terms of the command message.

Senator LUCAS. That is the way I construe it.

General MARSHALL. That is undoubtedly what was the intention.

Senator LUCAS. In other words, after Adams talks about subversive activities and he concludes with that statement, which says, "Nothing shall affect your responsibility under existing instructions" you understand that the existing instructions would mean the previous instructions that had been sent out by you in your message of November 27?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; that was a definite alert message and they signed my name to it instead of the Adjutant General's, to make it quite clearly a command message.

This message also, as I believe the witnesses will testify, if they haven't already done so, resulted from the Air Corps activities that concerned all over the world and the Chief of the G-2 section became involved in it, and it ended up with a message not with the signature from G-2 but by the Adjutant General's signature.

Senator LUCAS. Then on the following page, page 14 in [3045] this same exhibit, there is a further message to General Short, and that message is signed by both Arnold and Adams, which continues to deal with sabotage and subversive activities.

Now is there any higher or more important message that can be sent to any command than that sent by the Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; unless the Secretary of War personally signed it or the President.

Senator LUCAS. General Marshall, you were adviser, under the Army rules and regulations, to the Secretary of War as well as the President of the United States upon military matters?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. During your tenure as Chief of Staff it goes without saying that you had many conversations with both of these gentlemen—

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. On the conduct of affairs of this Nation.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. Did the President of the United States have any information about the Japanese situation that the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy or the Chief of Staff or the Chief of Naval Operations did not have?

General MARSHALL. Did not have?

[3046] Senator LUCAS. Did not have.

General MARSHALL. So far as I know, he did not—meaning the President did not.

Senator LUCAS. That is right. In other words, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of Staff, Chief of Naval Operations were in close contact with the President of the United States and the Secretary of State?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. There were incidents such as this—I only remember this one: On the return from Argentina the message actually sent by the President to the Japanese Government did not come to my knowledge until several days later at a meeting in the State Department, in Mr. Sumner Welles' office, when I was informed of the message. So there was a period there of several days that I did not know of that message.

I am not citing that as an abnormal thing at all, but just as an incident.

Senator LUCAS. The usual course was in the other direction?

General MARSHALL. The normal course was in the other direction.

Senator LUCAS. After you saw the message that was sent by Mr. Welles, did you approve it later on?

General MARSHALL. I do not know whether I could express [3047] myself in terms of approval or disapproval. I listened to the message and I do not recall my specific reactions.

Senator LUCAS. Did the President of the United States, in your opinion, have a right to assume that the commands at Hawaii and in the Pacific, California, and Philippines, were properly alerted on the morning of December 7?

General MARSHALL. I think he had every right to assume that.

[3048] Senator LUCAS. One question with respect to the letter that has been introduced, or two letters that have been introduced in evidence, that were written by you to Governor Dewey.

Now, what specific information came to you that Governor Dewey knew that we had cracked the Japanese code?

General MARSHALL. I do not know at the moment that I knew at that time that he specifically had information that we cracked the Japanese code. I know that he made a statement of that character, as I recall, to Colonel Clarke.

Senator LUCAS. What was that last?

General MARSHALL. I know that he made a statement of that character to Colonel Clarke, as I recall, in his interview with him, but there have been other references to the matter here in Washington by various people, and I think one speech on the floor of the House that clearly indicated such a condition of affairs.

Senator LUCAS. Did you believe that he was the proper man to give this information so as to be able to stop the flow of this sort of information?

General MARSHALL. I thought he was the only man with whom I could deal.

Senator LUCAS. It was testified to here by General Miles [3049] that this code secret was known only by a very limited few, and I was just wondering how this information got to Governor Dewey, that he knew you were actually cracking the code.

General MARSHALL. I would qualify General Miles' statement by saying it had come to my ears several times that there were various whisperings in Washington, in the gatherings in the hotels and otherwise, dinners, that such things were happening. Specifically, there was very dangerous whispering regarding the killing of the head of the Japanese Navy, Admiral Yamamoto, who was shot down by a group of Army aviators headed by one Major Lamphier, on the basis of the data we obtained on our intercepts which specified exactly the trip that Yamamoto was going to take.

Senator LUCAS. That was the fellow who said he was going to write the peace in the White House?

General MARSHALL. I haven't the record here, but I believe you are correct. The point there was that the aviators had to be told exactly where to go and what to expect. That, of course, meant to them we must have a means of knowing whether their first discussions came back in the form of mere rumors, but whatever happened, it was so distorted, or so elaborated that it reached Washington [3050] and finally I was called up by a responsible citizen and informed of general statements on the subject based on that particular incident. Other similar things had occurred, so it was well known to me that there had been very careless talk here in Washington.

I might explain now, that I sought the services of the FBI a number of times to check particular Army officers in Washington, in an effort to make an example of somebody.

I might also, for the record, state that Mr. Hoover was very unwilling to do this, because he did not want the FBI investigating Governmental agencies for fear it would be regarded as a Gestapo, so he was always very hesitant about accommodating me, and yet, I felt it was imperative that I have his services. I almost caught the man once or twice, but some little thing intervened, and I was not able to do it.

I might say apropos of that, that the Russians were fearful of telling us anything, because they felt a leak was inevitable, and it reached the point where I was very much afraid that we would be embarrassed with them most seriously because of some leak affecting their campaign. Therefore, I instructed our officers on the mission in Moscow never to ask when an operation was going to be carried out, or when, or where, because I did not want to be responsible [3051] for the possible leaks of that information, and I so informed the Russians.

Senator LUCAS. Well, your only thought in drafting this letter at that particular time was for the sole purpose of winning this war at the earliest possible time and the saving of American lives?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator LUCAS. This would be, of course, a guess upon your part, but without the cracking of the Japanese code in the way that we did, without the knowledge that came to us of their ship movements, and their convoys, would you care to hazard a guess as to how much longer it would have taken us to defeat the Japs?

General MARSHALL. I wouldn't want to involve myself in that estimate except to say that it could be operated in two ways. One, it would have made the operation much more difficult to stage, and also would have made it necessary, probably, at the time for us not to undertake certain things because we did not know enough about the Japanese dispositions, capabilities, and intentions. With positive knowledge, we were then free in our operations.

I tried to give you an illustration in relation to going into Korea where we could not obtain the shipping sufficient for the number of troops first thought necessary [3052] to a landing in Korea, which was September 28. However, when we picked up the messages from the Japanese commander, who was earnestly hoping that American troops would arrive at the earliest possible date, they sent in a small command with perfect assurance that it would not be complicated by Japanese resistance.

The same considerations permitted our moving into Japan with a little dribble of people at the very start. We had the same information regarding the Japanese forces in China.

To go back into the active operations in the war, we found out what they were aiming to do, and what they had to do it with, and that left us free to make moves that we otherwise would not have attempted.

I might say that, of course, we always had to be very careful to check, because you never could tell at what moment that would boomerang. It would be the inevitable procedure of the other government, if they knew their business, and they suddenly discovered we had cracked their code and were picking up their information, to endeavor to capitalize on that, to lead us into a ruinous situation.

For example, the information which we received which led up to the appropriate disposition of the fleet and the accumulation of aircraft to fight the Battle of Midway, [3053] where our means were very limited, where, I believe, we only had the equivalent of one carrier and a half, and where we knew from magic that the Japanese were coming in with, I believe, five carriers, our relief was profound when planes of ours located the Japanese columns of ships moving to the east of Wake, because it meant the confirmation of what was in magic.

I might say, though it hasn't any importance to this hearing, that we were very much disturbed because one Japanese unit gave Midway as its post office address, and that seemed a little bit too thick, so when the ships actually appeared it was a great relief, because if we had been deceived, and our limited number of vessels were there, and the Japanese approached at some other point, they would have met no opposition whatsoever. And those vessels that went to Midway had to virtually race from the Coral Sea to arrive in the Midway district in time.

I believe one carrier had been damaged at Midway—they made hurried repairs, superficial repairs, and rushed her up into Midway. Admiral Halsey's ships had to steam at top speed in order to reach the Battle of Midway in time. I think he got there the first day or maybe on the day of the battle.

All of that was based on magic.

[3054] Senator LUCAS. General Marshall, no doubt you are familiar with the Army board's report.

General MARSHALL. I haven't read it, sir.

Senator LUCAS. You haven't read it?

General MARSHALL. I have had a hard enough time reading these other papers.

Senator LUCAS. You have something to look forward to.

General MARSHALL. I have been told the general characterization. That is all I know.

Senator LUCAS. Are you acquainted with Gen. George Grunert?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I have known him for years.

Senator LUCAS. What position did he hold when war broke out?

General MARSHALL. When the war broke out?

Senator LUCAS. December 7, 1941.

General MARSHALL. He was in command of the Philippines. When the war broke out?

Senator LUCAS. December 7, 1941, yes.

General MARSHALL. I think he was commanding an Army Corps back here in the United States.

Senator LUCAS. Do you remember what happened to him after that?

General MARSHALL. I believe he was given command of [3055] the corps area in Chicago.

I am not quite certain of that. I know that he became, I think, the head of personnel of the Army Service Forces under General Somervell and finally he was given the Eastern Defense Command with headquarters at Governors Island.

[3056] Senator LUCAS. He did not serve overseas in the war?

General MARSHALL. He was overseas up until the summer of 1941.

Senator LUCAS. Who is Maj. Gen. Henry D. Russell?

General MARSHALL. He is the officer of the National Guard from North Carolina who commanded the Thirtieth Division.

Senator LUCAS. Is he retired now?

General MARSHALL. Until recently he was on duty on some board here in Washington, I think.

Senator GEORGE. North Carolina or Georgia, General?

General MARSHALL. Well, Senator George, if you say Georgia, I will say Georgia. It was the Thirtieth Division though, was it not?

Senator GEORGE. Originally he may have been from North Carolina but he has been in Georgia for quite a long time.

Senator LUCAS. Did he command the Thirtieth Division overseas?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. In this country.

Senator LUCAS. General Frank?

General MARSHALL. General Frank is an Air Corps officer.

Senator LUCAS. General Marshall, in this Army report, in the conclusions, they laid responsibility for the Pearl Harbor disaster to a lot of folks.

General MARSHALL. General Handy, the Deputy Chief of Staff, told me orally what they had referred to in regard to him.

[3057] Senator LUCAS. After talking about Mr. Hull and its conclusion they then turn to the Chief of the Army, General George Marshall and in this report they say:

He failed in his relations with the Hawaiian Department in the following particulars:

(a) To keep the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department fully advised of the growing tenseness of the Japanese situation which indicated an increasing necessity for better preparation for war, of which information he had an abundance and Short had little.

Would you care to expand on that statement, General?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I think I will rest on the evidence that I believe has been submitted here.

Senator LUCAS. I presume that is true with all of these statements that they have made?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator LUCAS. I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Congressman Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY. General Marshall, there has been a great deal of talk throughout the country about the similarity between what happened at Pearl Harbor and what happened at Port Arthur back some years ago when there was an attack on Russia. I am not a student of military history but from what I have read there seems to be quite a difference.

[3058] Are you familiar with the history of the attack on Port Arthur?

General MARSHALL. I remember, as I recall the incident, it seemed that certain statements of the Japanese Government were delivered in St. Petersburg. There was a night attack made by destroyers, I believe, on Port Arthur.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, I think from what I have read there is a little difference, and I wanted to put it in the record so that we might have what I have discovered in connection with that for this inquiry.

Mr. KEEFE. Are you going to be a witness?

Mr. MURPHY. I am now reading from the Army Pearl Harbor Board report, page 1058, and I am quoting Admiral Pye as follows [reading]:

There are quite a few people who seem to feel that the situation in Honolulu was quite similar to that which existed at the beginning of the Russo-Japanese War, at Port Arthur. I would just like to point out that there were several differences in the situations.

In the first place, even at Port Arthur, the Japanese had broken off diplomatic relations with the Russians, on February 6, two days before the attack at Port Arthur, and, in the letter breaking off those diplomatic relations, they informed the Russian Government that they [3059] reserved the right to take such independent action as they might deem necessary, or words to that effect. In other words, adequate notice was given, both of the fact that the negotiations were at an end, and that the Japanese Government intended to take independent action.

The second great difference was, that the Japanese, in order to obtain their objective, had to land in Korea, or in the vicinity of Port Arthur. The only forces which could oppose these landings effectively were the Russian ships in Port Arthur and at Chinnampo.

So much for that.

Now, then, there has been reference made, General Marshall, to your trip to the South for maneuvers and I would like to have you for the record, so that we might have the facts on that, refer to your report covering the period from July 1, 1941 to June 30, 1943.

As I understand it, you reported at page 2 as follows [reading]:

During the summer of 1941, large battle rehearsals continued which included maneuvers in August, September, and November of some 900,000 troops.

And I inquire now whether your visit to the South in the month of November was to attend one of those three maneuvers?

General MARSHALL. That was its purpose. I might add— [3060] I do not know as it is at all pertinent to the investigation—that the maneuvers presented my best opportunity to determine command ability and I had to arrive there at the time of the maneuver because the whole thing was very carefully programmed in relation to other movements in other parts of the country and transportation and so on.

On this particular trip the good roads in North Carolina offered facilities for covering the country, which made it a much more difficult proposition than in some of the other points that they were having maneuvers and I would see less and the prospects were I would see more.

As a result of that particular trip I made several decisions. One was for the relief of three or four officers, two, I have in mind particularly, from command and assignment to other duties and the other was the decision to advance General Patton to corps command.

Mr. MURPHY. Thank you.

I now would like to read, Mr. Chairman, from page 3 of the same report as follows [reading]:

Since 1935 the Hawaiian Islands, having been given first priority, had been provided with more complete troop garrisons and munitions than any other overseas garrison. It now became imperative that the defenses of the Panama Canal and Alaska be given immediate prior- [[3061] Also, the uncertainty of the European situation involving the peril of the British Isles and the British Fleet made it urgently necessary for us to secure the defenses of the Western Hemisphere by establishing air bases and defensive garrisons throughout the Caribbean and in Newfoundland. With our limited means the situation developed into a problem of priorities in attempting to meet these requirements, and it was not until February 1941 that additional aircraft, antiaircraft, and other items of modern equipment could be shipped to the Hawaiian Islands. A little later the first shipments of modern aircraft were made to the Philippines and the Philippine Scout organization was doubled in strength, drawing the necessary personnel from the trained cadres of the new Philippine Army. The fighter planes secured for these purposes were largely obtained by stripping the limited number of squadrons then in training in the United States.

In July 1941 the development of quantity production made it possible for the first time to assign modern matériel in sizable lots to the Philippines. On August 28 the first flights of Flying Fortresses were started across the Pacific via Midway and Wake Islands and thence south through Rabaul, Port Moresby, or Port Darwin, and [[3062] north to the Philippines. By the first week in November some 35 Fortresses had completed this trip. A gap in airplane deliveries from the factory combined with adverse winds between San Francisco and Hawaii prevented the ferrying of an additional 48 Fortresses prior to the attack on Pearl Harbor.

At that point, General Marshall, I recall your testimony relative to the difficulties of the ships leaving the west coast in the direction of Hawaii and their problem of having sufficient gas.

Are you prepared to testify, or should we ask General Arnold, whether or not having made the long distance from the west coast to Hawaii the very ships themselves, I mean the planes, would have sufficient gas in order to engage in any kind of combat?

General MARSHALL. I think under the conditions under which they operated then they would not, but General Arnold is the appropriate witness.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, then, I would also like to ask whether or not you received this telegram, General Marshall—and then I will go on—whether or not on August 30 you received a telegram from General MacArthur reading as follows:

I wish to express my personal appreciation for the splendid support that you and the entire War Department [[3063] have given me along every line since the formation of this command. With such backing the development of a completely adequate defense force will be rapid.

General MARSHALL. That is an excerpt from a message to me.

Mr. MURPHY. From General MacArthur.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator BREWSTER. Would you give the date of that message?

Mr. MURPHY. August 30.

Senator BREWSTER. Nineteen—

Mr. MURPHY. 1941. Page 4 of General Marshall's report.

In questioning you, General Marshall, counsel asked you whether or not you had any information of a Jap implementing message up to December 7. I would like to make it a little bit clearer and ask you whether or not you had any knowledge of the existence of any Jap implementing message to the winds code up to the time of the attack on Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. I did not.

Mr. MURPHY. You also testified that you had an orderly at your home at Fort Myer whose purpose it was to get phone messages and the like. Did you have that orderly on duty before December 7?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, I had him—I speak of him [3064] as one person, it was one of three or four—for about a year before that and continued it about a year after that and as the War Department became more fully organized I had an arrangement whereby all calls were diverted to the office of the Secretary of the General Staff.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, then, do you have any information of any attempt to locate you at your home by telephone or messenger on the evening of December 6 or the morning of December 7 prior to the call which you received while you were taking your shower?

General MARSHALL. I am unaware of any such message to contact me.

Mr. MURPHY. Then, as I understand it, from the time you received that call to the time you actually got to our office was a period of some 20 minutes?

General MARSHALL. I believe I said it generally took me about 10 minutes to bathe and dress. I can only make an assumption in the matter but I think I proceeded directly to the office.

Mr. MURPHY. General Marshall, did you at any time ever hear, up to this very day, of any American having any information, specific information that an attack would be made on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941?

General MARSHALL. What do you mean by "specific information"? [3065]

Mr. MURPHY. Well, there is talk—

General MARSHALL. I might intervene to say we had pretty much everything attacked.

Mr. MURPHY. Knowledge to the effect that the Japanese were actually going to make an attack.

General MARSHALL. I am unaware of such.

Mr. MURPHY. Have you any personal knowledge, General, of how much information General MacArthur might have had from Jap intercepts, which knowledge was not available to General Short?

General MARSHALL. I do not know that. I have learned that Admiral Hart had facilities which Admiral Kimmel, I think, did not have.

Mr. MURPHY. And the Admiral Hart who had the facilities and who was then the commander of the Naval forces at Manila is presently a United States Senator from Connecticut, isn't he?

General MARSHALL. That is the same man.

Mr. MURPHY. And in Washington. Well, you wouldn't know whether he was in Washington or not, I mean today.

Now, then, General——

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, would the reporter read the last remark?

[3066] Mr. MURPHY. I said he would not know whether Admiral Hart was in Washington or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if it is of any value, this information, I can tell you he is here today.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, it may or may not become pertinent at a later stage of this inquiry.

General, in giving your opinion as to the ability of the force at Hawaii to meet the Japanese attack, did you take into consideration only the Army forces out there or did you also include all the forces the Navy had there, including their PBY's?

General MARSHALL. I was including the naval potential also.

Mr. MURPHY. Had you any warning, General, or any reason to expect on the night of December 6 or on the early morning of December 7 that there was any special urgency requiring you to be at the War Department earlier than the hour you did arrive there on the morning of December 7?

General MARSHALL. I had no such conception or information.

Mr. MURPHY. Did you at any time prior to December 7 ever have anyone tell you that the fleet, the United States Fleet in the Pacific ocean, was not able to take care of itself in the event of an attack?

[3067] General MARSHALL. I do not think I ever did, sir. I had heard a discussion by Admiral Richardson as to the requirements that the fleet had to have to be built up before taking out to sea and be properly supplied.

Mr. MURPHY. I have no other questions, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 4:35 p. m., December 7, 1945, an adjournment was taken until 10 a. m., Saturday, December 8, 1945.)

[3068]

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION OF THE HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The Joint Committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., in the Caucus Room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, General Counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[3069] The VICE CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

The Chairman is detained for a few moments. We will continue.

Does counsel have anything to present at this time before General Marshall resumes his testimony?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

The VICE CHAIRMAN. General Marshall, do you have anything that you want to bring to the attention of the committee before you resume your testimony?

General MARSHALL. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I would like to present two items in the record regarding my testimony yesterday which are incorrect statements as recorded. Is that permissible?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. You may proceed.

General MARSHALL. On page 2994, the next to the last sentence reads: "I came to the conclusion that the matter was so important that we must make it a matter of record, and I sent Colonel Clarke", and so forth.

I was referring to the discussion I had preliminarily to sending a second letter to Governor Dewey. The first five words on line 24, "it a matter of record" should have read "another effort", so the sentence would read: "I came to [3070] the conclusion that the matter was so important that we must make another effort, and I sent Colonel Clarke".

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That correction will be made.

General MARSHALL. Two pages further on, 2996, line 4, the sentence reads: "Colonel Clarke returned to Washington and reported to me that the Governor had read the letter, had discussed it with Mr. Bell in the presence of Colonel Clarke——." That is not a correct statement.

Line 4 should read, "with Mr. Bell but not in the presence of Colonel Clarke".

The VICE CHAIRMAN. That correction will be made, General. Is there anything further, sir?

General MARSHALL. Nothing further.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The committee has heard with profound sorrow that Senator Brewster's father passed away last night. Necessarily the Senator is absent this morning. The committee extends him its deepest sympathy in this time of bereavement.

Senator Brewster would next be entitled to recognition, and of course being unable to be present the Chair recognizes Congressman Gearhart of California, who will now inquire.

Mr. GEARHART. General Marshall, I regret the necessity of your being delayed in leaving for the Orient, and I regret especially that I must share a part of the blame for detaining you here, and for that reason I will make my cross-examination [3071] very, very short.

First I would like to inquire, what was the over-all desire of the Army and Navy during the months of October and November and first part of December in reference to delaying or accelerating the commencement of war with any nation?

General MARSHALL. It was our great desire, speaking specifically for the Army, but I am certain with naval agreement, the agreement of Admiral Stark, to delay in every way the possibility of our being involved in war.

Mr. GEARHART. The reason for that was that we were improving our defensive and striking capacity very rapidly under our preparedness program of the moment?

General MARSHALL. That, of course, was a prime factor, Mr. Congressman, but it goes a little further than that. Naturally it was our hope that we could avoid a war, but also, as a purely military proposition, it would be highly undesirable, if involved in war, that it should be on two fronts in widely separated parts of the world, and more specifically, that it should develop in the Pacific, where we knew the British had very little available means to resist aggressive action by the Japanese.

The British situation, or that of the British Empire, was so serious as to deficiency in men and matériel, particularly in planes at that time, and in naval shipping, which [3072] was engaged in the effort to keep the Atlantic lanes open for convoys from this country, carrying lend-lease supplies which were vital to the successful defense they were then laboring under, that if they became involved in war in the Pacific they were almost bound to weaken themselves in the Atlantic, meaning in Great Britain, at a time when the Germans were exceedingly strong.

So a war on two fronts was to be avoided, if it was at all possible to do so. War was to be avoided by us in our own view, if we could manage it, and every effort was to be made to gain us time in case war became inevitable.

Mr. GEARHART. And it was your belief, Admiral Stark concurring, that if the war with Japan could be delayed long enough, that our might and power would grow so great that Japan probably would be dissuaded from attacking us?

General MARSHALL. I have a very distinct recollection of my own reactions at the time. I thought if we once had accumulated approximately 100 4-engine bombers in the Philippines the Japanese could not dare to attempt to move to the south of the Philippines, or to make a naval attack on the Philippines, that is, to support a landing. I had great confidence in the potential threat involved in a large concentration of heavy bombers.

I might add that at that time no such concentration had [3073] ever been made before in the history of war, I think, and although now we think in terms of thousands, at that time 100 was a very large figure.

So we were making every conceivable effort to present in the Philippines to the Japanese a concentration of air power that they would not dare hazard active operations to the south in the China Sea or directly against the Philippine Islands themselves.

Mr. GEARHART. Admiral Stark shared those views with you, did he not?

General MARSHALL. That was my understanding, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. You and he took advantage of every opportunity to call the necessity for delayed action to the attention of the President and the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, did you not?

General MARSHALL. And the Secretary of State. Admiral Stark, as I believe I testified earlier in my appearance here, which, of course, he can give you authentic evidence on, desired in the discussions with Mr. Hull that, or stated, I believe, that February 1st was the essential date for the Navy in order that they might be able to make the completion of the Fleet's requirements. I hazarded in early September, as I recall, that if we obtained the ships and delivery of planes, that we might or should be ready by December 5 to an extent [3074] that would probably deter the Japanese from making an attack.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, during the month of November large convoys, men and materiel were moving towards the Philippines and you had plans for still larger convoys to be moving in that direction for the month of December?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Of 1941.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, convoys were leaving San Francisco as the bombs began to fall in Hawaii; is that not true?

General MARSHALL. I did not hear the question.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, convoys were moving out of San Francisco at the time the bombs began to fall?

General MARSHALL. I think that is correct; I also know that a large slow convoy had been headed south toward Torres Strait and was somewhere between Samoa and Hawaii at the time of the outbreak of war.

Mr. GEARHART. In line with your and Admiral Stark's desire to gain time, you jointly prepared a statement which you sent to the President on November 5?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. And the gist of that document was an appeal to the President to use his good offices and the good offices [3075] of our Government to prevent an outbreak of war with Japan for the time being?

General MARSHALL. I think that in general is a correct statement.

Mr. GEARHART. Did you or Admiral Stark, in your presence and hearing, protest at any time to Secretary Hull the sending of his message, the handing of his message of November 26 to the Japanese Envoys?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of such protest.

Mr. GEARHART. Did you know in advance of the handing of that message to the Japanese that Mr. Hull was contemplating the preparation of such a document?

General MARSHALL. I think I knew he was contemplating the preparation of such a document. I did not know the time and actual date of the document.

Mr. GEARHART. Did you, in any words, written or oral, urge him not to take that step?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of such action.

Mr. GEARHART. When did you first hear that he had handed such a note as the one which bears the date of November 26 to the Japanese Envoys?

General MARSHALL. I have not a clear recollection regarding that. I imagine it was on November 27, or 28th for me, because I was absent on the 27th.

[3076] Mr. GEARHART. You were a member of the so-called War Cabinet of the President?

General MARSHALL. I don't believe I could be considered a member of the Cabinet, but I sat in at the meetings of that group on most occasions.

Mr. GEARHART. Wasn't there an organization informally known as the President's War Cabinet consisting of the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of Navy, the Secretary of State and the two Joint Chiefs of Staff?

General MARSHALL. That group met in that form on several occasions. What I mean is that the military, I don't believe, would be considered part of the Cabinet, though we were a part of the meeting.

Mr. GEARHART. I will ask you if Secretary Hull, prior to the 26th day of November and prior to his handing the note to the Japanese, informed you and the other members of that so-called War Cabinet of his intention to hand a document at that time to the Japanese?

General MARSHALL. May I have the first part of the question?

[the question was read by the reporter]:

General MARSHALL. He made, Mr. Hull, that is, made several general statements in regard to whether or not further diplomatic efforts would be practical, but the actual action [3077] that he took at that time I do not recall he stated in my presence.

Mr. GEARHART. You do not know whether he read the message to you prior to its delivery to the Japanese Envoys?

General MARSHALL. I do not think he did.

Mr. GEARHART. Did he read it to you, or was a copy placed in your hands, immediately after he delivered it to the Japanese?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. But nevertheless you and Admiral Stark on November 27, the very next day, addressed a memorandum to the President in which you again urged upon the President, as the most essential thing, the necessity of gaining time.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Was that joint message from the Joint Chiefs of Staff to the President inspired by the action of the Secretary of State in handing the message of November 26 to the Japanese?

General MARSHALL. I have not a clear recollection on that, Mr. Gearhart. I couldn't tell you, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. All right.

General MARSHALL. I certainly haven't an affirmative reaction of what the Secretary of State said he was going to do that caused us to take that particular action. We [3078] took it, but possibly Admiral Stark can remember more clearly than I can. I do not recall all the circumstances of it.

Mr. GEARHART. I will read you, for the purpose of refreshing your memory a paragraph from the pamphlet entitled "Peace and War, U. S. Foreign Policy, 1931-41,"¹ the paragraph which appears on page 138:

On November 28 at a meeting of high officials of this Government, Secretary Hull emphasized the critical nature of the relations of this country with Japan. He stated that there was no possibility of agreement being achieved with Japan, that in his opinion the Japanese were likely to break out at any time with new acts of conquest by force, and that the matter of safeguarding our national security was in the hands of the Army and the Navy.

Are you familiar with that?

General MARSHALL. My recollection is roughly that, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Then, the Secretary on the 25th told you and the other members composing this so-called war cabinet that there was no chance of obtaining an agreement, and that the matter was in the hands of the Army and Navy at that time?

General MARSHALL. I think that is correct.

Mr. GEARHART. Isn't that the reason why you and Admiral Stark immediately devoted your attention to preparing the [3079] memorandum of November 27 for the President?

General MARSHALL. That may be, sir. I don't recall exactly the conditions under which we wrote that memorandum.

Mr. GEARHART. Going on and reading further in the same paragraph:

The Secretary expressed his judgment that any plans for our military defense should include an assumption that the Japanese might make the element of surprise a central point in their strategy, and also might attack at various points simultaneously with a view to demoralizing efforts of defense and coordination.

Do you remember his speaking to you to that effect?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of such detail. I testified yesterday to a very distinct recollection of Mr. Hull saying at one of those meetings, one of the last, "These fellows mean to fight; you will have to be prepared."

Mr. GEARHART. And to refresh your memory in respect to your having read this pamphlet at some time, or having had conversations in December or November of 1941, let me read one further paragraph from this pamphlet I have in my hands, the succeeding paragraph to that which I just read:

On November 29, 1941, Secretary Hull conferred with the British Ambassador. The Secretary said that "the diplomatic [3080] part of our relations with Japan were virtually over and that the matter will now go to the officials of the Army and the Navy."

Have you any comment to make upon that statement of the Secretary of State?

General MARSHALL. I have not, Mr. Gearhart. Incidentally I have never read that pamphlet you are reading from.

Mr. GEARHART. Was it ever called to your attention by anyone who had heard that the Secretary had made that statement?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall anyone bringing it to my attention. I have a vague recollection of it, which I probably obtained from the newspapers.

Mr. GEARHART. Quoting further from the same page:

He said further that it would be "a serious mistake for our country and other countries interested in the Pacific situation to make plans of resistance without including the possibility that Japan may move suddenly, and with every possible element of surprise and spread out over considerable areas and capture certain positions and posts before the peaceful countries interested in the Pacific would have time to confer and formulate plans to meet these new conditions; that this would be on the theory that the Japanese recognized that their course of unlimited conquest now renewed all along [3081] the line probably is a desperate gamble and requires the utmost boldness and risks."

Do you remember having heard that from any one of the Secretary having so expressed himself to the British Ambassador?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. But you did feel from that which he had to say that war was imminent and you felt also in harmony with the Chief of Naval Operations that everything should be done to delay the commencement of hostilities?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir. My understanding from the Secretary of State was that the situation was most critical, using the word "most" in its accurate meaning, that these "fellows" meaning the Japanese, intended to fight, and that we must be prepared. That is a pretty complete estimate of the situation.

Mr. GEARHART. In your memorandum to the President of November 27, 1941, written just after you had heard of the President's message which he had handed the Japanese envoys in Washington, you commenced by using these words:

If the current negotiations end without agreement Japan may attack: the Burma Road; Thailand; Malaya; the Netherlands East Indies; the Philippines; the Russian Maritime Provinces.

[3082] There is little probability of an immediate Japanese attack on the Maritime Provinces because of the strength of the Russian forces. Recent Japanese troop movements all seem to have been southward.

As a matter of fact, General, wasn't it your opinion, and wasn't it the opinion of Admiral Stark and all of the high-ranking naval and military officers with whom you were in conversation, that the Japanese attack was going to come to the Far East and that there was no thought of it coming at Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Our thought at the time—my thought specifically—was that the Japanese were engaged in a campaign southward from the China Sea, that that would be their operation. I assumed that Guam would be captured. I assumed that Wake Island would be taken, though there was a little less probability there than there was as regards Guam, because while the fleet was still in full being, the American Fleet, Wake, I would assume, would be a more difficult task for the Japanese.

We had in mind the possibility of an effort on the Panama Canal. We had in mind the possibility of an effort to strike a blow at our air plants in Seattle, at our air plants in San Diego, and we had in mind the possibility of a blow in the Central Pacific, in the Hawaiian district.

[3083] We thought the latter was the most improbable.

Mr. GEARHART. What was the latter?

General MARSHALL. The attack against the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. GEARHART. You thought that was improbable?

General MARSHALL. I said the most improbable.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, in the opinion of the people with whom you were in daily conversation, both naval and military, Pearl Harbor was considered impregnable, was it not?

General MARSHALL. Do you mean by that, Mr. Gearhart, it was impracticable as a naval base, or impracticable as a Japanese objective?

Mr. GEARHART. Why did we build it?

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

General MARSHALL. Did you say impracticable?

Mr. GEARHART. Impregnable.

General MARSHALL. I didn't understand.

Mr. GEARHART. We built it as a defense against possible trouble with Japan; isn't that right?

General MARSHALL. Yes. I thought you used the word "impracticable." We thought it was impregnable against a Japanese landing expedition.

Mr. GEARHART. As a matter of fact, you were so convinced [3084] of that you wrote in 1940 in your aide memoire the following words:

The Island of Oahu, due to its fortification, its garrison, and its physical characteristics, is believed to be the strongest fortress in the world.

General MARSHALL. I didn't write that. It was prepared for me. At the time I think it was a correct statement.

Also in the memorandum the implication is: when we get all the various arrangements there.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, referring to your warning message which was sent in slightly different forms to Manila, Hawaii, Panama, and other places, that warning message required the addressees to report to you, didn't it?

General MARSHALL. Required—

Mr. GEARHART. The addressees to report to you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. What they had done in response to your directions?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. General Short reported that he had taken steps in accordance with your part of your directions against sabotage, in his message of November 28?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3085] Mr. GEARHART. You received that report, did you not?

General MARSHALL. I testified in regard to that, sir. The presumption is I did. The War Department received it and the presumption is that I read it.

Mr. GEARHART. Don't you remember whether or not you received such a message of that kind?

General MARSHALL. I do not remember, as I testified, and I did not initial the report.

Mr. GEARHART. What did you say?

General MARSHALL. I do not remember, as I testified, and I did not initial the report.

Mr. GEARHART. You heard, or were you present in this room when General Gerow testified and accepted full responsibility for not having acted on the inadequacy, as he called it, of this report?

General MARSHALL. I was not present in the room and I admire very much his attitude.

Mr. GEARHART. I, too, thought it was very generous, but prior to November 28 you had issued a directive to General Gerow and to General Miles, did you not, directing them to send you not only the reports on the messages that they received but to send you the material itself, had you not?

General MARSHALL. The message reads:

[3086] Negotiations with Japan appear to be terminated to all practical purposes with only the barest possibilities that the Japanese Government might come back and offer to continue. Japanese future action unpredictable but hostile action possible at any moment. If hostilities cannot repeat cannot be avoided the United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act. This policy should not, repeat not, be construed as restricting you to a course of action that might jeopardize your defense. Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary but these measures should be carried out so as not, repeat not, to alarm civil population or disclose intent. Report measures taken. Should hostilities occur you will carry out the tasks assigned in Rainbow Five so far as they pertain to Japan. Limit dissemination of this highly secret information to minimum essential officers.

[Signed] MARSHALL.

Mr. GEARHART. That is correct, but that is not an answer to the question, though, that I propounded to you, General.

My question was, did you not, prior to November 28, issue a directive to General Gerow and General Miles—

[3087] General MARSHALL. General Gerow?

Mr. GEARHART (continuing). Where you accepted their evaluations on the messages they intercepted but also to send the material along as well?

General MARSHALL. Oh, I misunderstood you, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield?

General MARSHALL. That was, I believe, in the month of August, Mr. Gearhart.

Mr. GEARHART. You understand the question, don't you?

General MARSHALL. I think so. In the month of August are you referring to?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes, in the month of August, that they send the messages and their evaluations, if any, along with them?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Your reason for making that directive to the two generals was because you wanted to see yourself what was being intercepted and what messages were being received?

General MARSHALL. That, quite evidently, was my reason.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, can you give any reason now why you did not take exception yourself to the message of General Short's of November 28?

[3088] General MARSHALL. I can only say, sir, that that was my opportunity to intervene and have a further check made and I did not take it. Just why I do not know.

Mr. GEARHART. You expected immediate attention to be given to your message of November 27 by the various addressess to whom you sent it, didn't you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. That was a command direction for alert against a state of war.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes. Did you expect General Short to take immediate action?

General MARSHALL. I did, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Then will you explain how he could have taken immediate action and ordered a No. 3 alert instantly without creating alarm among the people and disclosing the intention of the United States?

General MARSHALL. I think he could have, sir. We had done such things before out there. We had done it the previous summer. There are a good many ways to get at that.

The reconnaissance, for example by air over water—that was a naval directive responsibility—could not in any way have alarmed the population. The other matters in regard to planes and, presumably, ships, it seems to me, would have not alarmed the population.

The issue where the people came most closely in contact [3089] with the military might be as a change of attitude related to sabotage because that required the posting of a great many detachments in order to avoid action being taken.

I would like to say, in regard to this right now, it was necessary, we felt, specifically necessary, to include that particular direction regarding the public, both as to Hawaii and as to the west coast, because it was the strong desire of, I will say, the War Cabinet, certainly of the Army and Navy officials and I am quite certain of the President of the United States, that the Japanese be given no opportunity whatever to claim that we had taken some overt act which forced a state of war upon them.

The feeling was—I am now speaking as Chief of Staff only, from the point of view I could obtain as Chief of Staff—the feeling was at that time that if the Japanese could have created a situation, however unjustified, however illogical, in which they could have led at least a portion of the people to believe that our overt action had forced them into an act of war and we would have had a divided country, which would have been a terrible tragedy in a war situation.

Therefore, each move we made had to be taken carefully into account to avoid the possibility that the Japanese would instantly make a claim that we had forced the issue, that we had really made the overt act and they were forced to fight [3090] us.

Mr. GEARHART. In reply to that I entirely agree with you.

General MARSHALL. May I finish my statement, sir?

Mr. GEARHART. I entirely agree with you.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the General finish his answer.

General MARSHALL. At that time there was a very—I believe this is correct—divided opinion in this country and of course, the people generally could not know all the inside facts which we had obtained from one source or another about the very aggressive acts that the Japanese were carrying out in the Far East.

So we labored in this state of peace, in this state of normalcy; and, as for example, in Hawaii, in this state of not being able to check them up, for instance, through the phone service and things of that sort, in this state of having to allow them to send any information they wished back to their own country, we labored constantly under the obligation that we must have no act committed by one of our officers that would permit the Japanese to claim that we had started the war, and, therefore, would to that extent for the time being at least have left us with a divided people on a tragic issue.

Therefore, it was necessary to omit, that those messages [3091] to the west coast and the message to the Hawaiian Islands must have a proviso in them of that character.

Mr. GEARHART. I agree with you entirely, General. That was a tremendously important consideration and to further emphasize the arguments that you have made, the Constitution of the United States provides that war shall be declared only by the Congress of the United States. If you took any other steps it would have been in violation of the Constitution which all of us have taken an oath to uphold. I am just as firm in my agreement with you as I possibly could be on that necessity that you speak of.

What I am talking about now is whether or not the message of General Short's was in line with what should have been done under the circumstances and because of the very reasons that you have cited. "We must not alarm the people or give the Japanese the opportunity to say that we started the war."

General MARSHALL. I gathered the impression from your question, sir, that you thought or were implying that the message was impractical of execution.

Mr. GEARHART. No—oh, yes, that may be touched upon, too. I may be touching upon that, too, for the reasons you have outlined so well.

Now, if General Short had placed the Army on a No. 3 [3092] alert immediately upon receiving your message, that would have required him to fill the air with airplanes, it would have required every soldier on the island to put on a steel helmet and side arms, would it not, and appear on the streets in full war regalia?

General MARSHALL. Not necessarily appear on the streets in full war regalia and not necessarily fill the air with planes because deep reconnaissance takes off from the field and goes out over the water. It might be circling over the city, it might be on a training maneuver of any kind. It is not flying all the time; and the pursuit and interceptor planes did not need to take the air; quite the contrary. They needed to be armed and equipped and the pilots ready.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, that is exactly what happened when they had a No. 3 alert, isn't it?

General MARSHALL. I don't know what moment they went on the No. 3 alert and I would also like to say, Mr. Gearhart, that I had never seen his various alert messages and they did not arrive here in this country until January.

Mr. GEARHART. Wouldn't the No. 3 alert require the men to take up battle positions immediately on the island?

General MARSHALL. It would, yes, sir. I presume that was a No. 3 alert. I have not got the details here before me. General Short can testify about that.

[3093] Mr. GEARHART. That would have required trucks with men with helmets and rifles to ride out to the battle positions from the barracks in which they were then living?

General MARSHALL. Presumably so, yes, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. In other words, the sudden ordering of a No. 3 alert would have created a tremendous condition on the island that would have alarmed the civilian population on the island.

General MARSHALL. It seems to me that a No. 3 alert, whatever its exact details were, could have been carried out with certain modifications to attain the general result desired.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. A No. 2 alert would have been a defense against air attacks and surface and submarine attacks. They did not need a No. 3. A No. 2 would have made it.

Mr. GEARHART. Either 2 or 3.

General MARSHALL. I was not referring to 1, 2, or 3. That was the function of the commanding general in the Hawaiian Department.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes. Now, when we have maneuvers over there, and we have had them for 30 or 40 years, the [3094] public mind was always prepared for the event, was it not, by prior announcements and by notices, so that they would not become alarmed at the display of military power?

General MARSHALL. I am not the best witness on that. General Herron and possibly General Short himself can testify as to that, and other commanders.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, I—

General MARSHALL. You are asking me, sir, for the details of the condition of a command by the individual responsible for that command?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

General MARSHALL. There were commands all over the Pacific, there were commands in this country and there were commands in the Caribbean.

Mr. GEARHART. Yes.

General MARSHALL. I was not familiar with the detailed execution of their plans any more than I was familiar with General MacArthur's plans. I had given certain general directives and as general officers in a responsible position in the outpost he was carrying the duties out.

I testified, for example, the other day to an incident illustrative of that, that we only learned through magic his procedure of unloading at night and taking other measures to keep the Japanese in the dark as to what was going on.

[3095] It is impractical and there are no means in Washington to know all the details of the execution of commands by a higher officer who is given the responsibility of carrying out a defense for air or certain operations.

Mr. GEARHART. At the present time you do not remember that you had or voiced any objections or criticism to General Short's report?

General MARSHALL. I know specifically I did not.

Mr. GEARHART. The evidence shows that the 13 parts and the pilot message were received and decoded on December 6, 1941. All this became available on Saturday night. The President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Navy had it, your subordinates Miles and Bratton had it.

How do you explain the fact that none of it was given to your attention on Saturday, December 6, 1941?

General MARSHALL. As I recall—of course, the message itself will show—the first 13 parts were not of the nature of a vital threat as the 14th part. That was a message of direct importance to the Secretary of State and of related importance, of course, to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy who had been collaborating with him in his relationship in the dealings with Japan. The fact of the matter was it was not brought to my attention.

[3096] Mr. GEARHART. Do you now feel that General Short was not entitled to have information of that character to guide him in setting up the degree of alert that it was essential to have done?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, that was my view. He was issued a command and directed to do something. Now, if the directive was so written that he could not understand it, that is a matter for judgment. Once you issue an order, amendments or, you might say, codicils are very dangerous business when it is an operational order. In most instances it is far better to cancel the entire order and start anew. The transmission of information from the G-2, for example, of the War Department to G-2, for example, under General Short is another matter. That is informational and that is not directional.

Mr. GEARHART. Whenever a higher command, say the command in Washington, is in receipt of information of great importance to a commander in the field, it is the obligation of the command having that information either to transmit the information or issue directives in the light of that information, is that not correct?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Was that always done by G-2 and by your War Plans Division?

General MARSHALL. Are you referring to this incident or [3097] the whole course of the war?

Mr. GEARHART. I am talking about this thick volume of Japanese intercepted messages which throw so much light upon the Japanese attitude toward this country of ours.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Exhibit 2.

General MARSHALL. I presume that in searching through that you will locate messages the sense of which might well have been communicated to General Short. However, the analyses of these messages, particularly as relates to the higher diplomatic operations of the Government, would properly be made here in Washington. It is the only place where all the information was available.

The problem was to keep the commander in the clear, as it were, as to what his action should be and not to confuse it.

I recounted in my testimony, I believe, yesterday and doubted for the moment as to whether the 1 o'clock message of December 7 should be sent out, though it was quickly decided that it was essential that it should go as quickly as possible.

There was another message, for example—no, that does not pertain.

The point, I think, that should be made clear, if possible, is that you must avoid confusing the commander with a [3098] mass of data.

For example, in this particular case, following General Short's assumption of command, as this record shows, there were a series of letters directly between General Short and myself. Those letters gave me the most definite impression of an extreme sensibility to air and submarine attack. They did not give me an impression of a similar sensitivity to sabotage matters.

Now, following that experience I practically never wrote another letter to any commander in the field and confined it purely to the operational directives. I did not write to General Eisenhower, I did not write to General MacArthur, and I did not write to the other commanders virtually at all during the course of the war. I confined myself entirely to the dry directive as to what they were to do.

In this case I gathered the impression from a series of letters which you have in the record, and the directive was issued having that impression, of an essential and understood policy and then the reaction developed, as you have been referring to here, wherein the attention went to sabotage and so on from an air and submarine attack.

Mr. GEARHART. Quite a number of the messages which you caused to be sent and which were sent by subordinates of yours and by Admiral Stark and subordinates of his emphasize [3099] the possibilities of hostilities in Indochina, the Philippines, the Kra Peninsula, Thailand, even Guam, but in no message that you sent did you call especial attention to the fact that Hawaii might be threatened.

General MARSHALL. Because at that time the opinion which we had most definitely in our own minds from the data available—in our own minds from the data available—was the Japanese threat south through the China Sea. We had it by magic. We had it by the actual reconnaissance of convoys, we had it by reports from other officials in Indochina and elsewhere, of very positive action which actually did confirm the main, the principal Japanese campaign.

Mr. GEARHART. What effect do you think it had upon the minds of Admiral Kimmel and General Short as these several messages went over their desks warning of impending war, true, but always centering attention upon the Kra Peninsula, the Philippines, Indochina, Borneo, what effect do you think it had on the minds of these two gentlemen warning them as to war and then always directing their attention to another side of the world? Do you think that there was any belief that Washington thought that Hawaii might be attacked?

General MARSHALL. I cannot say, sir. They were both long experienced in the military considerations. They were men of mature judgments and they were men of high rank and [3100] they were in a position of great responsibility. They knew, certainly, why Hawaii was set up in the military way as it was. They knew the capacity of an enemy to do certain things under certain circumstances. We did not have to tell them that.

Mr. GEARHART. Now, going to your letter which you wrote and had delivered to Governor Dewey, on page 2990 of the transcript, Volume 18, you testified as follows—

General MARSHALL. 90?

Mr. GEARHART. 90, yes. Line 21.

General MARSHALL. 90?

Mr. GEARHART. Yes, 90.

General MARSHALL. What line, please?

Mr. GEARHART. Line 22 [reading]:

The most vital evidence in the Pearl Harbor matter consists of our intercepts of the Japanese diplomatic communications. Over a period of years our cryptograph people analyzed the character of the machine the Japanese were using for encoding their diplomatic messages. Based on this a corresponding machine was built by us which deciphers their messages. Therefore, we possessed a wealth of information regarding their moves in the Pacific, which in turn was furnished the State Department—rather than as is popularly supposed, the [3101] State Department providing us with the information—but which unfortunately made no reference whatever to intentions toward Hawaii until the last message before December 7th, which did not reach our hands until the following day, December 8th.

Is that an entirely correct statement?

General MARSHALL. As to December 8 it was not. It was December 11, apparently, when I saw the messages, I had reference to there. As to the others, after all the files were dug out and the various messages were checked I think it would be proper to say that that was not entirely accurate as to that.

As to my information at the time I dictated this letter—and understand me, Mr. Gearhart, this was dictated in about ten minutes time while I was in the business of conducting the war from the Army side—that was my recollection of an event four years previously without any records of any kind in front of me, so that at that time I thought it was the day after instead of 3 days later that this message was shown to me at my desk. I was unaware of that particular message at any other time.

There were one or two other messages brought to my attention here recently which I was unaware of up to the time they were brought to my attention.

[3102] I would like to say that there is an immense mass of data involved in this and there were an immense number of things going on at this particular time, and at the time of the dictation of this letter we were in the throes of the war. I dictated it, as I say, in about 10 minutes. I had no records before me at the time; it would take quite a while to assemble them.

I think this is reasonably accurate according to my understanding of the facts at the time I dictated the letter.

Mr. GEARHART. You realized that you were assuming a tremendous obligation to convey a true and completely accurate picture of the situation to Governor Dewey when you were assuming to, or when you were asking him to do what was probably very hard for him to consent to do; is that not correct?

General MARSHALL. That is correct. I was thoroughly aware of that but I had been in that predicament almost every month through the war and I just did what seemed to me right and that is the best I could do.

Mr. GEARHART. But now you admit that the statement you made was grossly inadequate in respect to having received no intercept of Japanese messages which pointed directly to Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. I wouldn't say this is grossly inaccurate. I should say the statement as made here is in- [3103] accurate, but only in the matter of three days. It would have no bearing, in general, on the main issue. I made this for the protection of the conduct of our operations by our troops. I did not make it with any regard whatever to a Congressional investigation.

Mr. GEARHART. In order that the record may be complete, I will ask you a rather long question now to which I would like to have your very careful attention. I intend to read from page 12 of exhibit 2, a message from Tokyo to Honolulu dated September 24th, intercepted and decoded on October 9, 1941. "Secretly Secret." [Reading from Exhibit No. 2:]

Henceforth, we would like to have you make reports concerning vessels along the following lines insofar as possible:

1. The waters (of Pearl Harbor) are to be divided roughly into five sub-areas. (We have no objections to your abbreviating as much as you like.)

Area A. Waters between Ford Island and the Arsenal.

Area B. Waters adjacent to the Island south and west of Ford Island. (This area is on the opposite side of the Island from Area A.)

Area C. East Loch.

Area D. Middle Loch.

[3104] Area E. West Loch and the communicating water routes.

2. With regard to warships and aircraft carriers, we would like to have you report on those at anchor, (these are not so important) tried up at wharves, buoys and in docks. (Designate types and classes briefly. If possible we would like to have you make mention of the fact when there are two or more vessels along side the same wharf.)

From Honolulu to Tokyo dated 29 September 1941, decoded October 19, 1941. [Reading:]

Honolulu to Tokyo #178.

Re your #083*

(Strictly secret)

The following codes will be used hereafter to designate the location of vessels:

1. Repair dock in Navy Yard (The repair basin referred to in my message to Washington #48): KS.

2. Navy dock in the Navy Yard (The Ten Ten Pier): KT.

3. Moorings in the vicinity of Ford Island: FV.

4. Alongside in Ford Island: FG, (East and west sides will be differentiated by A and B respectively.

Relayed to Washington, San Francisco.

[3105] There are some markings on it.

I have another message from Tokyo to—

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I should think there ought to be the complete message read.

Mr. GEARHART. Well, in the lower left hand corner is an asterisk.

Mr. MURPHY. And up above "083" and there is a note at the bottom it is not available.

Mr. GEARHART. "Not available" asterisk "available" and then "dated 21 August." Lower down: "JD-1: 5730 23312." Over in the right hand corner, "(D) Trans, 10-10-41 (X)."

1180 CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

Another message from Tokyo (Togo) to Honolulu (Riyoji) 15 November 1941 (reading):

#111

As relations between Japan and the United States are most critical, make your "ships in harbor report" irregular, but at a rate of twice a week. Although you already are no doubt aware, please take extra care to maintain secrecy.

In the lower right hand corner: "(Y) Navy Trans. 12-3-41 (S.)"
In the lower left hand corner: "JD-1: 6091 25644."

Another message from Honolulu (Kita) to Tokyo, November 18, 1941, decoded December 6, 1941, reading as follows:

#222.

[3106] 1. The warships at anchor in the harbor on the 15th were as I told you in my #219a on that day.

Area A^b—A battleship of the Oklahoma class entered and one tanker left port.

Area C^c—3 warships of the heavy cruiser class were at anchor.

2. On the 17th the Saratoga was not in the harbor. The carrier, Enterprise, or some other vessel was in Area C. Two heavy cruisers of the Chicago class, one of the Pensacola class were tied up at docks KS. 4 merchant vessels were at anchor in Area D^d.

3. At 10:00 a. m. on the morning of the 17th, 8 destroyers were observed entering the Harbor. Their course was as follows: In a single file at a distance of 1,000 meters apart at a speed of 3 knots per hour, they moved into Pearl Harbor. From the entrance of the Harbor through Area B to the buoys in Area C, to which they were moored, they changed course 5 times each time roughly 30 degrees. The elapsed time was one hour, however, one of these destroyers entered Area A after passing the water reservoir on the Eastern side.

Please report on the following areas as to vessels, anchored therein: Area "N", Pearl Harbor, Manila Bay—"Manila Bay" is circled by a pen and up to one side "Honolulu" is written—and the Areas Adjacent thereto.

(Make your investigation with great secrecy.)

Lower left-hand corner: "a—Probably means Mamala Bay." What is Mamala Bay? Is that in the Hawaiian Islands?

General MARSHALL. I think it is, sir.

Mr. GEARHART. Lower right-hand corner: "Trans. 12/5/41 (S)."

Lower left-hand corner: "Army 25773."

Another message from Tokyo (Togo) to Honolulu dated November 20, 1941.

Then appear other messages which were translated after the sixth day.

So that it is quite apparent from the reading of those messages that were received, decoded, and placed on your desk, read or not read, that many messages directing the attention of our military and naval authorities to Hawaii had been received, is that not correct?

General MARSHALL. You stated, Mr. Gearhart, as I understand you, that it was quite evident that all those messages were placed on my desk. I have no recollection of that. I have a very definite recollection that the message on page 22 of the same exhibit was the one which I had in mind when I was writing to Governor Dewey. It was from Honolulu (Kita) to Tokyo and bore the December 4th date and it is that Navy [3109] message which was referred to in my testimony yesterday. I had a definite recollection of that particular message, and I have also a very definite recollection it came to my attention after the event and it shows here it was translated on the 11th of December.

The messages which you have just read I had no recollection of whatever at the time. In fact, I first read them in the 2 days when I was getting ready for this hearing here.

[3110] The CHAIRMAN. Are you through, Congressman?

Mr. GEARHART. General, in conclusion, I direct your attention to the report of the Army board. I haven't the official publication, but I have here the publication of the United States News of September 1, 1945. On page 56 of that particular printing, paragraph 2, "The Chief of Staff of the Army, Gen. George C. Marshall, failed in his relations with the Hawaiian Department in the following particulars:

(a) To keep the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department fully advised of the growing tenseness of the Japanese situation which indicated an increasing necessity for better preparation for war, of which information he had an abundance and Short had little.

What have you to say to that?

General MARSHALL. Very much what I have said previously in answer to your question, sir, that we had given General Short a directive to do something which was an alert against the possibility or probability of war. He was a responsible commander; he had a definite task; he had indicated the various concerns he had in regard to that task; they were clear in our minds, and this mass of data which poured in here would normally, I think, merely impose an additional burden on him to undertake the analysis of it, which was [3111] going on at the same time back here.

He had a direction to do something; he had a direction to do something, a command direction for an alert. Now, the question of how much additional information should go to him is a matter of judgment. As a command direction, I think only the December 7 message of 1 p. m. applied.

As to the information which would be passed to his G-2 from the G-2 of the War Department, there is a question of judgment as to how much of that would be desirable.

I would say offhand that the messages you just read to me would have been helpful to General Short, but particularly more so to Admiral Kimmel.

Mr. GEARHART. Reading further from the report:

(b) To send additional instructions to the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department on November 28, 1941, when evidently he failed to realize the import of General Short's reply of November 27, which indicated clearly that General Short had misunderstood and misconstrued the message of November 27 (472) and had not adequately alerted his command for war.

What have you to say to that?

General MARSHALL. I have nothing to add to what I have already said to you, Mr. Gearhart.

Mr. GEARHART. Reading further from the report:

[3112] (c) To get to General Short on the evening of December 6 and the early morning of December 7, the critical information indicating an almost immediate break with Japan, though there was ample time to have accomplished this.

What have you to say to that?

General MARSHALL. I have nothing to add to what I have already said in regard to that, except possibly this, that the first 13 sections of that message I do not believe had any specific bearing one way or the other on General Short's situation and responsibility with regard to the alert command direction that he had already received.

Mr. GEARHART. Reading further:

(d) To investigate and determine the state of readiness of the Hawaiian Command between November 27 and December 7, 1941, despite the immediate threat of war.

What have you to say to that?

General MARSHALL. I have only this to say, sir, that we had no intimation that that command was not ready, and I think we had every reason to believe that it was ready. With the rapidity of investigations that later became possible, or inspections that later became possible through the ease of air flight, some might have gone out there, but at that time it was not as simple a matter as it became later.

[3113] Incidentally, Mr. Gearhart, I went out to the Hawaiian Department myself at an earlier date while General Herron was in command, and I think I know the Chief of Staff who did go out there prior to the war, and I spent about a week going through every phase of their preparations against attack from the air and against attack from the ground.

I did not go into the details of the Naval concerns in Pearl Harbor itself.

I did go out, though, specifically to make certain that on the arrival of the fleet, in a maneuver which was to take place by, I believe, submarine action largely and a few destroyers on the Hawaiian side, and the fleet coming from the west coast on the fleet side, to make certain that our heavy bombers were involved in the program regarding which I was, sir, at some doubt, and that was arranged, and that was carried out in that operation, to make it a joint affair for the better cooperation and organization of the Hawaiian defense.

So I was aware of the plans that were in effect at the time General Herron—who was General Short's predecessor—was in command, by actual personal investigation.

I was aware shortly prior to that, while I was head of the War Plans Division in the summer and early fall of 1938, of the actual war plans regarding Hawaii. I was only aware [3114] thereafter, with General Short's assumption of command, as indicated by the letters General Short himself sent me and by the discussions that came up, brought up by the Air Corps in relation to General Short's arrangements with the Navy, as to the control of the reconnaissance over water, and I had no reason to believe that that command was anything other than highly efficient and alert.

That is my view of it.

Mr. GEARHART. Thank you, General. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson.

Senator, before we begin, may I call attention to what I think was an inadvertent mistake made by Congressman Gearhart in one of his questions when he assumed that the 13 parts of the 14-part message and pilot message were all received here on the 6th of December. I refer to page 248 of this pamphlet containing these Pearl Harbor decoded messages,¹ and you will find that the pilot message was translated in Washington on the 7th of December instead of the 6th.

Mr. GEARHART. I may have been mistaken, but I was under the impression that there was a message that came on the 6th which carried information to the effect that there would be a directive at 1:00 o'clock, as it turned out, on the following day.

Mr. GESELL. That is at page 238, No. 901.

[3115] Senator FERGUSON. I show you Exhibit 41, which shows that the pilot message was decoded, translated and typed at the Army SIS the 6th of December.

The CHAIRMAN. I am confused with the message on page 248, which reads as follows:

Will the Ambassador please submit to the United States Government (if possible to the Secretary of State) our reply to the United States at 1:00 p. m. on the 7th, your time.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the eventual message.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. That correction will be made.

Go ahead, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. General, in order that we may clear up some points and in order that we may ascertain what was known in the field, the various fields, and what was known here in Washington, that we may, as a committee, ascertain why our forces at Hawaii were surprised, I want to ask you some questions.

I would like to have you refer to Exhibit 42, on page 2 of that exhibit. I will ask you whether or not you were the Commanding General of the Field Forces?

General MARSHALL. I was, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And did that include Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. That did, sir.

[3116] Senator FERGUSON. You were directly over General Short then, as I understand it.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And the purpose of the Field Force in Hawaii was to defend Hawaii, defend the island where Pearl Harbor was, and the fleet, if the fleet was in?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now the second part of that exhibit indicates that if you were absent, then your Deputy Chief of Staff was in charge, is that correct?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What is meant by you being absent?

General MARSHALL. I imagine the best interpretation I can give you on that is "would be available," was I available or not. I say definitely if I am not in Washington I am absent, there is no question whatever about that.

Senator FERGUSON. There isn't any question of availability?

General MARSHALL. I would think so, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, would you say you were available on the morning of the 7th when you were horseback riding?

General MARSHALL. In one sense, yes; in another sense, no. They could not speak to me until they located me.

Senator FERGUSON. Correct. So under this directive your [3117] Deputy Chief of Staff would be able to act?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That is correct, is it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I must say there, though, Senator, in fairness to him, that if he knew I was on an hour's absence he would have quite a problem to decide whether he would take action then or wait until the expiration of the hour.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to get it right there. How far were you at any particular time on that morning from your residence?

General MARSHALL. I would say the present site of the Pentagon.

Senator FERGUSON. Pardon me?

General MARSHALL. I would say the present site of the Pentagon. That was the most distant point of the horseback trail I took.

Senator FERGUSON. You would not be over 3 miles then from your residence at any time?

General MARSHALL. Approximately that.

Senator FERGUSON. So you would have felt that the Deputy Chief of Staff could have, if he desired, located you because you were within 3 miles of your residence?

General MARSHALL. I presume so; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did anyone know your custom of riding [3118] as to where you rode?

General MARSHALL. At the stables they knew. I do not know as General Bryden, my deputy, knew specifically where I rode. I never rode with him, I do not think. The variations from that were limited to following the trail along the Potomac down toward the present National Airport, but that was the only variation.

Senator FERGUSON. You had regular places to ride?

General MARSHALL. Well, you are very much limited, you have to ride there unless you cross the river.

Senator FERGUSON. Now I will ask you, General, you have stated here that Hawaii was alerted, that the Philippines was alerted.

General MARSHALL. Correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was Washington alerted? Was your office alerted?

General MARSHALL. We had an officer on duty at night in the Secretary to the General Staff's office who received any important messages and routed them to the proper person. I am quite certain General Gerow will be able to testify he had a similar officer in the War Plans Division to receive any important messages that might come in.

Senator FERGUSON. Then I want to get to this: Your office was alerted and you had a man there all night that [3119] could have acted, is that correct?

General MARSHALL. You used the expression "alerted," sir. That had been the state of affairs for quite some time.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, as we go along, if I use a word that is not correct in Army parlance, will you correct me?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I meant by that we had been doing that all along, just as I had been keeping the telephone open at 10 o'clock in the house.

Senator FERGUSON. Would not this be true that on Sunday morning your office was alerted, or on the alert, the same as Hawaii, and that the Deputy Chief of Staff would be in a position to act?

General MARSHALL. I presume so; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now was G-2 alerted?

General MARSHALL. You will have to ask General Miles that. I do not know the details. I do know specifically about the War Plans Division; because I had so much business with it I am aware of it.

[3120] Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, he was a deputy under you?

General MARSHALL. He was Assistant Chief of Staff. A deputy operates directly under me.

Senator FERGUSON. That is correct.

General MARSHALL. These others function up to him, or sometimes directly to me.

Senator FERGUSON. He is classed as—

General MARSHALL. He handles the mass of ordinary business and acts for me in my absence.

Senator FERGUSON. Would he get his alert from you?

General MARSHALL. He would have if I had given him a specific alert. He was responsible with the Secretary of the General Staff. The arrangements were such in that section of the War Department that there was a continuity throughout the night.

Senator FERGUSON. Here is what I want to get at, if I can, by questions, to find out the facts. All I am trying to ascertain is, what are the facts.

On the 27th, when the message was sent to Hawaii, was G-2, War Plans, and your office alerted so that they knew that war was imminent? As I understand it, Hawaii was notified that war was imminent. Now, were these respective officers of G-2, G-1—War Plans was what? G-1?

[3121] General MARSHALL. Well, it hasn't any number, sir. War Plans is the designation.

Senator FERGUSON. Was G-2, War Plans, and the Chief of Staff organization alerted at the same time?

General MARSHALL. They were all aware of the critical situation and of the issuance of a directive alerting the overseas theaters in the Pacific.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, how do you account for the fact, if they were alerted, that the 13 parts of the 14-part message—and we understand each other on that—

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (continuing)—and the pilot message were not delivered to the Chief of Staff? Who would be the man that was authorized to act on it, on the evening of the 6th as the Navy had done with their 13-part message? Have you ever looked into it? Have you ever looked into that question to ascertain why that was not done?

General MARSHALL. I did not look into it at all, until here about two days ago, or three days ago, at the time General Miles was testifying. That was my first opportunity to go into these records. The question of the delivery to me of the first 13 parts of that message, I think is a matter of judgment. The final, and fourteenth part is quite different, and that I believe did not become [3122] available until the next morning.

I want to get myself straight, Senator. You spoke of a pilot message.

Senator FERGUSON. The pilot message was merely that they would give a time of delivery, not the 1 o'clock message.

General MARSHALL. I understand, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It is on page 238 of exhibit 1.

General MARSHALL. Yes; I understand it now.

Senator FERGUSON. I wish, General, that you would always insist on completing your answers. I am sometimes a little fast with the next question.

General MARSHALL. I understand it entirely now.

Senator FERGUSON. General, who was in charge, or who is charged with operations in peacetime?

General MARSHALL. There is a section, or there was a section of the General Staff, called the Operations Section, and that was the section from which maneuvers were directed, from which the simulated war training was operated. However, that was not the section of the General Staff which dealt with actual war measures. Those were dealt with in the War Plans Division, which is now called the Operations Division, and is virtually the GHQ.

Senator FERGUSON. I have in mind in peacetime.

[3123] General MARSHALL. I am speaking of peacetime, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, when would you say your regulations were peacetime, and when did they go over to wartime, so the committee can interpret this Exhibit 42?

General MARSHALL. In one sense, they did not go over; they remained in their status quo. What I was trying to explain to the preliminary questions was we had a section of the staff called Operations. That deals, however, with peacetime training operations, maneuvers, things of that sort, and organization, but the war measures were handled in the War Plans Division.

The war plans were in the War Plans Division.

The action of the Chief of Staff in relation to those plans would be prepared, presumably, unless he did it himself directly in the War Plans Division, and not at all in the Operations Section. That is a misnomer, so far as the war situation is concerned. So it is the War

Plans Division which is now the OPD, the operations of the General Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. So that we may be able, when we read these various papers, to know when we were in peace and when we were in war, would you say, the dividing line, the line of demarcation, was the attack, or bombing of Pearl Harbor?

[3124] General MARSHALL. That was the definite subdivision dividing the line between a known status of peace and a known status of war, but so far as the operations of the General Staff are concerned, the war measures, the war plans, the war advice to the Chief of Staff came directly from the War Plans Division.

[3125] Senator FERGUSON. Then, as I understand it, we were acting on a war basis.

General MARSHALL. In relation to those matters; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And when did we go on that basis?

General MARSHALL. When you use the expression "war basis" there, you have me a little bit in difficulty, because always the War Plans Division was concerned with war plans, with discussions of the probability of war as to those plans, and the preparation of any instructions to be issued by the Chief of Staff regarding our war plans. They are not operations, of course, in the sense of actual movements, and deployments until you actually engage in war.

But the directions concerning the matter would be generated as a rule in the War Plans Division, unless the Chief of Staff did that himself.

So from that point of view there was no change in the General Staff between the peacetime operation and the wartime operation, so far as the responsibility and the method of doing business was concerned, between the War Plans Division and the Chief of Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. General, on page 9 of Exhibit 42, under "b," I wish you would locate the directive, or the duty that would make General Gerow responsible for the reply of Short, where he stated—that is in Short's reply to [3126] your message of the 27th—that he had alerted against sabotage, and liaison with the Navy. Now will you point out where WPD, the War Plans Division, was made responsible, in this exhibit, just which one of these made Gerow responsible for action on the Short message?

General MARSHALL. Before answering that, Senator, I would like to say this: It was General Gerow's section in which the details of those matters would be concerned and would be carried out, but the responsibility was mine as well as General Gerow's.

Now as to this particular paragraph of this section—I will just refer to page 9—

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; and anything else that you want.

General MARSHALL. I was trying to get the section number. It would be to a large extent under, I think, subparagraph b (3), "The initial strategical deployment (plans and orders for the movement of troops to execute the initial deployment to be the duty of the Operations and Training Division)."

Also part of it comes under (2), "Estimate of forces required and times at which they may be needed under the various possible conditions necessitating the use of troops in the national defense."

It does not specifically mention the exact point you are bringing up.

[3127] Senator FERGUSON. That is what I was getting at. There is nothing in the directive here that specifically covers Gerow's responsibility on the Short reply?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir, in this.

Senator FERGUSON. And under the section, as I understand it, as I say it, it was part of your responsibility. You mean the Commanding General of the Field was over Short, and therefore you had a right to command him?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. That is in Army parlance?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Did Gerow have any right to issue orders to Short on a command basis?

General MARSHALL. Certainly, normally, no.

Senator FERGUSON. In peacetime. I change my question and add, before you answer, in peacetime did he have any right to issue a command to Short?

General MARSHALL. It would have required quite an assumption of authority on his part to do that without some confirmation from a senior officer.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, that province was in you as a senior officer, or in the case of your absence, it was in your deputy?

General MARSHALL. That is correct. As to mere matters [3128] of detail, of course, we communicated back and forth.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Did Gerow have authority to order Rainbow 5, or any other War Plan into effect?

General MARSHALL. He did not, sir. He would have had to assume it.

Senator FERGUSON. Who had authority to order a war plan, talking about Rainbow, or any other order, into effect?

General MARSHALL. The President, the Secretary of War, and myself, and in my absence, the deputy.

Senator FERGUSON. General, I would like to go into how the General Staff is made up.

You went in sometime in 1939, is that correct?

General MARSHALL. I joined the War Department General Staff on July 6, 1938, as head of War Plans Division.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. In October of 1938 I was relieved from that job and appointed Deputy Chief of Staff of the General Staff. I held that office until I became Chief of Staff on the first of July, 1939.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, do I understand, the first of July, 1939, you became the Chief of Staff, and at that time was General Miles in G-2?

[3129] General MARSHALL. No, sir, he was not.

Senator FERGUSON. Was General Gerow in War Plans?

General MARSHALL. He was in War Plans but he was not the Chief of Section.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was the Chief of Section?

General MARSHALL. General George V. Strong.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he a brigadier general?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. He was a brigadier general. Colonel E. R. Warner McCabe was the G-2 of the War Department General Staff at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was at Hawaii? General Herron?

General MARSHALL. General Herron, yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, does the Chief of Staff have the right to select his own G-2, his War Plans officer, his deputy?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that done in this particular case? Did you select them?

General MARSHALL. I found Colonel McCabe as G-2 when I became Chief of Staff; and I continued him as such until sometime—until he was relieved by General Miles. I found General Strong as a brigadier general in the War Plans Division when I joined it as Chief of War Plans Division.

When I left the Division to become Deputy Chief of Staff, he automatically became head of War Plans Division. [3130]

When I became Chief of Staff—my first direct appointment was the Deputy Chief of Staff, who had previously been the G-1 Personnel Officer—that was General Gasser.

From time to time I replaced people for various reasons as their tours expired, or as they retired, and General McCabe, Colonel McCabe rather, now General McCabe, was replaced by General Miles, and General Strong was replaced by General Gerow. I think.

General Gerow was replaced by General Eisenhower. General Miles was replaced by General Lee, shortly thereafter by General Strong. But those were my appointments.

Senator FERGUSON. General Miles has told us that he was Acting Assistant for the Chief of Staff in G-2.

General MARSHALL. That, I think, Senator, was merely a technicality, because under the law we couldn't detail him directly on the General Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. Why were you not able to put him on the General Staff?

General MARSHALL. Well, I can't think of it right offhand but it was merely a technicality.

Senator FERGUSON. Was it one of the qualifications that he didn't have, the term of office?

General MARSHALL. Something of that sort. I think it [3131] pertained to how much duty he had had in Washington; something of that sort.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that also true of General Gerow?

General MARSHALL. I don't think it was, sir; but my memory is not clear on that.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there any more important deputy during this increasing tension that we were having, than your G-2?

General MARSHALL. Well, I should say that it lay between the G-2 and the head of the War Plans Division.

Senator FERGUSON. So the combination of those two, they were, in your scheme of things, they were very important?

General MARSHALL. Very important, indeed.

Senator FERGUSON. And were you at all times satisfied with the work in G-2?

General MARSHALL. As far as I was aware of the details of the work, I was satisfied.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you also satisfied with the work in War Plans?

General MARSHALL. I was.

Senator FERGUSON. So that up until the 7th day of December, you were entirely satisfied as to the heads of these two offices?

[3132] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, prior to the 27th, or let's say between the 27th of November 1941, and the 7th day of December 1941, that is, the period between the warning message and the attack, was there anyone in the War Department that made a staff survey of the incoming messages, talking about the magic, to see whether the alerts were being carried out in relation to the magic?

General MARSHALL. What were those dates, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. The 27th of November and the 7th of December 1941. That is between the war warning message and the attack.

General MARSHALL. But when was this period that I was to reply to?

Senator FERGUSON. That is the period. Did you make any survey during that period, when you had alerted these men, to see whether or not you were getting them at the moment they were being translated?

General MARSHALL. Not that I am aware of.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you tell us, General, if there was any reason why General Miles left G-2?

General MARSHALL. I don't—he was relieved, I believe, in February. That is my recollection of the thing. I made several changes in the Chief of Staff. These [3133] people had been working very hard. We were reorganizing the whole War Department, and General Gerow was given an opportunity with troops and General Miles an opportunity of territorial command. I think that is about the condition.

Senator FERGUSON. It was then in no way connected with the operation in his office?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. In relation to any of the messages, delivery of them, or not?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. It had nothing to do with that?

General MARSHALL. Nothing to do with that; no, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would the same apply to General Gerow?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So that the record may be clear on that.

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

As to General Gerow, my difficulty with him was that he conscientiously overworked and stayed at the office late at night, and he was, I thought, exhausting himself, and that the thing couldn't go on. Therefore, I gave him what everybody in the War Department wanted, a troop command, I think the Twenty-ninth Division. I had brought General Eisenhower in [3134] a few days after December 7 and given him more or less direct responsibility over all Pacific affairs.

General Gerow not only had the affairs of the war as it pertained to the Atlantic, and, of course, the responsibility of General Eisenhower in the Pacific, but he also went through a very gruelling experience at the time the British Chiefs of Staff came here in the latter part of December.

So, he was pretty well exhausted, and I therefore gave him a troop command as both an opportunity and as a rest.

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it, there was no one specifically designated to see that the magic was translated and put into your hands, and that the alerts were properly carried out?

General MARSHALL. You use the expression "specifically designated."

There was an organizational arrangement that had been in existence. For example, you speak of the reply from the theater commanders to the alert. That would be rather directly in the subsection of the War Plans Division, which had immediate charge of all details with reference to the Pacific. That section was headed by Colonel Bundy, who later lost his life when I tried to rush him out to Hawaii shortly after the attack.

[3135] Then the main, the drafting work, the checking work, the filing work, the reference work would be carried out as a matter of procedure in that section for General Gerow. Then General Gerow would either bring it or send it to me as Chief of Staff.

Just as in G-2, my recollection of the status was that Colonel Bratton was in immediate charge of all magic affairs and was responsible, of course, to General Miles. General Miles was responsible for the bringing of these things to my attention, but in many instances Colonel Bratton, or at least, in instances, Colonel Bratton brought them in himself.

But the system and procedure started in the section under Colonel Bratton, just as the Pacific affairs started in the section of War Plans Division under Colonel Bundy.

Senator FERGUSON. Then it is true that General Miles should have had access to all intelligences, State Department, Army, Navy, and all intelligence?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir. He was the receipt source and the diffusion source of all intelligence matters in relation to the enemy.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he also the evaluator of such intelligence?

General MARSHALL. He was responsible for the evaluation which would be done by a group in his section.

[3136] Senator FERGUSON. Now, was that, the evaluation of these various instruments, all sources, ever taken away from General Miles in G-2?

General MARSHALL. Not to my knowledge, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then do I understand that your office, you as Chief of Staff, depended on General Miles' estimate of the intelligence?

General MARSHALL. You use the word "depend." He submitted his views, probably which in turn had been submitted to him by the section which did the laborious analysis, and with which he might or might not agree, or might or might not modify, and that estimate came to me at such times as he thought it was proper that I should be brought up to date or in response to my definite request, and I accepted it or modified it in my own mind, but I had the benefit of that advice.

Senator FERGUSON. Before they went out would you approve them?

General MARSHALL. In some cases they were sent to the President. There I either approved it and sent it to the President or expressed myself so it was clear, I think, that I was submitting it as a view. Whether I expressed concurrence or not I couldn't recall in each instance.

Senator FERGUSON. Were there any evaluations, first, [3137] between the 1st of November and the 27th of November?

General MARSHALL. I will have to look at the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you look at that and check.

General MARSHALL. The record shows that on November 1 there was an evaluation to the Chief of Staff from General Miles on the subject of a possible Japanese drive into Yunnan.

Senator FERGUSON. You made a report to the President about the 5th of November on the same subject.

General MARSHALL. I made a report.

On November 2 there was a G-2 estimate on the Far Eastern situation addressed to the Chief of Staff—no, that was addressed to the War Plans Division. Whether or not I got a copy doesn't show.

On November 13 there was an estimate, signed by General Miles, in a memorandum to the Chief of Staff, again on the subject of a possible Japanese drive into Yunnan. That estimate was distributed to the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of State, Under Secretary of War, the Under Secretary of State, Assistant Secretary of War, Assistant Secretary of War for Air, the Chief of Staff, Coordinator of Information, Chief of the Army Air Forces, Mr. Lauchlin Currie, who was the President's representative regarding Chinese matters, Division of Defense Aid Reports, Director of Naval Intelligence, the Assistant Chief of Staff, WPD, that was [3138] General Gerow, GHQ, that would be General McNair, Chief of Air Corps—that would be, I think, General Arnold.

Senator FERGUSON. General Arnold at that time?

General MARSHALL. I don't know whether it was General Arnold or not.

And General Embick.

Senator FERGUSON. At least that one would be approved by you.

Do you think any were delivered to the President without your approval?

General MARSHALL. I would assume that I would—well, certainly would have struck out anything that I thought was entirely wrong in it.

Senator FERGUSON. Therefore if it went through it had your approval insofar as you struck it out?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Any others, General?

General MARSHALL. One dated November 26, on the subject of Japanese naval task force. A memorandum for the Chief of Staff. Its distribution shows the: Secretary of War, Assistant Chief of Staff, WPD—that is General Gerow—I. B. file, the Far East Section, and the Record Section. That refers to his own, General Miles' department.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you approve—before it would [3139] go to the Secretary of War, it would come over your desk?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. Normally I would give him the benefit of what I thought and if I thought it was important I would have spoken to the Secretary or written him a note.

Here is one on November 27, a memorandum for the Chief of Staff, on the subject of recent developments in the Far East.

The CHAIRMAN. Might I ask the committee if it is willing to sit a little later today, say 12:30, before recessing?

Senator FERGUSON. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. General, do you have any objection?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We will proceed to 12:30 then.

General MARSHALL. That estimate, in a memorandum for the Chief of Staff, on the recent developments in the Far East, dated November 27, was delivered to the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War for Air, Chief of Army Air Forces, Assistant Chief of Staff, WPD, Director of Naval Intelligence, and GHQ, which is General McNair.

Senator FERGUSON. You haven't been reading that these went to the Director of Naval Intelligence except in this last one. Do you recall whether any went to the Navy?

General MARSHALL. I do not presume they did unless it [3140] shows in this.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, were there any between—is that all up to that date into November?

General MARSHALL. No, one more. November 29, memorandum for the Chief of Staff, on the subject Brief Periodic Estimate of the Situation December 1, 1941–March 31, 1942.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. The message of November 1 went to the Office of Naval Intelligence, and the message of November 13 did, I believe.

Senator FERGUSON. We would be glad to have that correction on the record.

General MARSHALL. This memorandum covers operations and the situation throughout the world with the various estimates of probabilities or possibilities.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall whether any of these reports indicated an air attack on Hawaii or any kind of an attack on Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Just at the moment I do not, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that all between those dates?

General MARSHALL. That is all, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, were there any, to your knowledge, called to your attention between the 1st of December and the [3141] 7th of December?

General MARSHALL. There was one on December 6, estimate of the Japanese strength in Indochina.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know when that one reached you, item 29?

General MARSHALL. I presume on December 6. I don't know. I suppose the records of my office in the War Department show that.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, that one would have no evidence in it whatever of any idea of an attack on Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. It is devoted entirely to Indochina.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. Then there is another on the 6th of December, estimate of Japanese air and ground forces in Indochina, Thailand, and Formosa. That was distributed also to the Secretary of War, the Assistant Chief of Staff, General Gerow.

Senator FERGUSON. General, would you say that you had any knowledge over and above those estimates, as far as intelligence was concerned?

General MARSHALL. I think I would say that they reflected the general state of information which I had. Whether or not I had picked up any additional points of view from my own personal reading of magic I couldn't say. I think in general [3142] that is the summation of the information I had at the time.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know of any case where you ever took up with General Miles magic as to your interpretation of it, that you thought that he may interpret it any other way?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall any, sir. I have had a great many discussions regarding magic along that line, but when they were and what they were I don't recall.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you give to General Miles the intelligence, for instance, that you obtained through the Secretary of War, that he may have obtained from the Secretary of State at the War Cabinet?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How did General Miles get the information of the War Cabinet?

General MARSHALL. That would be presumably only through my giving him the information myself, other than his liaison through his officers with the Department of State, but I don't think that liaison would give him information of that particular character, so he would be more or less dependent, I think, on my personally telling him what I personally had received from Mr. Stimson, or I had gathered by my presence at the conferences.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, take the conference that Secretary Hull talked about, where he was at a Cabinet meeting and he [3143] called it to the attention of all of the imminence of war and Secretary Knox went out and made a speech, Secretary Welles made a speech, but he says here he didn't make it in relation to that Cabinet meeting, would that kind of an intelligence, that kind of information, go to General Miles, specifically?

General MARSHALL. There was not a specific routing for that procedure. It would depend, I think, on my telling him personally. We had a great many meetings at that time. We had discussions before the Joint Board at which, I think, General Miles was present, and a great many in my office. But there was no direct routing routine that would have carried that message from the discussion at the White House to General Miles personally.

Senator FERGUSON. Well now, if you eliminate that kind of a matter from these evaluations, what do we have from these evaluations, if we don't take all of the details from the Secretary of State's office, which was a great source of intelligence, how would we get anything from these evaluations?

General MARSHALL. I think, though General Miles can testify directly, I think General Miles had daily contact, through a liaison agreement, with the State Department, they have now and I assume they did then, but even that, Senator, I do not think would give them the product of our meetings, [3144] personal meetings with the President, such as you just referred to.

Senator FERGUSON. How often did this War Cabinet meet. From the 15th of November to the 1st of December, how often would they meet? I mean, to your knowledge. Was it frequent or not?

General MARSHALL. Well, the actual meetings with the President of the entire group were not frequent in the sense that the meetings between the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and Mr. Hull were frequent and almost daily, and the attendance of Admiral Stark and I or one other, were.

Senator FERGUSON. How often would you say you saw the President between the 15th of November and the 1st of December?

General MARSHALL. I think the record will show that, but—

Mr. GESELL. They are shown on the exhibit.

General MARSHALL. Can I see that, please? Will you give me the dates again?

Senator FERGUSON. The 15th of November to the 1st of December.

General MARSHALL. I saw the President on the 15th of November, on the 25th of November, on the 28th of November, on the 7th of December.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you have no recollection, this sheet does not show any conferences between you and the President [3145] from the 28th to the 7th, 28th of November to the 7th of December?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the conference you had with the President after the attack, at 7 o'clock?

General MARSHALL. That was after the attack. I think the date for that conference was set before the attack.

Senator FERGUSON. But you did not see him until after the attack?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know, General, about when the first matter of the breaking of the Japanese code, which was called magic, was called to your attention?

General MARSHALL. Do you mean, Senator, my first knowledge that there was such a thing as magic?

Senator FERGUSON. Well, yes; let's have that date first, about when.

General MARSHALL. I don't think I was aware of it at all until I became Chief of Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. And about the time you became Chief of Staff you had this called to your attention, that we were able to get our intelligence from a certain source?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And that was under G-2, that was their [3146] job?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, as tension grew, were you ever consulted or did you confer with anyone in G-2 about the speed on this intelligence, that it was valuable, there wasn't anything more valuable to the Government than that particular source as far as intelligence was concerned?

General MARSHALL. My recollection is—I will go back a ways, if I may.

[3147] When it first came to my attention, as I recall it, G-2, then Colonel McCabe, not only explained to me that my predecessor thought it was illegal, but he was always concerned about the maintenance of secrecy and possible carelessness in the handling of the papers.

Of course, at that time there was a great deal of purely diplomatic information and no military information as I recall, at that time.

As the situation changed, of course, the military factor became more predominant at least in our minds, and our concern was, as to secrecy, most definitely that of protecting the source.

There were conversations with Colonel McCabe that I recall over the difficulty of securing the proper people to do the work, and also, I think, with General Miles as to the increasing difficulty and our fear that we were going to lose that source through the, you might say, the subversive action of at least one individual concerned with the work.

We were then discussing, as I recall it, the difficulty of securing people with the proper talents and qualities, and integrity, and also where we could house them so that they could work effectively and at the same time not be unduly conspicuous.

[3148] We continued to have frequent conversations regarding the handling of magic, particularly as to its security, and I recall that I intervened myself very directly and required that it be locked in a pouch and delivered by pouch, the pouch unlocked, and it be read by the recipient and put back in the pouch.

I have no definite recollection of discussing with General Miles their inability to keep abreast of these translations and decipherings. I do recall faintly conversations concerned with the mass of material which presumably had very little import, but which had to be culled away from the general lot, so that the important things came to us.

I might say that I have no definite recollection of pressing General Miles to expedite the deciphering and the distribution of magic.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the fact, as shown by our record here, that this was received and then it would take as high as 20 days to translate, was that called to your attention during the time that you were getting these messages?

General MARSHALL. Not to my recollection.

I saw, in the main, these messages that I knew, like those of the fateful days of December 7 and 8, were handled at a very high speed, it seemed to me, knowing the diff- [3149] culties involved.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, as I understand it, it was not due to a lack of appropriation that you didn't get these messages fast—or was it due to that?

General MARSHALL. I would say, Senator, taking a long back sight, that it was the general combination of things relating to the entire Army, in the building up that we were going through at that time from very small groups to much larger groups.

This, you might say, is a little bit comparable to radar. We could collect men and engineers for a regiment in a comparatively short time as compared for such a complicated business such as radar. That took a long time, and there was a necessity for high selectivity.

That was very much the case in everything concerned with magic, and also we had the difficulty, at that time, of people not being in a frame of mind such as is common to almost the entire public in time of war, so that you could use them, control them, and get services out of them on quite a very much simpler basis than you could at that time.

There were a great many factors like that involved. I would not say it was lack of appropriations.

Senator FERGUSON. General, did you know when the first magic was distributed to England?

[3150] General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. When that was taken up with England?

General MARSHALL. I do not know when that occurred, sir. General Miles would have to give you that.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not it was prior to any meeting on the ABC or the ABCD arrangement?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall that, sir. I would have to go to the records to get it.

Senator FERGUSON. You have no personal knowledge?

General MARSHALL. No; I have no personal knowledge of that; no, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, on whose authority could that be done if it wasn't called to your attention, about that arrangement?

General MARSHALL. Well, I would say that the actual exchange of such information as that prior to a state of war in which Great Britain was an ally would have, I think, undoubtedly been brought to my attention, probably that of the Secretary of War, but certainly, I think, to my attention.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you any recollection of this being called to your attention, this matter of giving to the British this magic, or this means of getting the magic?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. It is very hard for me to [3151] put my finger on the point when this took place, when this interchange was a matter of business every day. I don't recall that.

Senator FERGUSON. Isn't it true at first there was a grave question about whether or not it would be given to the British, whether or not we wouldn't keep it and get the information ourselves?

General MARSHALL. That would be a consideration, but I believe, Senator, what we were more concerned about was obtaining from the British the information they had, which was much more extensive than ours.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know of any arrangement between the British and America in relation to them giving us other intelligence that they didn't get through magic?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And was that distributed to us?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And did they also use magic to get intelligence and give us what they got out of magic?

General MARSHALL. I wouldn't attempt to answer that. I presume they did.

Senator FERGUSON. That is your assumption?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. When the intelligence was coming to [3152] you, it was an over-all intelligence as far as you were concerned?

General MARSHALL. It was an over-all intelligence, presumably, as far as I was concerned, but I wish to make this comment, that for quite a long time we only received the British estimates. We did not receive the direct intelligence on which the evaluation was made, as the basis for the estimates.

It was a long period before they gave us the direct material, because they were very fearful of our letting them get out of the basis of secrecy.

Finally, and I think we were well into the war, a long ways into the war, before they were willing to take the hazard of giving us the direct information, which involved, of course, a knowledge of how they acquired it.

[3153] Senator FERGUSON. So at first we received the estimates. Now I will ask counsel, do we have the estimates of the British? We have here given to us the estimates of our Intelligence Department, but do we have the British?

General MARSHALL. They were not formal estimates, I think, as a rule, of the type that I have been reading here from General Miles.

Senator FERGUSON. No; they were memoranda.

General MARSHALL. But they were evaluations of those things that they were getting.

Senator FERGUSON. Do we have, General Mitchell, the evaluations?

General MARSHALL. I am quite certain that would not be in your records, sir, because we have been trying to keep that quiet as much as we could.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, then, General Marshall, do I understand we are not getting every bit, that certain things are being kept quiet that we are not getting?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not mean that at all.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, will you explain your answer? I must have misunderstood you.

General MARSHALL. My last answer was that we did not wish to disclose the fact that the British had a capacity and a method of obtaining information which I referred to in that [3154] letter of Governor Dewey's which has now become public, not that they did not give us information.

Senator FERGUSON. What I am wanting to know is——

General MARSHALL. And now, as I understand it, your question is addressed to the fact whether there is some of that information that bears on this question?

Senator FERGUSON. On Pearl Harbor.

General MARSHALL. I know of none such. I know of one——

Senator FERGUSON. How can the committee tell?

General MARSHALL. I know of one message, as I recall, that came through the State Department, I believe, on the afternoon, I think, of December 6, but I think that is in the record and that is a British estimate specifically regarding the movement of Japanese ships in the Gulf of Siam.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, do you know, General, that Admiralty was given direct information by Intelligence. Do you know that to be a fact or not?

General MARSHALL. I knew that they were receiving information, just as we were receiving a certain amount and that a part was coming directly from the Navy.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, did your department, G-2, get the Admiralty information?

General MARSHALL. You will have to ask General Miles that. I could not testify anything about that.

[3155] Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, General, wouldn't it be important when this intelligence came across your desk to know its source?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that called to your attention, that we were getting this intelligence from Admiralty?

General MARSHALL. I have no distinct recollection of that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Have there been any instructions to G-2 that we were not to get all the files in relation to everything on Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; none whatever.

Senator FERGUSON. Then I do not quite understand that previous answer that that probably would not be given to us.

General MARSHALL. Well, I must have misled you. I was referring specifically to a method, a technique, rather than a record.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, it would be an evaluation. If it was an evaluation, it would be in writing?

General MARSHALL. Well, Senator, if there is such it is certainly now before your group. I do not know just what the details of that are. I know that there are no instructions in the War Department to hold out any information from you gentlemen; quite the contrary.

[3156] Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that prior to August 1941 Admiral Kimmel was getting certain diplomatic information?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I was not aware of that that I recall.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not at the time Admiral Kimmel was getting information prior to August or sometime in August that General Short was not getting that information?

General MARSHALL. I was not aware of that fact, that what Admiral Kimmel got was not being made available to General Short. I am aware of what General Short was receiving.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, did you know of any rule or regulation that prohibited or delayed or stopped this intelligence going to Admiral Kimmel after some time in August?

General MARSHALL. I am not aware of the circumstances of that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know of any reason, anything that happened in August that would stop that?

General MARSHALL. I am not aware of that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You are not aware of anything that would stop that?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. When did you first get the information [3157] that General MacArthur in the Philippines was getting this magic?

General MARSHALL. I could not answer that, sir. I know now what he was getting and the circumstances under which he was receiving it, and I am not able to cast my mind back to that time to know exactly what I knew then as to the degree of it.

In these headquarters, in some of them they had a basis—there was this which confuses the question in my own mind; I knew that in the Pacific from sources in Hawaii and in the Philippines and presumably, maybe, at the minor stations in Puget Sound, possibly in Alaska and at other places, we had quite largely, the Navy had groups who were engaged in intercepting Japanese radio messages, but that was done largely for the purpose of locating ship movements, or locating headquarters from which you might deduce what the actual ship movement was.

Now, that was going on throughout the Pacific. That was the naval means of following as closely as they could Japanese shipping, possibly their submarines, certainly their larger naval craft.

There, then, is a confusion in one's mind as to how much of what you knew was that and what you might have known that was the elaboration of the deciphering of these messages which [3158] constituted the basis of magic.

The messages on which the magic is based were collected throughout the Pacific. I should imagine, though I am not the best witness on this, that the largest portion of the collection occurred in the Philippines because of its proximity to Japan and its ease of interception, but it sometimes occurred, as in the instance I believed the record will show on the fateful message which gave the hour 1 p. m., December 7, it was intercepted in the Puget Sound region rather than out in the Philippines or out in Hawaii.

So in my mind, in trying to reconstruct my knowledge of the data, coming to that period just prior to December 7, there is a confusion as to how much I knew that pertained to these radio intercepts that located the movement of vessels, how much that I knew of arrangements to intercept the Japanese messages rather than to decipher them and how much I knew regarding the actual deciphering which I know about now.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; but did you know in 1941, in the summer of 1941, that General MacArthur had the means of obtaining the magic as far as the State Department and various other agencies are concerned, the so-called purple matter?

General MARSHALL. I do not know as I knew it then, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That he was able to get it direct [3159] by means of cryptanalysis in the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. I know that now, sir. I do not know to what degree I knew it then.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, can you place yourself back in 1941 to know now whether or not you knew it then? I am trying to find out what you knew here in Washington of what he knew there?

General MARSHALL. Yes. I am unable to say that, sir. I rather think I know now what the naval arrangement was in the Philippines as to deciphering through what they called the purple machine of magic, at that source, but I do not know how much I knew about that then.

Senator FERGUSON. But that would be an important matter and would be called to your attention in 1941, would it not?

General MARSHALL. If it were known by General Miles, and I am not positive whether or not he knew it.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I do not want to pass on the evidence of General Miles.

General MARSHALL. I am telling you——

Senator FERGUSON. As to whether or not he knew that General MacArthur had this means.

General MARSHALL. Well, my reference to General Miles—

Senator FERGUSON. But I would like to have you, or if someone can for you, to get General Miles' testimony on that [3160] point and show it to you, rather than have me pass on it.

General MARSHALL. Well, I have not read it, sir. I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. It is 12:30, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It is 12:30, and the committee will recess until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:30 o'clock, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock of the same day.)

[3161]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.
Senator Ferguson will proceed.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

Senator FERGUSON. At this place, General, I would like to offer the statutory duties of the Chief of Staff into the record. I wonder whether you can read them into the record and answer questions as to what you understand to be the statutory duties?

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator, for the purpose of the record, give the source?

Senator FERGUSON. Pardon me?

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator, in order to have the record correct, give the source?

Senator FERGUSON. Will you look on the back of that? This is the United States Code.

Mr. MURPHY. The volume, page, and section?

General MARSHALL. United States Code, 1940 edition, page 491, paragraph 33. Do you wish me to read this into the record, Senator Ferguson?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL (reading):

The Chief of Staff shall preside over the War Department General Staff and, under the direction of [3162] the President, or of the Secretary of War under the direction of the President, shall cause to be made, by the War Department General Staff, the necessary plans for recruiting, organizing, supplying equipment, mobilizing, training, and demobilizing the Army of the United States, and for the use of the military forces for national defense. He shall transmit to the Secretary of War the plans and recommendations prepared for that purpose by the War Department General Staff and advise him in regard thereto; upon the approval of such plans or recommendations by the Secretary of War, he shall act as the agent of the Secretary of War in carrying the same into effect.

Do you wish me to read the various references in parentheses?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; you might as well.

General MARSHALL (reading):

(June 3, 1916, ch. 134, par. 5, 39 Stat. 167; June 4, 1920, ch. 227, subch. I, par. 5, 41 Stat. 764.)

Paragraph 33-a. Further duties of Chief of Staff.

Subject to the provisions of sections 82 and 1193 of this title, the Chief of Staff, under the direction of the President, or of the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, shall have supervision of all troops of the line and of the Inspector General's, Judge Advocate General's, Medical, and Ordnance Departments of the Quartermaster Corps, [3167] of the Corps of Engineers, and of the Signal Corps, and, in all matters pertaining to the command, discipline, or administration of the existing military establishment, of the Adjutant General's Department, and he shall perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be assigned to him by the President.

Those are the two paragraphs I see here on this page 491.

Senator FERGUSON. You were familiar with the statutory duties of the Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3164] Senator FERGUSON. You heard the testimony of General Gerow that he took full responsibility for the action to be taken, and not taken, on General Short's reply to the message of the 27th of November?

General MARSHALL. I read that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you agree that it was his full responsibility?

General MARSHALL. I would not say that was his full responsibility. It was his direct responsibility for each department of the General Staff, of which his was one.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you, by virtue of your office, share that responsibility?

General MARSHALL. I think I do, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It is the responsibility of the Chief of Staff when he asks for a reply, and the reply takes a certain form, if any further direction is necessary, it is his responsibility to give that direction?

General MARSHALL. That would be his responsibility, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. The Chief of Staff, that is myself.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I understand. And that is the kind of a message that General Short's reply was?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3165] Senator FERGUSON. I would just like to ask a few questions, going back, on the giving to the British of the breaking of the code. That was a very important matter, was it not, General?

General MARSHALL. Very important.

Senator FERGUSON. To share our secrets with another country?

General MARSHALL. Very important, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Particularly so when we are at peace?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now would General Miles have authority, in his position, to perform that act?

General MARSHALL. No, sir, not of his own initiative.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, can you tell us who did it in this case? As I understand it, the record now shows that it was done sometime in January of 1941.

General MARSHALL. I presume that he did it after consultation with me.

Senator FERGUSON. No one else would be in authority to perform such an act?

General MARSHALL. The Secretary of War would be the only other person.

Senator FERGUSON. You know of no act that the Secretary of War took with relation to this code with Britain?

[3166] General MARSHALL. No, sir; none whatever.

Senator FERGUSON. Could I ask now from counsel whether or not we have the so-called evaluation of the British? Does the committee have those instruments?

Mr. MITCHELL. What do you mean by "evaluations"?

Senator FERGUSON. What the General has described as evaluations.

Mr. MITCHELL. We examined them. They are under that arrangement, as you know, of nothing received from a foreign country can be divulged without clearing it with that country first.

We looked over those documents, and we did not ourselves see anything pertinent in them, and therefore, we have not, up to date, asked the British Government to clear them. So they are there, and I think they are open to inspection even though they have not been cleared.

Senator FERGUSON. Is there any question about their being open to the committee's inspection?

Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all. Nobody has ever asked for them. We have seen thousands of documents that did not seem pertinent to us. We have not dumped material of that kind on you unless you asked for it.

[3167] Senator FERGUSON. I want the record to show what we have and what we do not have.

Do you know, General, whether or not you consulted with anyone in relation to this exchange of information between the British and America?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of that now, sir. I have a very definite recollection of frequent conversations with General Strong, who succeeded or who followed General Miles. I have no recollection of such conversations with General Miles. Those conversations that I happen to recollect were after we were once engaged in war.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not, General, the Japs ever knew that we were breaking their codes?

General MARSHALL. I do not know one way or the other. I assume that they did not, or the procedure would have changed almost instantly.

Senator FERGUSON. I wish you would refer to exhibit 2, page 122.

General MARSHALL. Is that at the top or the bottom of the page?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. You have the wrong book, General.

Senator FERGUSON. Exhibit 2. It is the yellow backed book. Now I refer you to the second from the last sentence in paragraph 3.

[3168] General MARSHALL. How does that start, sir?

Senator FERGUSON.

There are also some suspicions that they read some of our codes. Therefore, we wish to exercise the utmost caution in accomplishing this mission. Also, any telegrams exchanged between you and Panama should be very simple.

Do you know whether we had any other information than that particular intercept, which was the 23rd of June, 1941? Were there any other intercepts that indicated that they knew we were breaking their code?

General MARSHALL. I have a vague recollection of another one, but I think it was after we were engaged in the war.

Senator FERGUSON. Nothing before the war?

General MARSHALL. Not to my knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. You indicated yesterday, General, that certain information was kept from the Roberts commission. I believe you indicated, as I remember the testimony, there were certain parts taken out of the Roberts report.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. The intention that I wanted to convey to Governor Dewey was that the Roberts commission had the magic available to them but it had to be withdrawn out of their records in the report which was released to the public.

Senator FERGUSON. Now who changed the Roberts report? [3169] Who altered it to take those things out?

General MARSHALL. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Where did you get your knowledge that there was a change in the Roberts report before it was issued to the public?

General MARSHALL. I could not tell you that, sir. Undoubtedly there were conversations in regard to the delicacy of the exposure of that material, but I do not recall the details of its control, because that would be one thing that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, presumably, and probably even the President, would become involved in.

The board, as I recall, was under the direction of the President.

[3170] Senator FERGUSON. Did you have anything to do with the personnel of that board, the Roberts board, or the Roberts commission?

General MARSHALL. My recollection of the matter is that the Secretary of War consulted with me as to what his recommendation might be as to the Army members of the board, and I had just brought General McNarney back to this country in connection with the proposed reorganization of the War Department, and as he was an air man, and a very able individual, I suggested to the Secretary of War that General McNarney might be a very appropriate Army member.

As to the other Army member, that was General McCoy.

Senator FERGUSON. He was retired, General, was he not?

General MARSHALL. He was retired and an old acquaintance of the Secretary of War, and, as I recall, Mr. Stimson brought up his name as the man he thought would fit the job, and I concurred.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, when did General McNarney leave the War Plans Division?

General MARSHALL. He never was in the War Plans. Oh, he was in the War Plans Division possibly a while back; I do not recall when, but I can find that in the records; but at the time he appeared on the Roberts board he had been in England almost a year in connection with the Air [3171] Corps.

Senator FERGUSON. Was not he in War Plans sometime the first week in December, about the time some of these things occurred?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; he was not even on duty in the War Department then. As far as my recollection goes, I had just brought him back from a year in England for the purpose of being on the board for the reorganization of the War Department that I was just completing.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not he was familiar with the whole magic set-up?

General MARSHALL. I could not answer that, sir. The probability is that he did not know it.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the War Plans know about the magic?

General MARSHALL. The head of War Plans did know about that.

Senator FERGUSON. Was he ever deputy of the War Plans?

General MARSHALL. I will have to check it. I do not recall that he was.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether the President was advised about deleting or taking parts out of the Roberts report?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. All I know about the Roberts [3172] commission and its operation and arrangement is the Secretary of War asking my advice as to what Army officer to put on the board, and I suggested General McNarney, who had just returned from England, and he mentioned General McCoy, retired, and I thought that was a good selection.

Other than that, I knew nothing whatever about the board except as I appeared as a witness before it.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. As I understand, there was nothing kept out of the Roberts report; that it was all delivered to the public. There was something kept out about the magic, but it was not kept from the members of the board, and it is now delivered to the Senators.

Senator FERGUSON. General, did I understand you correctly that certain parts were deleted from the Roberts report?

General MARSHALL. The Roberts report on Pearl Harbor, reading from my letter to Governor Dewey—had to have withdrawn from it all reference to this highly secret matter, therefore in portions it necessarily appeared incomplete.

I am referring to the public release of the board.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I have in mind.

General MARSHALL. That is it.

Senator FERGUSON. Before that report was issued there [3173] were certain things taken out of it?

General MARSHALL. Before that report was made public there were certain things withdrawn.

Senator FERGUSON. And it was not made public until sometime in January 1942, isn't that right?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir. That is a matter of record.

Senator FERGUSON. We are clear on that, that certain parts were taken out before it was made public?

General MARSHALL. That is correct. I am quite certain, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you had that information in September of 1944, because you wrote the letter at that time.

General MARSHALL. Oh, yes; sir.

[3174] Senator FERGUSON. Might I ask counsel now if there is in existence or whether counsel for the committee has that full report?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have had it for about 3 months.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you furnish the part taken out according to the General's statement?

Mr. MITCHELL. There never was anything taken out, if you mean extracted or hidden, or anything.

Senator FERGUSON. Have I indicated that anything was hidden out of that report?

Mr. MITCHELL. I should think your questions were directed to that but if I am mistaken—

Senator FERGUSON. You certainly are mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. Let counsel finish his answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I understand it now, there is no part of the Roberts report that isn't available. I don't think any question has been raised about that.

Senator FERGUSON. Could counsel get the Roberts report before the deletions? The general has indicated in his letter that to his knowledge there were certain things taken out.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator, may I ask you this, when you say "taken out"—

Senator FERGUSON. I am quoting the General.

[3175] The CHAIRMAN. Let's see what really happened. It might mean one thing to say certain things in a report were taken out, that is, they were eliminated altogether. It might mean another thing to say certain parts of a report were not published, but that it went to the President as originally drafted.

Senator FERGUSON. May we have from the witness what his understanding was?

General MARSHALL. My understanding was, and I am speaking on hearsay, because I had no control over the matter, that the complete report went to the President but that the portions that referred to magic were withdrawn from the portion of the report which was released to the public.

Senator FERGUSON. Have I misquoted you, General?

General MARSHALL. There has been so much conversation I am a little confused, but the complete report, as I understand it—and I am not an authority on that—went to the President, and the portions that were considered top secret, which were magic, were pulled out of that before a general release to the public. That is my understanding, but I am not the best authority on that. That is my understanding and it was on that that this part of the letter was based.

Senator FERGUSON. From whom did you get your information?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall. I presume from the Secretary of the War on G-2. That would probably be where I would [3176] get it. Either one or the other.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you got the Roberts report before you?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I have not.

Senator FERGUSON. Would counsel give the General the Roberts report?

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator, you have spoken of the "report." That term has sometimes been used as applied to the findings, opinion, and sometimes the transcript.

Now, as far as the report is concerned it always has been complete. The fact is that the transcript shows that at certain stages of the proceedings they took some evidence about this secret stuff that they never transcribed and we don't know, of course, what it was. Maybe that is what you are referring to.

Senator FERGUSON. My knowledge on this subject has come solely from the General, now the witness.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have had the Roberts transcript, copies of it, for months, and it has been handed around; every now and then you find that transcript shows that they stopped taking evidence on the record and took some evidence off of the record. I think we have had a request to find out what the evidence off the record was and we have never found it because there isn't any such record, as far as I can ascertain.

[3177] Senator FERGUSON. I will read from the bottom of page 2 of the letter produced by you yesterday, General:

The Roberts report on Pearl Harbor had to have withdrawn from it all reference to this highly secret matter, therefore in portions it necessarily appears incomplete.

Now, have you and I been talking about the report, is that what we are talking about?

General MARSHALL. I was dictating in regard to the report as I understood its make-up.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

General MARSHALL. I would like to add that I have never read the report. I made this statement from my general understanding of the matter with the approval of the then G-2 of the War Department. I knew that secret matter had been testified to because I testified to a portion of it myself. I knew that that was not released to the public.

Senator FERGUSON. General, do you have the report before you?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would someone give him the report?

Mr. MURPHY. Here it is [handing the report to the witness].

General MARSHALL. I have it.

Senator FERGUSON. On page 8, reading from the report, [3178] down in the last paragraph:

The Navy Department sent three messages to the Commander in Chief of the Pacific Fleet, the first on December 3, stating that it was believed certain Japanese Consulates were destroying their codes and burning secret documents.

Wouldn't that indicate that we were breaking the code because that information came through magic and as shown by the testimony of the Navy Board that was the purple code?

General MARSHALL. "Stating that it was believed"?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. Well, it depends, it seems to me, on the deduction you make regarding this statement "it was believed certain Japanese Consulates were destroying their codes and burning secret documents."

Senator FERGUSON. (Reading:)

The second one, the 2d of December 1941, instructed addressee to destroy confidential documents, and so on.

That has nothing to do with it.

On page 9 (reading):

About noon eastern standard time, 8:30 American Honolulu time¹, December 7, an additional warning message—that is before the attack—

indicating an almost immediate break in relations between the United States and Japan was dispatched to the Chief of Staff after conferences with the Chief of [3179] Naval Operations for the information of the responsible Army and Navy Commanders. Every effort was made to have the message as brief as possible but due to conditions beyond the control of anyone concerned the delivery of this urgent message was delayed until after the attack.

Didn't that clearly show, General, that we had intercepted the 14-part and the pilot message prior to the time of its delivery?

General MARSHALL. That might be, Senator. I think that is a matter of opinion. Evidently this was worded very carefully in order to convey an essential fact for the information of those reading the report and at the same time not to disclose the source of the information. That would be my estimate.

Senator FERGUSON. You had never read the report, you say?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I had not.

Senator FERGUSON. Now then, General—were you going to say something else?

General MARSHALL. I might say I anticipated going through all of these documents later this month but I was not given the opportunity.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

[3180] The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Murphy.

Mr. MURPHY. Do we have the report, the original report given by the Roberts Board to the President of the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have never had the original. We have got a photostat copy of the transcript and we have got one mimeographed copy.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it a complete report so far as your investigation reveals?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is presumably the transcript of everything that they transcribed. I tried to point out that the transcript, not the findings, does show that there was some evidence taken off the record, and they never did have it transcribed.

Mr. MURPHY. Is it a complete copy of what was given to the President?

Mr. MITCHELL. I so understand. I always so understood. But I will have to check again to make certain.

Senator FERGUSON. Will counsel, because of this testimony, get the original that was delivered to the President, with the signatures?

Mr. MITCHELL. We will get it if we can lay our hands on it. I suppose it is in existence.¹

Senator FERGUSON. You would expect that it would; it [3181] is an important document.

Mr. MITCHELL. It might be in the Archives Building. We will make an effort to see if we can get anything back farther than the copies furnished us 3 months ago by the War Department.

Senator FERGUSON. General, you stated yesterday that there was some question of the secrecy of the magic, that you tried to get the FBI to do some work for you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. What I think I said, and what I intended to convey was, that there had been frequent rumors, and in one case direct reports to me, of gossip here in Washington regarding the fact that we had intercepted Japanese codes. Of course, there were always other statements and conversations which were of a highly dangerous nature so far as security was concerned. I sent requests orally through G-2, orally to Mr. Hoover, to assist the War Department in trying to check this matter by the usual methods that they would follow, as related to Army officers.

I was told in each case Mr. Hoover was very reluctant to engage his personnel in investigating any Government agency for the reason that he did not wish to be put in the position of running a sort of Gestapo. I don't know as he used the word "Gestapo." However, my recollection is—but the G-2 officials can corroborate this or give other testimony—the [3182] FBI did assist us in checking conversations going around Washington in the various hotels, dinners, and so forth, in an effort to find out how serious this matter was, and particularly for the purpose of my making an example of somebody which would discourage further indiscretions by Army officers.

We received no conclusive case. I think we had one that we finally could not try under some legal technicality which would have prevented a conviction. That is my recollection of that phase of the matter which I referred to yesterday.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that an Army officer?

General MARSHALL. These were all Army officers.

Senator FERGUSON. You had reason to believe that there was a leak in the Army on this magic?

General MARSHALL. I didn't know whether it was in the Army or not, but it was apparently in official Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. In what?

General MARSHALL. Official Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. General, do I understand that you had some evidence on one particular officer and there was something wrong with the jurisdiction?

General MARSHALL. There was some complication in regard to the probability of conviction. I don't know, Senator, as that related specifically to magic. I don't know whether [3183] that occurred a year after this or a year before this. Presumably it would be at this time or at a later time rather than a year before. I am just giving you my recollection of my efforts to stop this indiscreet talk.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the FBI give you full cooperation?

General MARSHALL. So far as I know.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you going to make another answer?

General MARSHALL. I was, but I have forgotten it.

Senator FERGUSON. You had full cooperation from the FBI?

General MARSHALL. So far as I know. I merely wanted to make plain their reluctance and the reason.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any evidence on anyone that you thought was sufficient to convict them of this crime of giving this secret out during war?

General MARSHALL. No case where we thought we had the basis of a conviction. We had rumors, we had conversations reported to me that it was common knowledge of this, or common knowledge of that, particularly in relation to affairs shortly after the first, I think after the first creation of the Pearl Harbor Investigating Board, not the Roberts Board, but the later.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you place whether or not this matter that you took to Mr. Hoover and the FBI was prior to Pearl Harbor or subsequent?

[3184] General MARSHALL. I think it was subsequent, though there may have been some prior. I can't remember, Senator; I am sorry. There were several times that I asked G-2 to go to Mr. Hoover to help us. We were always in a state of trying to run down some leak out of the War Department.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any department to take care of that kind of a matter yourself?

General MARSHALL. G-2 had a number of people engaged in that.

Senator FERGUSON. They had not only espionage but counter-espionage?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; specifically that. I thought, however, that in all probability the FBI was better equipped for the purpose.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was really in charge of magic?

General MARSHALL. In charge of what?

Senator FERGUSON. Magic. Who was designated by you to be in charge of this magic?

General MARSHALL. Up to and including this time I had never changed the original set-up, the reception, deciphering and translation, which, so far as the Army portion was concerned, was carried out by a section of the Signal Corps under General Mauborgne. The material was then passed on to the G-2 of the Army and the circulation of it occurred [3185] Thereafter under his direction.

Senator FERGUSON. Did G-2 have any instructions from you to furnish intercepted information to the Hawaiian Department during November and early December 1941?

General MARSHALL. I recall giving no such specific instructions.

[3186] Senator FERGUSON. Were you aware that information and enemy intelligence was being withheld from G-2 in Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. I was not aware of that, sir. If you mean it was being withheld from G-2 in Hawaii——

Senator FERGUSON. Just not being given to them.

General MARSHALL (continuing). By the Naval opposite, I was unaware of that. If it was being withheld from G-2 in Hawaii by the G-2 in the War Department, if you mean that, I don't think "withheld" would be quite the word we would use.

Senator FERGUSON. What would we use?

General MARSHALL. It was a question of what portions should be given to G-2 in Hawaii. I was not aware that they were withholding from him information which was considered vital to the proper performance of duty by General Short.

Senator FERGUSON. Who was responsible for the amount of intelligence from G-2 that went to Hawaii.

General MARSHALL. The G-2 of the War Department, General Miles.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you give him any instructions on it whatever?

General MARSHALL. No specific instructions that I recall.

[3187] Senator FERGUSON. Did you have instructions from any one, for instance, the Secretary of War?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The Secretary of State, did you confer with him on what ought to go and what should not go?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then you would say that whatever instructions G-2 had, General Miles, was given to him by you and by no one else?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Under your authority as chief of staff?

General MARSHALL. He was operating under my authority.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever conferred with Secretary of War Stimson on the information that was coming to you through magic?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; with great frequency. I often called his attention to portions of it where I thought he might not have had time to read the entire folder. There was quite a mass of this material. It was a question of how much time you had for the purpose, and how quickly you could read. I recall taking my copies to him on several occasions in order to be certain that he saw them.

[3188] Senator FERGUSON. Do you remember making an affidavit before General Clausen?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Does counsel have that?

Mr. MURPHY. You mean Colonel Clausen.

Senator FERGUSON. Colonel Clausen.

The part I would like to have you check is your affidavit of the 28th of August 1945, before Colonel Clausen, where you stated that "prior to the 7th of December"—

General MARSHALL. Which page is that?

Senator FERGUSON. I have taken that out of the affidavit, the part reading:

Concerning intercepts of the character mentioned, it was my understanding in the period preceding the 7th of December 1941, that the Commanding General of the Hawaiian Department was aware of and was receiving some of this information from facilities available in his command.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that your understanding?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; but there is a confusion there in connection with what I was explaining this morning. They were receiving information as to intercepts, as to the locations of Japanese vessels at sea and their movements and the headquarters that were concerned in this.

[3189] The actual translation, that is, the deciphering, translation, and transmission of the magic, as such, clearly was not intended to be applied in this.

Senator FERGUSON. So you would correct that now to interpret it so as to make it indicate that you were not inferring that General Short was getting this other kind of magic?

General MARSHALL. I said some of this information. I tried to explain what some of that was.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether he was getting any of the diplomatic magic?

General MARSHALL. I do not think he was, except to the extent, I recall, that we broke into magic in July 1941, meaning that we took the information from magic which came as diplomatic information. The Japanese instructions regarding shipping as to the Panama Canal. Just as we again moved into the diplomatic channels of magic on December 7 regarding the 1 p. m. message and sent that direct. Those are the two occasions that I think the record shows, and that I can recall between the first of July 1941, and December 7, 1941, that the magic material was directly referred to in so many words in messages to General Short.

Senator FERGUSON. Did we put through some kind of an order restricting the amount of Japanese shipping that could [3190] go through the Panama Canal?

General MARSHALL. We stopped it all but the message I am referring to, from the War Department to General Short, recited the Japanese instructions taken from magic regarding the movement of shipping into the Panama Canal during the period of some days in the middle of July.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever notify General Short that you found it impossible or that you were not furnishing him all available G-2 data for reasons of security?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I have no recollection of that.

Senator FERGUSON. So then he could not have any knowledge as to whether or not he was getting all that G-2 had or had not?

General MARSHALL. Presumably so. Here is the message I was referring to.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you read it?

General MARSHALL. It is dated Washington, D. C., July 8, 1941. It is only the later portion I refer to, but I will read it all (reading from Exhibit No. 32:)

Hawallan Department, Fort Shafter, T. H.

Nine two four seven AGMC for your information deduction from information from numerous sources is that Japanese Government has determined upon its future policy which is [3191] supported by all principal Japanese political and military groups Period This policy is at present one of watchful waiting involving probable aggressive action against maritime provinces of Russia if and when Siberian garrison has been materially reduced in strength and it becomes evident that Germany will win a decisive victory in European Russia Period Opinion is that Jap activity in the south will be for the present confined to seizure and development of naval army and air bases in Indochina although an advance against the British and Dutch cannot be entirely ruled out Period Neutrality pact with Russia may be abrogated Period. They have ordered all Jap vessels in US Atlantic ports to be west of Panama Canal by first August Period Movement of Jap shipping from Japan has been suspended and additional merchant vessels are being requisitioned.

Signed "Adams," who was the Adjutant General.

I was referring specifically to the last sentence which is taken almost entirely from magic, other portions were in magic, but—that came to us in various ways—but the last sentence was from magic direct.

[3192] Senator FERGUSON. When you sent the message on the 7th, General, that is, the noon on the 7th, did you consider the question of security?

General MARSHALL. Do you mean, Senator, in relation to the form of the message?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; both the form and the means of sending it.

General MARSHALL. I only knew that it would be encoded, which is done very rapidly on a type machine and automatically. My only recollection regarding the security aspect—and it is difficult for me to state this with any assurance that I am being accurate because I am confused in back sights—was we must be sufficiently secure to prevent some claim of overt act on our part and, therefore, the telephone was ruled out.

Now, I am not at all certain that that did rule out the telephone. That might have been an afterthought after the event; I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to talk to you about that for a moment.

General MARSHALL. But I assume that this message—in fact, I had seen that this message to which you just referred was going to be enciphered in secure code and decoded in that manner.

[3193] Senator FERGUSON. Well, you felt rather sure at that particular moment that you were sending this message that something would happen somewhere at 1 o'clock, or prior to 1 o'clock?

General MARSHALL. Something of some serious nature was going to be synchronized with that 1 o'clock.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Well, then, you were thinking about the question of security and as to whether or not you would use the telephone. Now, how could the use of that telephone to Hawaii have been an overt act of war by America against Japan in alerting Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. I think, Senator, that the Japanese would have grasped at most any straw to bring to such portions of our public that doubted our integrity of action that we were committing an act that forced action on their part.

I say again I am not at all clear as to what my reasons were regarding the telephone because 4 years later it is very difficult for me to tell what went on in my mind at the time. I will say this, though: It was in my mind regarding the use of transocean telephone.

Mr. Roosevelt, the President, had been in the frequent habit of talking to the Prime Minister by telephone. He also used to talk to Mr. Bullitt when he was Ambassador in [3194] Paris and my recollection is that that was intercepted by the Germans.

I had a test made of induction from telephone conversations on the Atlantic cable from Gardner's Island. I found that that could be picked up by induction. I talked to the President not once but several times. I also later, after we were in the war, talked with the Prime Minister in an endeavor to have them be more careful in the use of the scrambler. I believe it is understood what that is.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. Because in our terminology that is private and not secret. A casual person listening in would not know what we were talking about. The person intent and with the facilities for breaking through in your communications can do it. It was long after we were in the war before we were able to install a scrambler system, which is now in vogue and which is quite elaborate, that was felt to be secret. Therefore, whether or not our overseas communication, overseas telephone communication, was secure or not was a question. I might go—

Senator FERGUSON. Will you explain for our benefit now what a scrambler is?

General MARSHALL. A scrambler is a machine which takes your conversation and mixes it up into something that sounds [3195] like Chinese; that is the nearest I can give you.

Senator FERGUSON. Almost like static, isn't it?

General MARSHALL. Well, no; it is not a roar so much as it is just a hash of sounds and if you press a certain button it comes to you in understandable English. Now, a person—

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, you unscramble it.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; you unscramble it, anyone at the other end if he has the machine and presses the button.

Senator FERGUSON. All along the line it is scrambled and in that machine it is unscrambled?

General MARSHALL. Until it gets to the other end of the line.

Now, I might illustrate a little further our telephone reactions because I undertook to try one officer for the use of the telephone from Panama, which we found all taken down here and that was furnished to me in writing by a naval intercept, where they were checking on the time and indiscretions of that nature.

I called this commander to get him up here, the officer going to Panama and the commander going the other way and then I found myself in the same difficulty with the commander in his conversation from Hawaii and then we hung up on him.

[3196] I had several conversations with the western defense commander and I hung up the phone because of the indiscretions in the excitement and argument that were being made over the phone. We were always in danger of that and we were quite aware of it, because the telephone is a very easy instrument to tap and the radio telephone, I believe, is even easier, but I want to repeat again that I have no clear recollection whatsoever as to my own reactions as to why I did not attempt to telephone at this time, but I have one conclusion that I think is quite accurate, that I certainly would have called up General MacArthur first.

Senator FERGUSON. You had a scramble telephone to Hawaii and the Philippines at that time?

General MARSHALL. I don't know about the Philippines but I know we had it in to Hawaii.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever talked to General Short on the scramble telephone?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have a line to General MacArthur?

General MARSHALL. We had a means of telephone communication but I do not recall whether or not we had a scrambler.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you talk to General MacArthur the first 7 days of December 1941?

[3197] General MARSHALL. No, sir; and I do not recall I ever did talk to him on the telephone.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not recall that you ever talked to him?

General MARSHALL. Then or since.

Senator FERGUSON. On the telephone?

General MARSHALL. On the telephone.

Senator FERGUSON. You mentioned about acquiring balloons and they were to be ready for Pearl Harbor in June.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you tell us why they were not ready?

General MARSHALL. We had not been able to procure them up to that time. I don't know just what the intricacies were in the procedure in getting to the Congress through the Bureau of the Budget with the President's approval to arrange the necessary appropriations. I think that the records of the War Department can be produced before the committee to show when the War Department itself first represented to the Bureau of the Budget the desire for funds for the purpose of barrage balloons.

Senator FERGUSON. Would these things, such as the barrage balloons, be taken up at these council meetings?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

[3198] Senator FERGUSON. Were minutes made of the council meetings?

General MARSHALL. Do you mean those of Mr. Hull and the secretaries?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I mean of the people who attended the War Council meetings?

General MARSHALL. I think the record shows in his office who were there, but there were no formal minutes that I recall ever seeing.

Senator FERGUSON. Who were the people authorized to attend the council meetings?

General MARSHALL. I do not know, Senator, as to whether you could express it as authorized. I think it was those asked to sit in. Now, what the arrangement was between Secretary Hull, Mr. Stimson, and Colonel Knox I do not know and I am not the best witness. My dim recollection is and I believe possibly is in Mr. Stimson's testimony there, that he suggested the meetings, but that would be a matter of record.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, we have some council meetings here looking like minutes in the Army.

General MARSHALL. Well, that is the Army.

Senator FERGUSON. That is a different council?

General MARSHALL. That is a different council; yes, sir. [3199] I think that is a formal one for which there is a solid basis of regulation.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Did you keep on holding these council meetings in the Army, as far as these council meetings are concerned, until December 7?

General MARSHALL. We are still holding general council meetings.

Senator FERGUSON. You are still holding them?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And so far as you know there are minutes kept of those meetings?

General MARSHALL. Yes; they are published in a regular book now and I think they were in that form then.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. I think for the purpose of the record and just to call it to all the committee's attention, there is an important entry on page 67 of the United States News on barrage balloons saying:

Barrage balloons and smoke were also considered as means of defense but were rejected, the barrage balloons because they would interfere with the activity of U. S. aircraft, and the smoke because the strength of the prevailing winds would render it ineffective.

[3200] Senator FERGUSON. Did you reject it, General?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. That, I believe, took place out there. I might say, Senator, we had that trouble all the time. I flew out to the west coast personally in regard to that immediately, shortly after the Pearl Harbor affair and took General Doolittle with me just as he returned, to check that, in order to straighten out the barrage balloon problem at San Diego, which was about the only fairly effective defense of that great B-24 plant there.

At that time there was naval objection by the local naval officers to having any barrage balloons any place because of its interference with the seaplanes coming in for landings and I went there personally on a Sunday morning to the plant, got the naval officers and finally reached an agreement which permitted it in a modified way, which permitted us in a modified way to put up barrage balloons immediately.

There was always a question as to where you could use smoke to advantage or where the smoke might be to your disadvantage and, of course, part of that depended upon the efficiency of the smoke machines.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know about the decision not to use barrage balloons at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. I presume I did, sir. I do not recall, though.

[3201] Senator FERGUSON. You do not recall it now?

General MARSHALL. I presume I did.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you say, General, now that they could have used torpedoes on these ships if we had had barrage balloons?

General MARSHALL. I could not answer that, sir. I would be interested to find out if they did use them afterwards, after they had plenty of balloons and plenty of time to consider it and I do not know now whether or not they did. My recollection is I never saw them there.

Senator FERGUSON. You mentioned the other day about the building of the radar in the Park Service. Do you know how long it took the Park Service to allow you to put these permanent radar stations up?

General MARSHALL. My recollection, without referring to the record, is that we finally got the general approval about May 15.

Senator FERGUSON. Were they completed at the time?

General MARSHALL. My understanding is that for the fixed stations they were not completed.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not your inability to get from the Park Service the right to build them delayed you in the production of those stations?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. I am not the best witness [3202] on that but I am told it had something to do with transportation and matériel and something to do with the engineering officer in that district and so far as I know had no relation to the Park Service, though I am not the best witness on that.

Senator FERGUSON. But you have received some knowledge that you had that delay?

General MARSHALL. I think there was a delay to the point that the fixed stations were not working at all on December 7, or were not workable on December 7.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know anything about the Colonel Wyman case?

General MARSHALL. Well, that is what I had reference to when I said that I did not think it was the Park Service. I was not clear on the details of that case. They did not come to my attention until long afterwards and then only the name and the fact that it was at issue.

Senator FERGUSON. So that really all you know about the Wyman case is the name "Wyman." You have no knowledge of the facts?

General MARSHALL. I have no detailed knowledge of the facts.

Senator FERGUSON. You have no knowledge of the facts?

General MARSHALL. I have no knowledge of the facts; no. [3203] sir.

Senator FERGUSON. In relation to exhibit 13, that is the Martin-Bellinger report—

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (continuing). You are familiar with that now?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is the Martin report.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; they call it the Martin report.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Exhibit 13.

General MARSHALL. I know what you are referring to.

Senator FERGUSON. You are familiar with that?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. In fact you requested it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know why nothing was done in relation to it?

General MARSHALL. I do not know—you say that nothing was done in relation to it, Senator. It was a question when the matériel would be available in which to carry out the desires expressed in the recommendations of that report.

I believe I stated in my testimony yesterday in relation to the principal proposal of the Board, which was for 180 [3204] four-engine bombers, that at that time the Army possessed all over the world, including the continental United States, about 148, of which I think some sixty odd were here for training of personnel, some were in Panama, 35 were in the Philippines, 12 were in Hawaii. It was a question, of course, in the first place of the availability of matériel.

Now, in the memorandum which I directed the secretary of the general staff to issue or, rather, not in the memorandum but part of the thought behind the memorandum was we were not only trying to resurvey with the later information available what appeared to be the full requirements for the proper defense of Hawaii, particularly in case the Fleet was not present there, to what extent we could manage the affair by holding certain planes on the west coast until an emergency seemed to develop, and the reason for that was we in some way had to train the people for the new bombers coming out; and unless we had these bombers for our use we could not develop the crews to handle the new product.

I had discussed with General Arnold the sending of men out to Hawaii to train out there and the question there was the over-use of the bombers they had and the interference in the air with the general activities of the Army and the Navy by training flights to that extent, so we were trying to double in brass as it were; have certain bombers ear- [3205] marked for Hawaii but available for day to day training on the west coast and that was part of the thought behind the memorandum I had issued which brought about the Martin report.

Senator FERGUSON. At the time of Pearl Harbor you knew that the Army did not have long-distance reconnaissance?

General MARSHALL. I knew they only had 12 B-17's. I did not know just what the Navy had in their PBY's.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know what the arrangement was between the Army and the Navy as to who could or could not have long-range reconnaissance?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I was aware of that, as I believe I explained before, for the reason that the Air Corps officials in Washington brought to me an opposition to the arrangement General Short had made and I thought General Short's arrangement was a wise one under the circumstances and therefore did not accept the local War Department Air Corps officials' protest as sound.

Senator FERGUSON. Had any of your reports with their predictions ever taken up the question of attack through the vacant sea as it has been described here to us? That is the part north of Hawaii.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I understand what the vacant sea is. I suppose I am quite certain that I read the [3206] discussions that involved that in going through the plans in the War Plans Division when I was the head of that division and when it was my particular function to read in detail all the plans, which are very voluminous papers, of course, and also to participate in the discussions regarding the continual revisions of those plans.

Senator FERGUSON. General, do you know what started the conferences on the ABCD agreement—or, first, the ABC agreement?

General MARSHALL. My recollection on the thing was entirely hazy but Admiral Stark told me over the telephone, I believe, a few days ago when I questioned him in regard to it—and he, of course, is the proper witness to answer this—that he had initiated the proposal after bringing it to me and I had concurred with him, and he arranged through Admiral Ghormley in London for the procedure.

Senator LUCAS. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I will yield.

Senator LUCAS. Do I understand from counsel that there was an ABCD agreement that was concurred in by this country?

Mr. MITCHELL. The staff speaks of it as an agreement but it was a report by naval and military officers of both countries making certain recommendations. They had an agreement to report on that; that is what you mean.

[3207] General MARSHALL. The Army members and Navy members concurred in the report with the British representatives and the Secretary of War and I believe the Secretary of the Navy also favorably expressed themselves on it, and the President, I think, never expressed himself one way or the other, not to me at least, and not in writing.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, in the object—if you will just refer, General, to the report marked "American-Dutch-British Conversations, Singapore, in April, 1941"?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And refer to the "Object," on page 7. I read:

Our most important interests in the Far East are:

- (a) The security of sea communications and
- (b) The security of Singapore.

An important subsidiary interest is the security of Luzon in the Philippine Islands since, so long as submarine and air forces can be operated from Luzon, expeditions to threaten Malaya or the Netherlands East Indies from the East are out-flanked.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. What is the question, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know why Hawaii is not included in that? [3208]

General MARSHALL. This is a Far East survey, sir; not a Central Pacific.

Senator FERGUSON. Then we will not find the Hawaiian Islands in any way connected with this ABCD agreement?

General MARSHALL. I do not think so, sir. Of course, that was a naval base en route to the Far East, but this conference at Singapore related to Far Eastern conditions.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, General, you were talking there about the Philippines being on the flank if they were going south.

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Wouldn't Pearl Harbor also be on their flank?

General MARSHALL. Not in that sense, sir. Pearl Harbor is a good many thousand miles from the China Sea and the movement of the Japanese would be south through the China Sea. Pearl Harbor, of course, is about 2,400 miles west of the coast of California. It dominates the Central Pacific. It does not dominate the China Sea.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you familiar with what Mr. Churchill said on the 27th of January 1942 in relation to Pearl Harbor being on the flank?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir.

[3209] Senator FERGUSON. You do not recall such a statement. You would not consider, then, that the base and the ships that we had would be considered by a military authority as being on the flank of a movement south into Malay, Singapore, and the Netherlands East Indies?

General MARSHALL. I think not in the sense that we ordinarily use "the flank." San Diego is on the flank in that sense as well as Hawaii.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether Japan ever knew of this ABCD arrangement?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. You say that Admiral Stark—you talked to him recently. Do you know whether he called that conference?

General MARSHALL. My understanding of what Admiral Stark told me was the proposition was brought up by Admiral Ghormley who was on duty in London and he, Admiral Stark, thought it was a wise procedure and discussed it with me and I concurred and the arrangements were then made by Admiral Stark, I believe, through Admiral Ghormley. Admiral Stark, of course, is the authoritative witness in the matter.

Senator FERGUSON. Exhibit 45 indicates that you had approved the plan. Is that correct?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

[3210] Senator FERGUSON. And you presented it to the President?

General MARSHALL. I presented it, as I recall, to the Secretary of War and Admiral Stark to the Secretary of the Navy.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, the Secretary of War approved it also, did he not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The Secretary of the Navy approved it and Admiral Stark approved it?

General MARSHALL. I think that is correct.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. To get the record straight, you said, "You approved the plan" without specifying which one. There are three plans.

Mr. MITCHELL. This memo I think relates to British conversations, not to the Singapore. I couldn't tell until I read it.

Senator FERGUSON. I will strike out the exhibit. You did approve the various plans?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; that is my recollection, but the record will show, I think.

Senator FERGUSON. The one with China and with the [3211] Netherlands East Indies.

General MARSHALL. I don't know which one you are referring to.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Let General Marshall conclude his answer.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. I don't know just what one you are referring to when you say with China.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield at that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. The testimony is that the Chief of Staff approved the original ABC-1 and ABC-2, I believe. He also approved the Canadian but did not approve the Singapore.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you let the General see the Singapore, the memo on whether or not he approved it? I do not think the memo applies to Singapore; but I will ask you now, did you ever approve?

Mr. MITCHELL. When you say "memo" you mean that memorandum by General Gerow to General Marshall, that he has in his hand? I would like to know.

Senator FERGUSON. It is dated June 2, 1941, to the President at the White House, "Dear Mr. President," signed [3212] by Henry L. Stimson, Secretary of War and Frank Knox, Secretary of the Navy.

Attached to it is a letter, June the 9th by W. P. Scobey, and attached to that is one of August 20, 1941, and to that is one of August 29, 1941, signed "O. K." That is the part on Canada. "O. K., F. D. R." Signed, "W. P. Scobey."

General MARSHALL. You haven't any memorandum here in regard to the Singapore?

Mr. GESELL. No.

General MARSHALL. I will have to get some data on that. I do not recall just the details.

Senator FERGUSON. Does counsel have any data that he can give to the general?

Mr. MURPHY. You have the testimony of General Gerow on that.

Mr. MITCHELL. General Gerow says he never approved it. The document he has in his hand involves ABC-1 and 2 and not the British at all and also involves the Canadian. The record memo shows that ABC-1 and 2—that Rainbow 5, I think it was, was put up to the President and he refused to approve them because ABC-1 and 2 had not been approved by the parties that were involved in it and the Canadian was the only one that was approved, as I understand it.

[3213] Mr. MURPHY. The President approved the Canadian one. He did not approve the ABC-1 and 2 and neither Admiral Stark or the Chief of Staff approved the Pacific one.

Senator FERGUSON. General, do you have any knowledge as to whether or not you did or did not approve the one made at Singapore?

General MARSHALL. I will have to go into my record, sir, and refresh my mind.

Senator FERGUSON. You haven't any present knowledge about that?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I haven't.

Senator FERGUSON. This letter of June 9th said the President had familiarized himself with the two papers but since the report of the United States-British Staff Conversations, ABC-1, had not been approved by the British Government he would not approve the report at this time, neither would he now give approval to the Joint Army and Navy Basic War Plan Rainbow 5 which is based upon the report of ABC-1. However, in case of war the papers would be returned to the President for his approval.

Do you know whether or not Britain ever approved this ABC-1?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know of any information in the [3214] War Department as to whether or not they ever approved ABC-1?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that. I imagine General Gerow can speak authoritatively from the records.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not the President ever approved ABC-1?

General MARSHALL. Not to my knowledge.

Senator FERGUSON. Did ABC-1 ever go into effect?

General MARSHALL. In general effect it did because it involved the policy of the main fight in the Atlantic and the defensive principle in the Pacific.

Senator FERGUSON. How did it go into effect if not approved? Was it approved in part and not approved in part?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, Senator, just what the proceeding was. Once we got into the war we all had a common understanding of the almost imperative necessity of being on the defensive in the Pacific until we got control of the situation in the Atlantic.

We had a formal meeting of the British and American Chiefs of Staff and with the President and with the Prime Minister which began shortly after Christmas or, in other words, shortly after Pearl Harbor in December 1941, where general agreements for the combined cooperation in the conduct of the war were arrived at. There was no overt action in the way of carrying out a joint plan between December 7 and [3215] that of the date of the British-American meetings that I can recall.

Senator FERGUSON. General, this plan depended upon an attack, did it not?

General MARSHALL. You mean ABC-1?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; in the Pacific.

General MARSHALL. Well, it meant that we were not going to launch a war in the Pacific but that in the event we became involved in a war in the Pacific we would be on the defensive.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MURPHY. On page 9 of General Marshall's report is the following (reading):

On December 23, 1941, Winston Churchill, Prime Minister of Great Britain, accompanied by the British Chiefs of Staff, arrived in Washington to confer with the President and the American Chiefs of Staff. Out of the series of discussions which then followed resulted an agreement, not only regarding the immediate strategy for our combined conduct of the war, but also for the organization of a method for the strategical command and control of British and American military resources.

Senator FERGUSON. What is the date of that, Congressman?

Mr. MURPHY. December 23, 1941. Page 9, report of General [3216] Marshall covering the period July 1, 1941, to June 30, 1943.

Senator FERGUSON. General, does that refresh your memory that nothing was done prior to that about approving it?

General MARSHALL. I think that is the case, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did it come into effect in the Atlantic?

General MARSHALL. It went into effect in the Atlantic to the extent that we utilized what we then had in the Atlantic to carry out what amounted to the same plan as outlined here in ABC-1. There was no transfer at that time of ships, as I recall, from the Pacific to the Atlantic and I do not know if there were any transferred during that period from the Atlantic to the Pacific, though there may have been.

We did not make any general operational moves except some naval moves by the vessels there in the vicinity of Hawaii based on Pearl Harbor and those of Admiral Hart's contingent of the Asiatic Fleet in the Philippines. We were operating there for a few days just under the rules of stern necessity. We met then with the British and reached a formal agreement in regard to the conduct of the war.

Senator FERGUSON. General, that—

General MARSHALL. May I go a little further?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. This plan presented to us a basis for [3217] joint operations, for territories that one or the other would consider himself responsible, so that at the very beginning we had a fair understanding of what we had best do rather than the necessity of engaging in prolonged conversations such as were required to reach this report after we once became involved and engaged in the war.

Senator FERGUSON. General, did it take an attack to put the plan into effect?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What is your definition of an attack that would put it into effect?

General MARSHALL. Well, Pearl Harbor was an attack.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; no doubt about that.

General MARSHALL. There was no other at that particular time, though a few hours later there was an attack on the Philippines.

Senator FERGUSON. I am going to read you a definition of an attack.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. (Reading):

Modern warfare has injected a new definition for that word "attack." There was a time when we could afford to say that we would not fight unless attacked and then wait until the physical attack came upon us before starting to shoot. Modern techniques of warfare have changed all that. An attack today is a very different thing. An attack today begins as soon as any base has been occupied from which our security is threatened. That base may be thousands of miles away from our shores. The American Government must of necessity decide at which point any threat of attack against this hemisphere has begun and to make their stand when that point has been reached.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask the Senator what he is reading from?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I first want to ask the General whether or not he agrees with that definition of "attack"?

General MARSHALL. I do not find myself in any particular disagreement with it but it is a considerable discussion of a certain definition.

Senator FERGUSON. I cannot hear you.

General MARSHALL. I say I do not find myself in specific disagreement with any part of that, but it is a considerable generalization.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, would you say that that kind of an attack, defined in that paragraph that I read you, was such as to put into effect these various plans or any of them?

General MARSHALL. Well, if—

[3219] Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the General answer his question.

General MARSHALL. If you are referring, Senator, to some key paragraph in the agreement, in the American-British-Dutch conversations at Singapore—or is it ABC-1 you are talking about?

Senator FERGUSON. I am talking about—

General MARSHALL. ABC-1?

Senator FERGUSON (continuing): ABC-1, I will first talk about that.

General MARSHALL. ABC-1 To put that plan into actual effect I would say that that definition would not apply because there would be plenty of time for the Government itself to take care of consideration of whether or not it would commit itself on that basis. When you have an overt, close-striking operation which you must respond to instantly, then you have the sort of attack that compels an instant response with or without plans.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the ABC-1 apply to the Pacific?

General MARSHALL. Senator, I must apologize for looking at these things.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; I want you to look at them.

General MARSHALL. I haven't read them for 4 years.

[3220] Senator FERGUSON. I want to get the record clear on it.

General MARSHALL. And it takes me some time to catch up with it.

Senator FERGUSON. What exhibit have you now, General? Will counsel put in the record what he has?

General MARSHALL. I have Exhibit 49.

Senator FERGUSON. Exhibit 49?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, that is the one you say that the definition that I read would not put it into effect?

General MARSHALL. That would be my opinion.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, take the other plan, Exhibit 50. That is the American-Dutch-British.

General MARSHALL. What I am trying to do, Senator, before I answer any of your questions—you talk about a paragraph in this plan that is automatic in the event of an attack by an enemy.

Mr. MURPHY. May I, Mr. Chairman, direct the witness' attention to the bottom of the second page?

Purposes of the Staff Conference:

To determine the best methods by which the armed forces of the United States and British Commonwealth, with its present Allies, could defeat Germany and the Powers allied with her, should the United States be com- [3221] pelled to resort to war.

General MARSHALL. Where are you reading from, please?

Mr. MURPHY. Page 2 of Exhibit 50, General.

General MARSHALL. Of Exhibit 50? Well, I have got Exhibit 49 here. That has to do with the American-Dutch-British conversations.

Mr. MURPHY. The same one that you call 49 I am calling 50, General. I don't know just which. I have mine marked "50."

Mr. GESELL. It is 49.

Mr. MURPHY. Page 2 of 49.

General MARSHALL. Now, where were you reading from, please, Mr. Murphy?

Mr. MURPHY. At the bottom of the page, the purposes of the conference.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. What page?

Mr. MURPHY. Second page, under paragraph 3, the purposes of the conference.

General MARSHALL. I have got some other paper.

Mr. MURPHY. Paragraph No. 3, "Purposes of the Staff Conference."

General MARSHALL (reading):

Purposes of the Staff Conference.

The purposes of the Staff Conference, as set out [3222] in the instructions to the two representative bodies, were as follows:

(a) To determine the best methods by which the armed forces of the United States and British Commonwealth, with its present Allies, could defeat Germany and the Powers allied with her, should the United States be compelled to resort to war.

(b) To coordinate, on broad lines, plans for the employment of the forces of the Associated Powers.

(c) To reach agreements concerning the methods and nature of Military Cooperation between the two nations, including the allocation of the principal areas of responsibility, the major lines of the Military strategy to be pursued by both nations, the strength of the forces which each may be able to commit, and the determination of satisfactory command arrangements, both as to supreme Military control, and as to unity of field command in cases of strategic or tactical joint operations.

4. The Staff Conference, interpreting the foregoing instructions in the light of the respective national positions of the two powers, has reached agreements, as set forth in this and annexed documents, concerning Military Cooperation between the United States and the British Commonwealth and its present Allies should [3223] the United States associate itself with them in war against Germany and her Allies. The agreements herewith submitted are subject to confirmation by:

(a) The Chief of Naval Operations, United States Navy; the Chief of Staff, United States Army; the Chiefs of Staff Committee of the War Cabinet in the United Kingdom.

(b) The Government of the United States and His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom.

The Chiefs of Staff will request His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom to endeavor to obtain, where necessary, the concurrence of His Majesty's Governments in the Dominions, the Government of India, and the Governments of Allied Powers to the relevant provisions of the agreements herein recorded. The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff will similarly request the United States Government to endeavor to obtain, where necessary, the concurrence of the Governments of such other American Powers as may enter the war as associates of the United States.

The High Command of the United States and United Kingdom will collaborate continuously in the formulation and execution of strategical policies and plans which shall govern the conduct of the war. They and their [3224] respective commanders in the field, as may be appropriate, will similarly collaborate in the planning and execution of such operations as may be undertaken jointly by United States and British forces. This arrangement will apply also to such plans and operations as may be undertaken separately, the extent of collaboration required in each particular plan or operation being agreed mutually when the general policy has been decided.

The term "Associated Powers" used herein is to be taken as meaning the United States and British Commonwealth, and, when appropriate, includes the Associates and Allies of either Power.

The Staff Conference assumes that when the United States becomes involved in war with Germany, it will at the same time engage in war with Italy. In these circumstances, the possibility of a state of war arising between Japan and an Association of the United States, the British Commonwealth and its Allies, including the Netherlands East Indies, must be taken into account.

The Conference assumes that the United States will continue to furnish material aid to the United Kingdom, but, for the use of itself and its other associates, will retain material in such quantities as to provide for security and best to effectuate United States-British [3225] joint plans for defeating Germany and her Allies. It is recognized that the amount and nature of the material aid which the United States affords the British Commonwealth will influence the size and character of the Military forces which will be available to the United States for use in the war.

The broad strategic objective (object) of the Associated Powers will be the defeat of Germany and her Allies.

The principles of United States and British national strategic defense policies of which the Military forces of the Associated Powers must take account are:

(a) United States.

The paramount territorial interests of the United States are in the Western Hemisphere. The United States must, in all eventualities, maintain such dispositions as will prevent the extension in the Western Hemisphere of European or Asiatic political or Military Power.

(b) British Commonwealth.

The security of the United Kingdom must be maintained in all circumstances. Similarly, the United Kingdom, the Dominions, and India must maintain dispositions which, in all eventualities will provide for [3226] the ultimate security of the British Commonwealth of Nations. A cardinal feature of British strategic policy is the retention of a position in the Far East such as will insure the cohesion and security of the British Commonwealth and the maintenance of its war effort.

(c) Sea Communications.

The security of the sea communications of the Associated Powers is essential to the continuance of their war effort.

The strategic concept includes the following as the principal offensive policies against the Axis Powers:

(a) Application of economic pressure by naval, land, and air forces and all other means, including the control of commodities at their source by diplomatic and financial measures.

(b) A sustained air offensive against German Military power, supplemented by air offensives against other regions under enemy control which contribute to that power.

(c) The early elimination of Italy as an active partner in the Axis.

(d) The employment of the air, land and naval forces of the Associated Powers, at every opportunity, in raids and minor offensives against Axis Military [3227] strength.

(e) The support of neutrals, and of Allies of the United Kingdom, Associates of the United States, and populations in Axis-occupied territory in resistance to the Axis Powers.

(f) The building up of the necessary forces for an eventual offensive against Germany.

(g) The capture of positions from which to launch the eventual offensive.

(13) Plans for the Military operations of the Associated Powers will likewise be governed by the following:

(a) Since Germany is the predominant member of the Axis Powers, the Atlantic and European area is considered to be the decisive theatre. The princial United States Military effort will be exerted in that theatre, and operations of United States forces in other theatres will be conducted in such a manner as to facilitate that effort.

(b) Owing to the threat to the sea communications of the United Kingdom, the principal task of the United States naval forces in the Atlantic will be the protection of shipping of the Associated Powers, the center of gravity of the United States efforts being [3228] concentrated in the Northwestern Approaches to the United Kingdom. Under this conception, the United States naval effort in the Mediterranean will initially be considered of secondary importance.

(c) It will be of great importance to maintain the present British and Allied Military position in and near the Mediterranean basins, and to prevent the spread of Axis control in North Africa.

(d) Even if Japan were not initially to enter the war on the side of the Axis Powers, it would still be necessary for the Associated Powers to deploy their forces in a manner to guard against eventual Japanese intervention. If Japan does enter the war, the Military strategy in the Far East will be defensive. The United States does not intend to add to its present military strength in the Far East but will employ the United States Pacific Fleet offensively in the manner best calculated to weaken Japanese economic power, and to support the defense of the Malay barrier by diverting Japanese strength away from Malaysia. The United States—

Senator FERGUSON. General, may I interrupt just a moment? Are you answering Congressman Murphy's question now?

General MARSHALL. I am trying to find the exact terms of this agreement to refresh my own memory and read it clear [3229] through to the end. I was reading it out loud. I can read it to myself if you prefer.

Mr. MURPHY. I have no question.

General MARSHALL. I might say, Senator, there are thousands of pages of these and I have had 3 days in which to absorb them.

Senator FERGUSON. I think you and I both have had to do that.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I make this clear? I was trying to help the General in finding the answer to the question.

Senator LUCAS. What was the question?

Mr. MURPHY. The Senator asked what was involved in the ABC?

General MARSHALL. No, Mr. Murphy, I understood the Senator to say when was the plan to be put into effect and I was trying to see if it was stipulated that when an attack came this would be automatic.

Senator FERGUSON. General, I refer you to Exhibit 16.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. KEEFE. I realize the help that my colleague from Pennsylvania has been in this proceeding but in this particular [3230] instance his effort to help seems to have muddled the waters to the extent that there isn't anybody that knows what we are talking about and I would like to see if we can get an answer to a question or have a question submitted so that we can follow the proceedings. And I don't wonder that the General is disturbed because I confess as one member of the committee I have difficulty in knowing what is going on or what we are talking about and I would like to have this thing down to some basis so that one member can ask the questions and let the witness give the answers without these constant interjections which have the result of muddying the waters rather than clarifying them.

[3231] The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Senator FERGUSON. We will pass that question then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to suggest, in response to the remarks of the Congressman from Wisconsin, that we had an understanding that counsel would be permitted to inquire of the witnesses without interruption, and that the members of the committee in their turn would be permitted to inquire of the witnesses without interruption and, except where it is necessary in order that a member of the committee understands an answer, does not get a word accurately, it would seem, in the interest of order, that that course be pursued.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, may I interject at this point? General Marshall has indicated from the start that he is perfectly able to take care of himself as a witness before this committee and to understand the questions that are asked without prompting from any other member of this committee.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will take that remark out of the record. I am not attempting to prompt anybody. I am seeking the truth here. I think the record will show I have been helpful to the Senator from Michigan in getting a clarification here.

I think the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin is letting off steam and nothing else.

[3232] The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Senator FERGUSON. I want the record to show I have not objected to any interruptions, because it is my interest to get the facts. The Chairman has well the right to invoke the rule. It was invoked the first day before I got two words out.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not recall that. If that is true, the record will show it, but the Chair does not happen to remember it. The Chair offers these observations in order to try to discourage unnecessary interruptions of one member of the committee by another during the examination of the witnesses.

Senator FERGUSON. General, if you will now refer to Exhibit 50, I want to call certain things to your attention.

On page 13, the top of the page, it states:

It is agreed that any of the following actions by Japan would create a position in which our failure to take active military counteraction would place us at such military disadvantage, should Japan subsequently attack, that we should then advise our respective Governments to authorize such action:

Then follow specifications (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e).

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I follow that.

Senator FERGUSON. In (b) it states:

The movement of the Japanese forces into any part of [3233] Thailand to the west of 100° East or to the south of 10° North.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. We have a map before us, if you will just look at it, which indicates that line, and it ends up by saying:

The movement of Japanese forces into New Caledonia or the Loyalty Islands.

Do you see the line outlined on the map?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I am familiar with that.

Senator FERGUSON. And you used a very similar description in your letter—it is not a letter, it is a memorandum for the President by you and Admiral Stark, on November 5.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I recall that.

Senator FERGUSON. You recall that?

General MARSHALL. I recall that.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, on page 18 of that same exhibit, if you will refer to it, it says, "Japan's most probable course of action will be to," and then you have (a) and (b), and I will ask you whether or not anything is indicated in there in relation to an attack on Hawaii, or is it left out because Hawaii is not in this plan at all?

General MARSHALL (reading):

It is estimated that Japan's most probable course of action will be to:

[3234] (a) contain the Asiatic Fleet in Manila Bay with the object of destroying it by air and torpedo attacks and failing in this, to

(b) locate the Fleet at the earliest possible moment and endeavor to at least draw it by air, submarine or surface vessel attacks.

The question, as I understand it, is whether there is an omission of any reference to Hawaii.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; was the reason that it was not covered by this plan because it was thought that that was the probable course of Japan?

General MARSHALL. I think, Senator, it is my recollection of the discussions that were going on in Singapore at the time that the problem of the attack on Hawaii was not what they were considering, it was the security of Singapore, Borneo, and the Netherlands East Indies, generally extending over north of New Guinea to the Admiralty Islands.

Senator FERGUSON. Then this plan did not anticipate an attack on America?

General MARSHALL. This plan was to meet a probable, as we understood it, Japanese operation to the south of the China Sea.

[3235] Senator FERGUSON. Well, were you familiar with the fact that Mr. Churchill made the statement sometime before the war started, as far as America was concerned December 7, that in case Japan attacked America they would be in with us in 1 or 2 hours, or whatever the time was?

General MARSHALL. I have a recollection of some such statement.

Senator FERGUSON. Could that have been in reply to this plan then?

General MARSHALL. I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. Were they to come in if Hawaii alone were to be attacked?

General MARSHALL. I could not answer that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Or was it a one-sided plan?

General MARSHALL. I do not think it was one-sided.

Senator FERGUSON. I just want to know what your opinion is on it.

General MARSHALL. It says "A direct act of war by Japanese armed forces against the Territory or Mandated Territory of any of the associated powers." That is a very general statement, and can cover Hawaii also. "It is not possible to define accurately what would constitute 'a direct act of war.' It is possible for a minor incident to occur which, although technically an act of war, could be [3236] resolved by diplomatic action. It is recognized that the decision as to whether such an incident is an act of war must lie with the Government concerned."

Senator FERGUSON. I am trying to find out whether this plan went into effect prior to December 7.

General MARSHALL. I am quite certain it did not go into effect, because it never was implemented, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. On page 25, it says, at the bottom of the page—will you read that (b), the last paragraph?

General MARSHALL (reading):

The operating of Chinese guerilla forces armed, equipped, and directed by the associated Powers. Steps have already been taken by the British Government to organize such operations. It is recommended that the United States Government organize similar guerilla forces.

Senator FERGUSON. Did we ever organize those, to put this plan into effect?

General MARSHALL. So far as I know, prior to December 7, 1941, we did not, as far as I can recollect.

The one action, aside from sending supplies into China, that I do have a very definite recollection of is equipping the air force, the Flying Tigers.

Senator FERGUSON. The Volunteer Air Corps?

General MARSHALL. Yes; because I took the action to get [3237] them the planes personally.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the Volunteer Air Corps?

General MARSHALL. The Volunteer Air Corps was a force of air-men, combat planes, P-40's, I believe, furnished by the United States, and operated by volunteer officers from the United States, I think, of the Army and Navy, and there may have been even civilians in it. I am not quite certain.

Some of them were reserve officers, and they were relieved from active duty, and released so that they might go into the employ of the Chinese Government.

The planes were obtained—is there any interest in that?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

General MARSHALL. The planes were obtained on the basis of an English contract for planes, I think, with the Curtiss Co., and when that contract had been fulfilled, it was possible for the plant to turn out a certain number of planes during the next few months, if they immediately started, within 10 days, using the parts that were then available; otherwise their assembly lines would change.

Under the contract arrangement we had, which controlled the Curtiss Co.'s operations with the British, our Government, meaning the War Department in general, and Air Corps people in particular, could control the question [3237] of whether or not those planes should be manufactured beyond the contract terms.

The problem was to obtain planes immediately for the Chinese.

The planes which would have been fabricated out of this available extra material of course would not have been completed for 3 or 4 months.

We could kill that, so far as the British getting the benefit of those additional planes, or, as I used it, we could, on a trade basis, require them to make immediate delivery of completed planes that were going to them, to the Chinese, and we later would allow them to take these additional planes that were manufactured from the accumulated matériel.

[3239] I saw Mr. Sumner Welles and he took up the adjustment with the British, and they submitted to that condition, and we got 50 in January or February, and 50 more in February or March. They were all for the Flying Tigers; they were sent out to the Far East. The men that were recruited by the Chinese and we released where they happened to be reserve officers, also, proceeded to the Far East.

My next recollection of the matter is while we had obtained the planes on that basis by a twist of the British contract, we now found ourselves in the predicament of having to provide the guns and ammunition, which we did not have available, and we had a hard time arming the planes.

That was the one definite force that I recall, prior to December 7, 1941, we organized to the extent that I have just described.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, was that an activating of this Exhibit 50 plan?

General MARSHALL. I do not think it was that. It came actually out of a visit here of T. V. Soong with the head of the Chinese Air. I took them out to my house for lunch and they made an impressive picture of the circumstances and the great good such action would do, and I immediately undertook the obtaining of that matériel. That was without regard to this plan, and what I was referring to here is the [3240] continuation of that.

Senator FERGUSON. What I was trying to find out was whether this was an activating of this particular plan.

General MARSHALL. I do not think it was, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. In your memo, exhibit 16, you refer to the same line which I read to you before.

Mr. GESELL. I think that is exhibit 17, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. No; 16 is the one I have reference to. You see at the top of page 4, "The basic military policies and strategy agreed to in the United States-British Staff conversations remain sound."

Now I assume you are referring to Exhibit 50, are you not, General?

General MARSHALL. What page was that you were reading from?

Senator FERGUSON. Page 4. It is the fourth page of this document. They are not numbered. The top of the page, "Chief of Naval Operations, Chief of Staff are in accord in the following conclusions."

General MARSHALL. I see it. "The basic military policies and strategy agreed to in the United States-British Staff conversations remain sound." Now the question?

Senator FERGUSON. I wanted to know whether that referred to exhibit 50.

[3241] General MARSHALL. That was my understanding, sir. However, the use of the word "agreed" is not intended to imply that our Government was committed to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, Senator, the British-American Staff conversations are ABC-1 and 2. I was afraid you are getting a confusion on the record. Exhibit 50 is the American-Dutch-British. That is a memo with reference to what?

General MARSHALL. It is the estimate concerning the Far Eastern situation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a different document, isn't it?

Senator FERGUSON. Does not that include the Dutch and Singapore? Does not that include Exhibit 50, which you were looking at?

General MARSHALL. I think it does, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You think it does. Now in order that there be no misunderstanding about this definition of an attack that I read—do you recall what I had read to you?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I do.

Senator FERGUSON. Would that kind of an attack as described in the definition that I read to you activate or bring into effect Exhibit 50, that is the one on the Far East?

General MARSHALL. I will say, in the first place, that no attack would have brought into effect this exhibit 50, because—

[3242] Senator FERGUSON (interposing). Well, was it contemplated—

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. Let him complete his answer.

General MARSHALL. It was contemplated that our Government approve the procedure. Now your exact definition, I am not quite certain about that. But the point I am making now is we, meaning Admiral Stark and myself, as Chief of Staff, and meaning the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, would not be in a position and were not in a position to bring the terms of this argument, so far as they pertained to the United States, into effect, by reason of the document without the formal approval of the Government.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

[3234] General, I want to refer now to Exhibit 40, a dispatch between Admiral Hart and Admiral Stark. Do you have it before you?

General MARSHALL. I have that before me.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you just read the message part? It is only one sentence.

General MARSHALL. "Learn from Singapore we have assured Britain armed support under three or four eventualities. Have received no corresponding instructions from you."

That is a question?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. From the Commander in Chief in the Far East to Admiral Stark, the Chief of Naval Operations.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, have you any such knowledge as that?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That was entirely foreign and not in your mind at all, that we had any such arrangements?

General MARSHALL. In my mind was the clear understanding that this was a planning arrangement which had not been approved, was not to be considered as an approved document until the Government so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask what the date of that letter is?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Will you give the date? It [3244] has been in the record.

General MARSHALL. It is December 1941. I do not see the day of the month.

Mr. GESELL. After the war started.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, wait.

General MARSHALL. There is no day of the month on it.

Senator FERGUSON. Is counsel testifying here or the witness?

Mr. GESELL. I was speaking to Mr. Mitchell. I would be glad to advise the committee of the information I gave to Mr. Mitchell.

Senator FERGUSON. I will ask what the stenographer got.

(The record was read by the reporter.)

Senator FERGUSON. Do you see anything on that exhibit to show that that was shown to Admiral Hart or Admiral Stark after the war started?

General MARSHALL. I see merely the month, December, and the year, 1941. There may be the day of the month on here, but I do not spot it.

Senator FERGUSON. Would that reference on it give you when it was?

General MARSHALL. I presume it would.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you look at it? Do you know the Navy code there?

[3245] General MARSHALL. I do not know what it is. The way it reads, it is the 645th day of December, but that does not make sense to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anybody here who understands what date that is?

Senator FERGUSON. The first and second numerals of the serial designate the date of the month, the third and fourth numerals, the hour of the day, and the fifth and sixth, the minutes of the hour.

General MARSHALL. This would be the 7th day of December 1941, according to that.

Senator FERGUSON. 1941?

General MARSHALL. The 7th day of December.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, and what hour?

General MARSHALL. The sixth hour, and 45 minutes.

Senator FERGUSON. I will read the cracking of the code here:

The third and fourth numerals the hour of the day, and the 5th and 6th the minutes of the hour.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. Let the Senator finish.

Mr. MURPHY. I want to make a protest before he does.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman will not recognize the member at this time, until the Senator from Michigan finishes.

[3246] Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. No, not at this time. I want to overrule the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not overruled. The Chair has sustained the Senator from Michigan.

Senator FERGUSON. I was trying to give the General a way to interpret that language. Now I will read it again.

I am reading from a letter of the Navy Department, Office of the Secretary, Washington, the 6th of December 1945, and signed by John Ford Baecher, Lieutenant Commander, USNR.

The time element involved in the above-mentioned dispatches is computed in the following manner: The first and second numerals of the serial designate the day of the month, the third and fourth numerals the hour of the day, the fifth and sixth the minutes of the hour.

Now, will you give us the date of the month?

General MARSHALL. The 7th day of December.

Senator FERGUSON. The third and fourth numerals, the hour of the day?

General MARSHALL. That is the sixth hour of the day, and that would be 6 a. m.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be 6 a. m. The fifth and sixth, minutes of the hour?

[3247] General MARSHALL. That would be December 7, at 6:45 a. m., 1941.

Senator FERGUSON. Then I will read you the next

All dispatches are dated Greenwich time.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What does that mean?

General MARSHALL. It means just that; it is the Greenwich time. You will have to relate this over to the similar time in the Far East.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to try to get it in Washington time.

General MARSHALL. I could not tell you just what that is. You want it in Washington time?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. I think Greenwich time is about 6 hours difference from Washington time, approximately.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, reading further.

As an example, dispatch #070645 means that the dispatch originates in the Philippines area on the 7th day of the month (and as shown on the face of the dispatch in the month of December, 1941) at 6:45 a. m. Greenwich time.

Now, they are talking about Philippine time, are they not? I mean the day? Is that Greenwich time? I will give you the letter, General, and see if you can figure it [3248] out.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose I read it into the record.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, he had better look at it. I would like to have you figure out what time it was in Washington, and what day of the month.

General MARSHALL. What time it was where?

Senator FERGUSON. In Washington, when that was sent.

General MARSHALL. This memo states:

"Eastern Standard time is five hours earlier than Greenwich time, therefore the dispatch originated on December 7, at 1:45 a. m. Eastern Standard time. The Philippine area is about eight hours ahead of Greenwich time, therefore the dispatch originated on December 7, 2:45 p. m. Philippine area time."

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, with the time here in Washington that was 1:45 in the morning, was it not, on the 7th? That would be an hour and 45 minutes after midnight on the morning of the 7th?

General MARSHALL. That would be it.

Senator FERGUSON. Had the attack taken place at that time?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; the attack did not take place, I believe, until 1 o'clock in the middle of the day, Washington time.

Senator FERGUSON. In the middle of the day.

[3249] The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask at this moment, it is practically 4 o'clock—whether the committee desires to sit longer today? I frankly, was hoping we might conclude with General Marshall today on account of his matters but whether we can is not within my control.

Would the committee feel justified in sitting longer if there is a chance to conclude with General Marshall or not?

Senator FERGUSON. There isn't a chance, unless the committee is willing to sit well into the evening.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not want to compel the Senator from Michigan to tell how long it will take.

Senator FERGUSON. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the fact we cannot conclude with General Marshall, what is the wish of the committee as to recessing now?

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Mr. Chairman, might I inquire something of General Marshall. I understand he stated yesterday his plane was waiting, ready to take him to his duties in China.

General MARSHAL. It will have to continue to wait. I am to be at your disposal until you have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. Under those circumstances, the committee will recess until 10 o'clock Monday morning.

(Whereupon, the committee recessed until 10 a. m., Monday, December 10, 1945.)

[3250]

PEARL HARBOR ATTACK

MONDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1945

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE INVESTIGATION
OF THE PEARL HARBOR ATTACK,
Washington, D. C.

The Joint Committee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10:00 a. m., in the Caucus Room (room 318), Senate Office Building, Senator Alben W. Barkley (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators Barkley (chairman), George, Lucas, and Ferguson and Representatives Cooper (vice chairman), Clark, Murphy, Gearhart, and Keefe.

Also present: William D. Mitchell, General Counsel; Gerhard A. Gesell, Jule M. Hannaford, and John E. Masten, of counsel, for the joint committee.

[3251] The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order. Senator FERGUSON, you were examining General Marshall.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

Senator FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a correction in the record.

On page 3178 I read from the Roberts Report. It is in the record on page 3178, the last paragraph. The record reads: "8:30 American Honolulu time." The record I read from, being the Roberts report, says: "6:30 A. M. Honolulu time."

The word "American" is not in there. So there will be two changes. The figure "8:30" is changed to "6:30" and strike out "American."¹

The CHAIRMAN. The correction will be made.

Senator FERGUSON. General Marshall, about the 12th or 13th of August, 1941, you attended the Atlantic Conference meeting, did you not?

General MARSHALL. What sort of meeting, sir?

Senator FERGUSON. The Atlantic Conference.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I was present, yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How long before you went to that meeting had you known there was to be a meeting?

[3252] General MARSHALL. I do not recall, Senator, but purely as a guess I would say maybe a week; I don't recall at all. Maybe some circumstances will come up that will jar my memory, but I don't recall now at all.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you see any agenda before you went to the meeting?

General MARSHALL. I know specifically there was no agenda for the Chiefs of Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any conferences with the British Chiefs of Staff or military authorities, in relation to the Far East?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall a specific conference with the three British Chiefs of Staff regarding the Far East.

Might I explain my recollection of what occurred?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. Admiral Stark, General Arnold, and myself met with the British Chief of Staff, Admiral Sir Dudley Pound, the Acting Head of the Air Corps—Air Marshal Portal was not present—and Field Marshal Sir John Dill, then Chief of the Imperial General Staff.

Our discussions were quite general, somewhat in the nature of getting acquainted and of our learning from them of the course of the war from their point of view, and of [3253] their informing us in general statements of their urgent necessities.

We proceeded thereafter most of the time on the basis of personal conversations between the respective opposite Chiefs of Staff. In my case, that would be Field Marshal Sir John Dill.

My recollection of my conversations with the Field Marshal were that he explained on his own initiative, or on my questioning, what their situation was all over the world, their approaches to the various phases of the campaigns that had then taken place, and particularly the situation in the Middle East.

My recollection is that he and I had not a great deal to say about matériel, because in the category of matériel for the ground forces we had already done for them about as much as it was possible for us to do for some time.

My understanding of the conversations between General Arnold and the First Sea Lord, on which General Arnold is the best witness—I should say with the air representative—he had a great deal of discussion regarding aircraft that the British needed. And I believe somewhat the same was the nature of the conversations between Admiral Stark and the First Sea Lord in regard to naval requirements.

However, I did not sit in on those details.

[3254] At another meeting with the three Chiefs of Staff—

Senator FERGUSON. General, I was only interested in the Far East situation. I didn't care to cover the other.

General MARSHALL. I will confine myself to that by saying, Senator, that we only had a general discussion of the situation all over the world, and I do not remember specifically the Far Eastern part. So far as our discussions with them, I took the lead in pressing them all the time to unify their procedure and to save us from the confusion that was then existent here in Washington regarding their necessities as to matériel.

Senator FERGUSON. Prior to going there or at the meeting, did you know what this country's, America's, attitude, our attitude, was in relation to Japan going any further on her aggressive steps, aggression steps in the Far East?

General MARSHALL. My recollection of my understanding of that phase of the matter at that time was that our policy was in every way that seemed possible and suitable to discourage any outbreak in the Pacific.

Senator FERGUSON. On page 14 of exhibit 1, I wonder whether this was ever called to your attention. It was on the 7th of August, 1941, translated the 8th of August—no, translated the 15th of August. So you would be at the meeting [3255] at that time, would you not?

General MARSHALL. I believe so, sir.

[3256] Senator FERGUSON. What I wanted to call to your attention was the second paragraph on that page. It is a message from Washington Japan intercepted:

When Japan occupied French Indochina—

General MARSHALL. Senator, may I interrupt. What page are you on, please?

Senator FERGUSON. I am on page 14.

General MARSHALL. I have it now.

Senator FERGUSON. The second paragraph [reading from exhibit No. 1]:

When Japan occupied French Indochina, the United States retaliated with the "freezing" order and the export embargo; a joint warning by Hull and Eden was issued with regard to any ambitions in the direction of Thailand.

Did you know that?

General MARSHALL. I presume that I did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that there was a conversation between the President and Mr. Churchill in relation to parallel action by the United States as far as Japan was concerned in case of aggression?

General MARSHALL. I presume that I did.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you return at the same time as the President?

General MARSHALL. Only part of the way, sir. I left the Augusta, which was the cruiser on which we were traveling [3257] at sea, somewhere southeast, I believe, of Nova Scotia, took a seaplane and flew in to the Naval Base near Newport, and there transferred to a plane to Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. You came back to the United States?

General MARSHALL. I came back directly to the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you learned before you came back to the United States that there had been a conversation between the President and Mr. Churchill in relation to parallel action? Was that discussed with you at the conference?

General MARSHALL. That was not discussed with me at the conference.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know when you returned to the United States? The President—I relate the day he returned for the record—the 17th. That was on a Sunday morning.

Do you know when you returned?

General MARSHALL. Do I know when the President returned?

Senator FERGUSON. No; when you returned to the United States?

General MARSHALL. I returned quite a few days ahead of him, so I must have been here then.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you learn that on the 17th of August the President—that is on a Sunday morning—the President called the Japanese Ambassador to the White House [3258] and delivered to him a statement, an oral statement? In the oral statement this language was used:

Such being the case, this Government now finds it necessary to say to the Government of Japan that if the Japanese Government takes any further steps in pursuance of a policy or program of military domination by force or threat of force of neighboring countries, the Government of the United States will be compelled to take immediately any and all steps which it may deem necessary toward safeguarding the legitimate rights and interests of the United States and American nationals and toward insuring the safety and security of the United States.

That is the end of the paragraph and the end of the statement.

General MARSHALL. Your question is——

Senator FERGUSON. Whether you knew that, when you learned of it.

General MARSHALL. My recollection is, and I believe the records of liaison meetings show, that at least the sense of that message, if not the actual message, was read in my presence in the office of the Under Secretary of State, Mr. Sumner Welles, about 2 days later, which I believe was the 19th.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the first knowledge you had that such action was taken or was to be taken?

[3259] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; as far as I can recall.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you ever know that England—did you ever learn that England had taken a similar step?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall that on August 24, 4 days prior to the Jap answer to that message, which was the 28th, that the Prime Minister made a statement to the effect that in case America went to war with Japan that they, the British, would be in in a short time—2 or 3 hours?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall that, sir.

[3260] Senator FERGUSON. What was the discussion you had with the Under Secretary in relation to the paragraph that I just read, the one that you read at the——

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir. I have not seen the minutes or the record of the meeting. I had a vague recollection of knowing something about that message at some time and I was told that it was in the record of the minutes of the liaison meeting. I believe it is a naval record of a Captain Schuirmann that Mr. Welles either told us of the message or actually read the message to us, so that I am not a very good witness on that.

Senator FERGUSON. How did you interpret what was said at that meeting by Mr. Welles? What obligation did it place on you as the head of the Army, if any? How did you interpret it as Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. My interpretation now—I would have to guess at what it was then—was that the situation was growing more difficult and the implications here were largely, I believe, economic; but I do not recall exactly what my reactions were at the time. I knew this throughout the procedure then, as far as I understood the matter of the diplomatic interchanges, that they were endeavoring to find some way to avoid a rupture in the Pacific without the complete sacrifice of American policies.

[3261] Senator FERGUSON. Did you take that as being from that time on the American policy so that you would have to, if necessary, implement it?

General MARSHALL. I would assume that I would, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did that in any way change the American policy as far as you were concerned, that is, as far as your knowledge?

General MARSHALL. I would assume that it did not. I have no recollection of any state of change in my mind at the time. Our procedure was more or less uniform throughout.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, did that indicate that the tension was at least growing and that we had certain commitments and that it may be necessary for you to prepare for those commitments?

General MARSHALL. I presume so, sir. Certainly the tension was growing all the time, and particularly in the months of September, October, and November.

Senator LUCAS. Will the Senator yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Senator LUCAS. What is the Senator talking about when he talks about commitments? I would like to know that.

Senator FERGUSON. Does the General understand my question?

General MARSHALL. I could not hear, Senator.

[3262] Senator LUCAS. I would like to know to what the Senator is referring, what the Senator is inquiring about when he talks about our commitments. I would like to know myself what the Senator is talking about.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I will ask the General, does he understand my question?

General MARSHALL. Well, I was not making any fine interpretation of the word "commitment," Senator. I was talking about our military obligations.

Senator FERGUSON. We were talking about this particular paragraph, were we not, General?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you understood my questions to relate to that paragraph?

General MARSHALL. I thought I did.

Senator FERGUSON. And the fact that the Japanese had received it from the President on Sunday morning?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you know, General, whether or not that information of the delivery of this message was sent to General Short or General MacArthur?

General MARSHALL. I have no—there was a message sent to General Short and to General MacArthur sometime, as I recall, during August that referred to the Japanese attitude. [3263] I do not know offhand whether or not this message was sent. My recollection would be that it was not.

Senator FERGUSON. Your recollection would be that it was not sent?

General MARSHALL. But the record will show that, of course, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Well I have no record that it was and I wondered if you have any knowledge that it had been sent.

Had you any information of a proposed meeting between Konoye and the President of the United States?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir, now. On that you will have to refresh my memory.

Senator FERGUSON. You never prepared any data or had prepared any data anticipating such a meeting?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall it, sir. It may be but I do not recall it at the moment.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you any information that any meeting like that may be held in Juneau, Alaska? Would that refresh your memory? I am only asking you that to refresh your memory.

General MARSHALL. Well, I am sorry but it does not right now. May I say, Senator, this mass of papers and all I haven't seen for 4 years, whatever part I did see.

[3264] Senator FERGUSON. I appreciate that.

General MARSHALL. And it is very hard for me to recall what I actually had known.

Senator FERGUSON. And that is why at times I ask a question thinking it may refresh your memory on it.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. In the intercepts there is considerable information about such a meeting and in the memos from Ambassador Grew to the State Department and to the Secretary of State there is considerable in the early part of October prior to the fall of the cabinet. I think the indication is at least that the Ambassador thought the cabinet would fall, and advised them that it would fall unless such a meeting had taken place. Did you have any information?

General MARSHALL. If it was in magic I presume I did, sir, but just what Mr. Grew's messages were I do not recall whether I know anything about them or not.

Senator FERGUSON. You don't know whether you had any information—

General MARSHALL. Everything of that kind I got through oral statements from Mr. Stimson who was attending these meetings frequently, more frequently than I was in the State Department.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, there is considerable magic [3265] on that question of the Konoye meeting.

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you recall it now?

General MARSHALL. I have a hazy recollection now of the fact that there was quite a bit.

Senator FERGUSON. But you do not know of any particular data that you may have obtained for that meeting?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall it now, sir. They may be able to show me a memorandum signed by me, but I do not recall it now.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I haven't got any memorandum or I would have given it to you first. I was just seeking information as to what you may have.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GESELL. We have a memorandum in the record, Senator, if I may be helpful.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, certainly.

Mr. GESELL. Exhibit 33, item 17, dated October 2, 1941, has the memorandum to the Chief of Staff from General Miles' deputy, Colonel Kroner, which discussed that problem. The memorandum was also distributed to the President, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Under Secretary, and other officials.

Senator FERGUSON. What part of that memorandum, Mr. Gesell? [3266]

Mr. GESELL. Well, I think toward the middle there is a discussion of a meeting of leaders and the Army position is stated by G-2.

Senator FERGUSON. That they will prepare data for it?

Mr. GESELL. No, that they were discussing the meeting. Item 8 at the bottom there starts and discusses the meeting and goes over onto the next page.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I am familiar with that, but I wondered whether any data had been prepared.

Mr. GESELL. Oh, I don't know about that.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I had in mind.

General, do you know whether you advised such a meeting or advised against such a meeting? Were you consulted, in other words?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of that.

Senator FERGUSON. General, had you designated anyone to negotiate or at least confer in liaison about it between the State Department and your headquarters of the Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. I think we had two mediums of that sort. One through the G-2 section of the General Staff and one probably through the War Plans Division of the General Staff. However, General Miles and General Gerow can give you an authoritative statement regarding that.

[3267] Senator FERGUSON. But you had not designated any particular individual?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I don't think I ever have. I know that during the greater course of the war I had officers that would see Mr. Hull sometimes almost every day but I do not recall that I ever designated any particular individual unless it was General Hull on one occasion.

Senator FERGUSON. During all of this time of all this negotiation did you understand that the Fleet was at Pearl Harbor, the main part of the Fleet?

General MARSHALL. I knew all the time where the Fleet was based. Its sailings in and out, though, I was not familiar with.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. But I would know absolutely when the Fleet left the West Coast, when it arrived out in Hawaii and so long as it was based in Hawaii.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you consulted any in the year 1940 or conferred with in relation to the Fleet going and basing at Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. I am quite certain that I was involved in the discussions regarding that movement.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know what your opinion was on sending it there?

[3268] General MARSHALL. I am sorry, Senator, I do not recall just exactly what my point of view was. I have a clear recollection, still dubious, as to what my own thoughts were regarding quite a discussion as to the reinforcement of the Atlantic Fleet from a portion of the Pacific Fleet and at that time the U. S. Fleet was in the Los Angeles-San Diego region. There was a very considerable discussion on it for quite a while over that phase of the matter and it was the problem of the maintenance of our convoys across the Atlantic to Great Britain, which Great Britain was vitally dependent upon; and the security in the Pacific and the numbers and questions of the disposition of the vessels of the Fleet was a very important matter.

Senator FERGUSON. General, you would be vitally interested in the moving of the Fleet to Pearl Harbor because that being in Pearl Harbor, based in Pearl Harbor, it became one of your tasks to protect it while it was at anchorage in Pearl Harbor, isn't that true?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, Senator. I had a very vital interest, the Army had a very vital interest, in the Fleet at Pearl Harbor because the obligation to protect Pearl Harbor was an Army obligation.

Senator FERGUSON. And did you have any idea as to its effect on the diplomatic negotiations? Were you consulted on [3269] that?

General MARSHALL. Well, my recollection is that was one of the considerations involved. Now, just whether they asked me personally or not I do not know, but I assume that I was personally involved in the discussions and, therefore, must have expressed an opinion.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, do you know what that opinion was?

General MARSHALL. I cannot recall right now, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I see in a memorandum dated the 25th of February 1941, a conference in the office of the Chief of Staff, the Chief of Staff being present. It is exhibit 55. I will not have to read who was present there. This language is used [reading]:

They are in the situation where they must guard against a surprise or trick attack. It is necessary for the fleet to be in anchorage part of the time and they are particularly vulnerable at that time. I do not feel that it is a possibility or even a probability but they must guard against everything.

That is down about a third of the way down.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Does that refresh your memory as to what was going on at the time?

[3270] General MARSHALL. Only to the extent that we were having these discussions regarding the fleet and this is a direct statement by me at that time, which is quite evidently what I thought at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know when, or did you give any opinion as to when the fleet was actually prepared for war?

General MARSHALL. No, sir, I could not say I had any data on that. I know I have quite a clear recollection that I was very much concerned regarding their obtaining the additional vessels that I believe at that time were characterized as the fleet train. In other words, the fleet itself was very much limited in action unless it had a large supply force to keep it going, not only in oil, gas, but in munitions and in food and in all the other requirements of ships traveling at sea in long voyages.

We greatly lacked, the fleet, I believe, greatly lacked such an equipment and I became personally interested in that and I recall discussing it at the liaison meeting and I believe the record will show, though I have not checked it, that a recommendation was made by the liaison group through the medium of Mr. Sumner Welles regarding the immediate establishment of an adequate fleet train. Now, the record will show that. That is my dim recollection at the time.

[3271] Senator FERGUSON. General Marshall, when you sent the war warning, that would necessitate the fleet preparing for war, would it not?

General MARSHALL. The war warning would put the fleet on the alerted action. It was presumed at that time, at least I should say it was presumed at that time that the fleet, so far as was possible, was in a state of preparation for war but its actual alert for battle conditions was the purpose of the alert message.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, wouldn't it be necessary for the fleet to go into Harbor—

General MARSHALL. Senator, you are asking me—

Senator FERGUSON (continuing). —to prepare for war? I am just bringing that out, to see what your information was as to the—

General MARSHALL. I am going to ask you to please ask a Naval authority on that because I am just guessing—I don't expect the Navy men to tell you much about tanks—but I do not want to commit myself.

Senator FERGUSON. General, the reason I asked that question was, as I understand it, you had charge of the protection of the fleet.

General MARSHALL. The Army was responsible for the defenses of Hawaii, or the Island of Oahu in particular, [3272] which included Pearl Harbor, and the coordination of all the air and defensible fires in that particular vicinity in the event of aggressive Japanese action.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, that would include the actual protection of the Fleet in Pearl Harbor?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; specifically that.

Senator FERGUSON. And, therefore, if it was necessary to take the Fleet into anchorage to have it prepared for war on the war warning you would have to protect it while it was in there, that is, your Army?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you been consulted by anyone—well, by the Secretary of War or the President, about whether or not we were prepared for a war with Japan? That is, whether your Army was prepared?

General MARSHALL. I had had a number of discussions with the Secretary of War regarding that consideration and I believe I testified earlier that, along with the Secretary of War, I had notified the Secretary of State at some time in September that I thought that by December 5th that we would be in such a situation as to deter Japanese action. I was referring, of course, specifically to the Philippine Islands because we thought we had done all we could at that time to make additional provisions for the defense of Oahu.

[3273] Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether you prepared any memorandums outside of the one, Exhibit 16 and Exhibit 17—they are the joint memorandum of November the 5th and November the 27th—as to our preparedness?

General MARSHALL. I will have to go to the record, sir. I do not recall offhand.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, would you have the records checked on this?¹

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The only two that I have seem to bear those dates.

Now, I wish you would take Exhibit 16 and on the second page I ask you whether you were consulted in relation to the second paragraph on that page:

The question that the Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff have taken under consideration is whether or not the United States is justified in undertaking offensive military operations with U. S. forces against Japan, to prevent her from severing the Burma Road. They consider that such operations, however well-disguised, would lead to war.

Was that question put to you?

General MARSHALL. I don't know whether that specific question was put to me but I do know that Admiral Stark and [3274] I, myself, were called on either by oral direction or otherwise to express ourselves regarding the appeal of the Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek for protection against what he thought were the inevitable offensive intention of the Japanese north towards Kunming, which would cut the Burma Road and this expression, as I recall and as I think itself will show, stated our views in that matter.

Senator FERGUSON. Then the next sentence:

At the present time the United States Fleet in the Pacific is inferior to the Japanese Fleet and cannot undertake an unlimited strategic offensive in the Western Pacific.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. (reading):

In order to be able to do so, it would have to be strengthened by withdrawing all naval vessels from the Atlantic except those assigned to local defense forces.

Do you remember discussing that with Admiral Stark?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I don't remember the exact discussion but I know that must be almost what we discussed. I couldn't help but have discussed it. And, incidentally, I referred to that a little while ago in stating that our problem was the respective strengths of the Atlantic and Pacific Fleets.

[3275] Senator FERGUSON. On top of page 3, at the top of the page it says, "The only existing," and then they say at the bottom of the page, after the word "existing," they say in the footnote "two preceding words struck out, and handwritten word 'current' substituted."

So it would read:

The current plans for war against Japan in the Far East are to conduct defensive war, in cooperation with the British and Dutch, for the defense of the Philippines and the British and Dutch East Indies.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What did you mean by the "current plans for war"? Were you at that time anticipating war was inevitable?

General MARSHALL. The date of this memorandum is November 5, 1941, and the threat of war was very evident.

Senator FERGUSON. You were being consulted at that time as the highest ranking military authority on that question?

General MARSHALL. Undoubtedly, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And at that time you anticipated—on the same page—that “The U. S. Army Air Forces in the Philippines will have reached the projected strength by February or March, 1942”?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And then it states down further:

[3276] By this time, additional British naval and air reinforcements to Singapore will have arrived.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you of the opinion at that time that if there was a war it would involve not only Britain with Singapore but the United States with the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. There was not any question in your mind about that, that if war came to one of the countries, war was coming to both countries?

General MARSHALL. That was my impression at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. And isn't it true that one of the things, at least, that Japan was claiming, their claim was they were trying to get oil and various things, which naturally would come from the south, isn't that true?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, and I think she was also getting oil from California.

Senator FERGUSON. As late as——

General MARSHALL. I do not remember the date, but she had been receiving things from California.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you think they were getting it as late as——

General MARSHALL. I do not think that, sir, but that is easily determined.

[3277] Mr. KEEFE. As late as what?

General MARSHALL. November 5.

Senator FERGUSON. November 5, I am referring to, 1941.

General MARSHALL. Let me interpolate again. I am not saying they were getting it on November 5, but there were discussions at the time regarding it.

Senator FERGUSON. As I understand it now, we start out on the premise here, at least as of the 5th day of November 1941, that if there was a war coming as far as Britain was concerned in the Far East in relation to Singapore or anything else, that America would be involved in that war?

General MARSHALL. That was my estimate at the time, because of the situation in the Philippines, our obligations there.

[3278] Senator FERGUSON. That was your opinion at the time.

I did want to take up with you page 4, if you will just turn to page 4:

The Chief of Naval Operations and the Chief of Staff are in accord in the following conclusions:

(a) The basic military policies and strategy agreed to in the United States-British Staff conversations remain sound.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, as of that time there would not be any doubt in your mind that if the Japs intended to move across the line that had been designated, that would mean a war with Great Britain, and therefore we would be involved in it?

General MARSHALL. I cannot answer that categorically, Senator, because of this: Admiral Stark and I had recommended that if the Japanese did move east of 100 east longitude, or south of 10 degrees north, that that be regarded as an offensive act, or something of that nature.

Whether or not the Government would accept that is another matter.

Senator FERGUSON. I am just getting what your reaction was.

General MARSHALL. I would answer that question, I think [3279] this way:

In my own opinion, the moment the Japanese moved into the Gulf of Siam, that was a definite offensive act which would result in a catastrophe for us in the Philippines, and for the British in Singapore, unless we definitely resisted it.

Senator FERGUSON. And you were of the opinion at that time that military strategy was that if they went in there it would affect Singapore, it would affect the Philippines, and it would naturally affect our interests.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And therefore crossing the so-called line would mean war, not only with the United States, but with Britain?

General MARSHALL. I think that is the statement that I was endeavoring to give.

Senator FERGUSON. Therefore, when the message came in from Ambassador Winant on the 6th, that they were across this line——

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That meant war, did it not?

General MARSHALL. That meant war, if the two Governments decided to make it war.

Senator FERGUSON. But as far as you were concerned, [3280] as the military man, the Chief of Staff, in your opinion that meant war?

General MARSHALL. In my opinion that meant unless we definitely resisted that, we would be in a catastrophic situation soon thereafter.

Senator FERGUSON. And you were of the opinion that at that time it meant war?

General MARSHALL. I was of the opinion at that time that the Governments would be forced to accept a condition of hostilities, but whether the Governments would do it or not, is another matter.

Senator FERGUSON. I understand that.

General MARSHALL. For example, I recall that somewhere near that time, I believe, the British Commander in Singapore wished to move troops north into the Kra Peninsula, which is the narrow neck of the Malay Peninsula, leading down to Singapore, to a place called Singara, and that was not, as I recall, accepted by the British Government. That was a defensive measure that he proposed. Why it was not accepted, I do not know.

It may have been because they thought he did not have sufficient men, or it may have been because they thought that would be seized by the Japanese as a definite war act by the British. I recall something of that kind happen- [3281] ing at that time, and I also recall my own thoughts in regard to it at that time.

Admiral Stark can speak for himself, but I think he concurred with me, that the definition of the latitude and longitude that has been referred to covering a movement that would turn the southern point there of Thailand, or Siam, and bring the Japanese into the Gulf of Siam, that meant they were on the back door of Singapore, and could have, in our opinion, only a direct hostile motive. It was still possible for them, of course, to have turned north and then east, and establish themselves by shipping on the west coast of Thailand. That was still a possibility.

However, that threat by air would have been a very complete one over the whole Malay Peninsula.

Those were my thoughts at that time; that is my understanding of the records. My own recollection is that our Governments—meaning the United States Government and the Government of Great Britain—neither one notified the Japanese that a movement south and east of the point determined would be considered in effect a hostile act.

Senator FERGUSON. General, what I am trying to get is the thinking of the Chief of Staff, and his staff, the military authorities here, as to what they had in mind, and their knowledge and their information.

[3282] Now, on the 5th of November, when you wrote this message, you had certain things in mind, and that line was one of the things that you had in mind, was it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Because at (b) you say, down on page 4:

War between the United States and Japan should be avoided while building up defensive forces in the Far East, until such time as Japan attacks, or directly threatens territories whose security to the United States is of very great importance. Military action against Japan should be undertaken only in one or more of the following contingencies:

(1) A direct act of war by Japanese armed forces against the territory or mandated territory of the United States—

Now, there would not be any doubt as to that, that in case of any direct act of Japanese forces against the territory or mandated territory of the United States, it would mean war with the United States; isn't that true?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then it goes further and it says, "The British Commonwealth or the Netherlands East Indies"; in other words, at that time you had in mind that in case there was an attack, a direct act of war against the British [3283] Commonwealth or the Netherlands East Indies, that, as far as you were concerned, it would mean war with the United States, that is, as far as you preparing for war was concerned and alerting?

General MARSHALL. You use the expression, Senator Ferguson, that it would mean war with the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. I am talking about literally.

General MARSHALL. Our statement was that military action against Japan should be undertaken only in one of the following contingencies, and you just read one of the contingencies.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Then, on the next page:

The movement of Japanese forces into Thailand, to the west of 100 degrees east, or south of 10 degrees north, or into Portuguese Timor, New Caledonia, or the Loyalty Islands.

That is the line indicated on the map.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I am familiar with that.

Senator FERGUSON. You are familiar with that?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I refer you to Exhibit 37, page 39, and I will ask you to read that.

General MARSHALL. This is headed "Top secret."

President directs that the following be done as soon as possible and within two days if possible after receipt this dispatch. Charter three small vessels to form a "defensive information patrol." Minimum requirements to establish identity as U. S. men-of-war are command by a naval officer and to mount a small gun and one machine gun would suffice. Filipino crews may be employed with minimum naval ratings to accomplish purpose which is to observe and report by radio Japanese movements in West China Sea and Gulf of Siam. Vessel to be stationed between Hainan and Hue one vessel off the Indochina coast between Camranh Bay and Cape St. Jacques and one vessel off Pointe de Camau. Use of Isabel authorized by President as one of the three but not other naval vessels. Report measures taken to carry out President's views. At same time inform me as to what reconnaissance measures are being regularly performed at sea by both Army and Navy whether by air surface vessels or submarines and your opinion as to the effectiveness of these latter measures.

That is the end of the message.

[3285] Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, I will ask you whether or not you ever knew that message existed?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of it, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You have no recollection of any such message, is that right?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON. And the reading of it does not refresh your memory in any way?

General MARSHALL. It does not.

Senator FERGUSON. Now you have the map before you. Would you locate where those three vessels would be, and tell us how far they would be from the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. The first vessel between Hainan and Hue?

Senator FERGUSON. Between Hainan and Hue. Hue is on the China coast across the island of Hainan. Do you see that Hainan?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you see Hue just across?

General MARSHALL. Hue is what I am hunting for.

Senator FERGUSON. A little south.

General MARSHALL. Oh, yes, I see it now. That covers the strait between Hainan and North Central French Indochina, which would be the Japanese course for vessels sailing out of [3286] Haiphong, coming down the coast all the way from Hongkong. As to the distance from the Philippines, I would have to guess at that. I should say it was about three or four hundred miles.

Senator FERGUSON. Pardon?

General MARSHALL. Three or four hundred miles.

Senator FERGUSON. Three or four hundred miles?

General MARSHALL. Yes. Now the next point—

Senator FERGUSON. I would just like to ask you a few questions about that. That would be for information?

General MARSHALL. Presumably so.

Senator FERGUSON. Were you attempting to get information of ships going south to Singapore? Would not that be the purpose of such a vessel being placed there?

General MARSHALL. Ships going south anywhere in the China Sea.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes; ships going anywhere south in the China Sea. They may go around the point, they may go around to the Kra Peninsula?

General MARSHALL. They may be going around the point, they may be going to Borneo, they may be going to New Guinea.

Senator FERGUSON. You would not say we were looking for ships going to the Philippines at that point, would you?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; unless an expedition against the Philippines, by some strange quirk, would be based on [3287] the coast of Indochina, or near Haiphong. Of course an expedition against the southern Philippines might be quite far south. Presumably an expedition against the Philippines would be based more north, in Formosa.

Senator FERGUSON. That is right. Now take the next ships.

General MARSHALL. Camranh Bay and Cape St. Jacques. I am familiar with those two places.

Senator FERGUSON. You are?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That is down around——

General MARSHALL. Well, that is on the southeastern coast of French Indochina and I should imagine the distance from Manila, rather, is probably some 600 miles. I am merely guessing.

Senator FERGUSON. Where would the ships be going there? Where would the lookout look for ships there?

General MARSHALL. The normal assumption is they would be headed for the southern tip of Indochina or the Gulf of Siam, or Borneo.

[3288] Senator FERGUSON. Now, the next one is right at the Pointe, Pointe de Camau, and that is right at the most southerly point of the Peninsula. Do you see it there?

General MARSHALL. Yes; I see it.

Senator FERGUSON. Where would that be a lookout for?

General MARSHALL. That would be a lookout specifically for the Gulf of Siam, I should say, and Malay Peninsula.

Senator FERGUSON. That would cover ships going to the Kra Peninsula, would it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. General, would you be of the opinion that this was a lookout to see whether or not there was going to be a movement across the line that had been designated?

General MARSHALL. I would not say it was necessarily that, specifically.

Senator FERGUSON. What would be the purpose of this information to be obtained?

General MARSHALL. A general knowledge of what the Japanese were doing in the China Sea.

Senator FERGUSON. And also the Gulf of Siam?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; the China Sea and south into Malaysia. In the light of the various documents and discussions at that time, the most critical move was that [3289] which might go into the Gulf of Siam, and the southern one of these posts would very definitely relate to that. That was somewhat beyond our normal air capability of reconnaissance, although we did send some, I believe, in the general direction toward Camranh Bay at one period for three days.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, do you know why that action was not reported to you? Would not that be very material to your thinking?

General MARSHALL. Well, that would be material to my thinking, yes, sir; but on the other hand, I did not have brought to my attention every detail of Navy reconnaissance.

Senator FERGUSON. The next states:

Report measures taken to carry out President's views. At same time inform me as to what reconnaissance measures are being regularly performed at sea by both Army and Navy whether by air surface vessels or submarines and your opinion as to the effectiveness of these latter measures.

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. This was for information of CINCAF, which would be Admiral Hart, would it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you, prior to the 7th, get any information on his report as to what reconnaissance was [3290] being carried out, as far as the Army was concerned?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not have any recollection on that?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, you have given, at the end of your memorandum—it is on page 5 of Exhibit 16—you specifically make certain recommendations there.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "That the dispatch of United States Armed Forces for intervention against Japan in China be disapproved."

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Of course, that does not concern the voluntary air corps.

General MARSHALL. No, sir, because that was under China's pay, and control.

Senator FERGUSON. That was under the Chinese and not our movement, as you interpreted the other day.

That material aid to China be accelerated consonant with the needs of Russia, Great Britain and our own forces.

That was your recommendation, was it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether we were furnishing [3291] and supplies to Borneo or any of the other islands? Did not your first report indicate that we were?

General MARSHALL. In that report I gave a specific example of furnishing ammunition to the Chinese Government which had been reserved for Iceland. I think it involved 7,000 rounds, and we gave them 40,000 of those, or maybe it was 3,000, one or the other. That was to be sent by General MacArthur from Manila, and we would replace them by shipment at the same time from San Francisco.

Senator FERGUSON. Was that under Lend-Lease?

General MARSHALL. I assume it was, sir. I was getting it out, and the details were being taken care of by someone else.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not know what it was under?

General MARSHALL. I think it was under Lend-Lease, but my action was to get them started.

Senator FERGUSON. Your report of 1941, your first report indicates bombs were also furnished.

General MARSHALL. I do not believe that is quite what it was, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you explain it?

General MARSHALL. It was necessary, we felt, to have the ability to land, and gas, and arm the B-17's to the south of the Philippines, for two reasons: One was in case [3292] we had to fly them in from Hawaii by that front, and the other one was that when you are operating strategical bombing planes of that type, their capacity is greatly increased for carrying bombs, and in range if they have some place they can shuttle to, and shuttle back from.

Therefore, we directed General MacArthur to take up with the governments concerned the proposition of preparing strips that would accommodate the B-17's and that he, General MacArthur, stock those strips with gasoline and bombs.

Senator FERGUSON. That was just anticipating, wasn't it, that if we got into any war, we would be using these other bases, and we would be using the ABCD plan, the Singapore plan?

General MARSHALL. To that extent, yes, sir. The same thing is really covered in the ABC-1 and 2 plans.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. The point here was that the B-17's would be greatly restricted in what they did from the Philippines if they had no landing points other than in the Philippine Islands, and therefore, it was essential, in my opinion—and I think I personally directed this myself—that is my recollection—that these arrangements be made at Rabaul, Port Moresby, Port Darwin, Balikpapan [3293] Borneo and Singapore.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know when that material was furnished to those places?

General MARSHALL. The records show, and I know this, the deliveries were made and efforts to develop the strips were under way at Rabaul, at Port Moresby and Port Darwin before the outbreak of the war. My recollection is, and the records will undoubtedly show, that the ship with the gasoline and bombs for Balikpapan, for Borneo and for Singapore, was just about to sail at the outbreak of the war.

Senator FERGUSON. Going back just a moment to page 39 of exhibit 37, if those lookout ships, those men-of-war, saw convoys of Jap troops moving, for instance, in the Gulf of Siam across to Kra——

General MARSHALL. What page, please?

Senator FERGUSON. On page 39 of Exhibit 37.

General MARSHALL. I have it, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. If you would have known that Saturday morning, the 6th, that ships were moving across the Gulf of Siam, to the Kra Peninsula, would that change your thinking, as far as the alert of the Army was concerned, that is, as to what the Army should be doing?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I do not think it would.

[3294] Senator FERGUSON. You had done then everything up to that point, and that would not have changed your mind at all?

General MARSHALL. I do not think it would have, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You do not think it would have?

General MARSHALL. It is more a confirmation than anything else.

Senator FERGUSON. A confirmation. Your next is, of course, the aid to the voluntary corps, and you explained that.

The next sentence is "that no ultimatum be delivered to Japan."

Had there been any ultimatum, or why did you and Admiral Stark put that terse sentence there, that no ultimatum be delivered to Japan?

General MARSHALL. I would assume that there had been some such discussion. I do not recall now.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whom the discussion was with?

General MARSHALL. My assumption would be that a discussion would be with Mr. Hull, Mr. Stimson, Colonel Knox, and probably Admiral Stark and myself present.

Senator FERGUSON. Did the President confer with you on that point of whether an ultimatum was to be delivered?

[3295] General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir. I might say here that Admiral Stark and myself were always on the side of trying to gain as much time as we possibly could, while I assume, and I am certain that Mr. Hull, Mr. Stimson, Colonel Knox, and presumably the President only had the consideration of the great policies for which this Government stood, that were involved, as well as the military status in the way of potential power.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether you had any further discussions with Mr. Knox, Mr. Stimson, or anyone else after that in relation to an ultimatum? That is very strong language, "that no ultimatum be delivered to Japan."

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that specifically.

The only recollection I can go on now is these continued discussions as to what measures might be taken while upholding the dignity of the United States and at the same time fend off hostile action in the Pacific. Now as to the question of ultimatum or not, I do not recall that, although we made specific statements in regard to it, and it must have been a discussion of that specific nature.

[3296] Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate that at least you had been consulted as to whether or not an ultimatum should be given?

General MARSHALL. I think that is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you had given a direct recommendation that no ultimatum should be given?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The next is the joint board Washington meeting. "Secret minutes of meeting, November 3, 1941."

Major General William Bryden was there, the Deputy Chief of Staff, and Major General Arnold was there. Do you recall getting information at that meeting? It was immediately prior to your memo of the 5th.

General MARSHALL. Allow me to look at it.

Senator FERGUSON. I think you were there.

General MARSHALL. Yes; I was present at the meeting, as it shows there. I am looking at the minutes to see whether I can get any reminder.

On the bottom of page 2 I find this heading: "Action of the United States in the Far East in support of China."

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to have you read that and get what your reaction was as of the time that it was given in your presence on the 3d.

[3297] General MARSHALL (reading):

At the request of Admiral Stark, Captain Schuirmann gave a statement of the action taken at the State Department meeting on Saturday morning, November 1, at which a discussion was held on the Far Eastern situation. Captain Schuirmann states that the meeting was occasioned by messages from Chiang Kai-Shek and General Magruder, urging the United States to warn Japan against making an attack on China through Yunnan and suggesting that the United States urge Great Britain to support more fully opposition to Japan. He pointed out that on August 17, following the President's return from the meeting at sea with Mr. Churchill, the President had issued an ultimatum to Japan that it would be necessary for the United States to take action in case of further Japanese aggression. He further stated that Mr. Hull was of the opinion that there was no use to issue any additional warnings to Japan if we can't back them up, and he desired to know if the military authorities would be prepared to support further warnings by the State Department. A second meeting was held at the State Department on Sunday, November 2, at which time it was proposed that the British should send some planes to Thailand and that Japan should be warned against movement into Siberia.

Senator FERGUSON. I would like to ask you some questions about that. Does that refresh your memory about that being [3298] brought up, about the note of the 17th?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Was there any discussion as to whether or not that was an ultimatum or not an ultimatum?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What is your opinion as to it?

General MARSHALL. I would say, in reading this and thinking while I was reading aloud, that the desire for the ultimatum was coming from China particularly, by General Magruder.

Senator FERGUSON. Going up and reading the sentence, "He pointed out that on August 17, following the President's return from the meeting at sea with Mr. Churchill, the President had issued an ultimatum to Japan that it would be necessary for the United States to take action in case of further Japanese aggression."

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Apparently that was Schuirmann's opinion, and he said he was speaking at the request of Admiral Stark.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now was that your opinion?

General MARSHALL. All I can think of at this particular moment, sir, in regard to that is we were probably discussing [3299] largely economic exactions or restrictions in order to influence Japan.

Senator FERGUSON. What I am asking now, General, is, was it your opinion that we had issued an ultimatum on the 17th to Japan? That is just what Schuirmann says, and I will read it again.

General MARSHALL. I am familiar with that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. What I am not familiar with is the terms of the President's message. I do not know what I knew about it at that time.

Senator FERGUSON. I cannot hear you.

General MARSHALL. What I am not familiar with was the terms of the President's message to the Japanese Government.

Senator FERGUSON. I will read it to you.

General MARSHALL. What I do not know that I knew at the time was the exact expressions in that message. Your question is, did I think that was an ultimatum?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. I cannot answer that. I do not recall whether I knew exactly what he had said or not. I presume probably I had heard the message, but I have no accurate memory of what I thought at that minute. I received this information, and I think the record will have to speak for [3300] itself.

Senator FERGUSON. In your recollection on what was being said by Schuirmann, Captain Schuirmann, did you or did you not consider that the message of the 17th was an ultimatum?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection of that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now the minutes further state:

He further stated—that is Schuirmann—that Mr. Hull was of the opinion that there was no use to issue any additional warnings to Japan if we can't back them up, and he desired to know if the military authorities would be prepared to support further warnings by the State Department.

What was your answer to that?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall what my answer to that was, other than the joint memorandum of Admiral Stark and myself.

Senator FERGUSON. And that ended by saying—

General MARSHALL. That no ultimatum be issued.

Senator FERGUSON. That no ultimatum be issued, be delivered to Japan. Would you say then that you had advised against further warnings by the State Department?

General MARSHALL. I would say that at that particular time our advice was that no ultimatum be issued. Now what you mean by "further warnings" is open to considerable interpretation.

[3301] Senator FERGUSON. I just have the language of the joint board.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I am trying to find out what happened at that meeting. Here is what Mr. Hull wanted to know: "Mr. Hull was of the opinion that there was no use to issue any additional warnings to Japan if we cannot back them up." Were we in a position at that time, in your opinion, to back up additional warnings?

General MARSHALL. That meeting was on what date?

Senator FERGUSON. On the 3d day of November 1941.

General MARSHALL. We were not.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you express yourself at that time, when this question was brought up, along the same line?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, sir. The expressions of my views must be those of the memorandum, which followed shortly thereafter.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate at least that you did not want an ultimatum to go to Japan.

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I next refer to paragraph a, if you want to read the next sentence. You better look at it, so if there is anything you want to bring out you may do so.

General MARSHALL. You mean the preceding paragraph?

[3302] Senator FERGUSON. I mean the following paragraph.

General MARSHALL. What I was going to read was this in relation to the question of what was generating the ultimatum idea in our minds.

Captain Schulmann states that the meeting was occasioned by messages from Chiang Kai-Shek and General Magruder—our War Department Joint Staff representative in Chungking—urging the United States to warn Japan against making an attack on China through Yunnan and suggesting that the United States urge Great Britain to support more fully opposition to Japan.

That, to my mind, was what had precipitated this discussion.

Senator FERGUSON. That is correct.

General MARSHALL. That is the urging of our representative there as well as the generalissimo that we take more positive measures in our communications with Japan. Do you want me to read that?

Senator FERGUSON. I do not want to pass over anything that you want to use as an explanation. You did, General, did you not, go further than the mere Chiang Kai-Shek matter? Because warnings to Japan were a different matter from what he was asking. He was asking for military aid, was he not? He wanted military intervention, did he not?

[3303] General MARSHALL. He was asking for military aid and he was asking us to take a stronger stand in our warnings to Japan. He uses the words "to warn Japan against making an attack on China through Yunnan."

[3304] Senator FERGUSON. Then the additional warnings were general warnings; is that correct, and you discussed those?

General MARSHALL. Just what do you mean by that?

Senator FERGUSON. I am referring to the statement:

Mr. Hull was of the opinion that there was no use to issue any additional warnings to Japan if we can't back them up.

General MARSHALL. Well, my conception of this matter that I have at this time, is that Mr. Hull's discussion was based on this urging of the Generalissimo and of General Magruder and he felt for us to say anything further, unless we were fully prepared to back it up, got us nowhere.

Senator FERGUSON. And you were of the opinion at that time, that we were in no position to back up any other warnings?

General MARSHALL. That was my assumption at the time, because of the slow movement of equipment and matériel and personnel to General MacArthur.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Now, under a it states:

The decision on the Far Eastern situation made several months ago, is to make the major effort in the Atlantic, and if forced to fight in the Pacific, to engage in a limited offensive effort. This policy was stated in the U. S.-British Staff conversations report ABS-1.

[3305] Would you say that was a fair statement?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Of the conditions there at that time?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Down at the bottom of page 3:

f. Assuming that the Fleet could be moved to the Far East, no repair facilities are available at either Manila or Singapore; while there are docks, nevertheless, the necessary machinery and facilities for making repairs are not present.

Was the moving of the fleet from Pearl Harbor considered at that time?

General MARSHALL. My recollection is, and Admiral Stark undoubtedly can give you much more direct testimony, that the British were very desirous of the United States Government basing a considerable number of naval vessels on Singapore, and we were very much opposed to any such procedure.

Their point of view, if I may estimate, was that they had very little to build up their Far Eastern forces, because they were completely employed in trying to protect the western approaches of the North Atlantic, and the movement of the vessels down around the southern end of Africa to get to the Middle East.

They, therefore, were in dire circumstances as to the [3306] availability of shipping, naval shipping specifically. Therefore, if we would station part of our fleet in the Singapore region, necessitating the base at Singapore, that would greatly strengthen the naval situation in the Far East, without a critical reduction in the British power of controlling the western approaches of the North Atlantic, and guarding the numerous convoys taking the long route around the southern tip of Africa to get to the Middle East and Far East.

That was the discussion that I have a fairly clear recollection of at that time; our opposition to such a move, or the British desire of such a move.

[3307] Senator FERGUSON. Was it your duty to defend the fleet in Manila Bay?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; within the means at our disposal, which were almost nonexistent.

Senator FERGUSON. Whatever we had, but that was your province, as Chief of Staff?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. The next paragraph, will you read it?

General MARSHALL (reading):

g. Manila is not as yet a secure base for the fleet due to the lack of adequate antiaircraft protection for the anchorage.

Senator FERGUSON. Before you read the next paragraph, that was considered and you would be the man responsible for the antiaircraft there?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It was because you could not get it that it was not there?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And you considered that at the time?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, read the next paragraph.

General MARSHALL (reading):

This review pointed out that Japan is capable of [3308] launching an attack in five directions; viz., against Russia, the Philippines, into Yunnan, Thailand and against Malaya. Considering that Japan might initiate one or more of these five operations, United States' action should be: In case of Japanese attack against either the Philippines or British and Dutch positions the United States should resist the attack. In the case of Japanese attack against Siberia, Thailand or China through Yunnan the United States should not declare war. The study concludes that the United States should defer offensive action in the Far East until the augmentation of United States military strength in the Philippines, particularly as to the increase in submarines and Army forces becomes available.

Discussing the situation Admiral Ingersoll pointed out that the Fleet strength at the present time is seriously handicapped by the absence of certain naval units of major category which are in the repair yards, and it was felt that the present moment was not the opportune time to get brash. Explaining further the State Department conferences, Captain Schuirmann stated that the State Department did not feel that it was necessary for the United States to take immediate action, even if stern warnings should be issued. In this connection, he read Mr. Hornbeck's statement. Admiral Ingersoll felt that the State Department was under the [3309] impression that Japan could be defeated in military action in a few weeks.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I want to ask you some questions about the two paragraphs.

There were two parts as far as we were concerned. In the first paragraph it states:

In the case of Japanese attack against either the Philippines or British and Dutch positions the United States should resist the attack.

That is what you gave us before, that war with one meant war with the other. An attack on one meant an attack on the other.

But not in this case:

In case of a Japanese attack against Siberia.

In that case a different set of facts existed; isn't that correct?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. There you said we should not declare war. Then, we should not declare war if they went into Thailand.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you consider all parts of Thailand or just east of 100° east?

General MARSHALL. I couldn't tell you at this time, sir.

[3310] Senator FERGUSON. "* * * or China through Yunnan." That is exactly what the generalissimo was asking you about. You said in those three cases we should not declare war.

General MARSHALL. Might I interrupt, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. You are saying "you." This isn't my estimate. This is a naval estimate.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I will withdraw the "you."

Was it discussed there that the United States in the one case would declare war or would consider it as an act of war and in the other should not declare war and did you agree with that discussion?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall the terms of discussion, sir. I have stated before that my own feeling was that if the Japanese appeared in the Gulf of Siam that war was inevitable and we would be in a very critical situation if we didn't immediately take some action to try to control it.

Senator FERGUSON. This memorandum went to the President, did it not, General?

General MARSHALL. This I thought we were reading was the minutes of a meeting.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, but it is attached, and was delivered to us, attached as a memo for the President.

General MARSHALL. My understanding of this we were [3311] reading from were the minutes of a joint board meeting of discussions which occurred in the Office of the Secretary of State, Mr. Hull.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not the minutes were attached to the memo that went to the President? They were attached when handed to us.

General MARSHALL. That is the memorandum of Admiral Stark and myself to the President?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

General MARSHALL. Attached to those minutes? I will have to check up.

Senator FERGUSON. Will you check up and let us have that information?

General MARSHALL. This should show it, the actual memorandum.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you not desire to give to the President the information upon which your opinion was based, and part of it is stated in this memorandum, is it not, the joint board minutes?

General MARSHALL. I have got the wrong paper here.

This record copy does not show that that was communicated to the President.

I might say that the purpose of the memorandum such as Admiral Stark and I signed jointly here was to give the [3312] President, in readily readable form, our views. There are many factors that go into our reaching those views. If we recited all those in each instance, and this particular item you refer to may have gone to the President, I do not know that it did, we would merely lengthen the document he would have to read.

All I can say now is that the record handed me of the joint communication from Admiral Stark and myself shows no indication that the minutes of the meeting of the joint board of that date were sent to the President.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you have any discussion with Admiral Ingersoll or anyone at that meeting on the 3d in relation to the State Department's impression "that Japan could be defeated in military action in a few weeks?"

General MARSHALL. It states on page 4, at the bottom of the page, the last paragraph, preceding a discussion of the situation by Admiral Ingersoll:

General Marshall felt that the main involvement in the Far East would be naval and that under this assumption, due consideration should be given to the fact that the Navy was now fighting a battle in the Atlantic. It was his information that the Japanese authorities had not as yet determined the action to be taken under the present situation. The information which he had received indicated that the [3313] Japanese authorities might be expected to decide upon the national policy by November 5. He then read General Gerow's analysis of the strength of the United States forces in the Far East and emphasized the danger of moving Army Air Forces away from their present station in the Philippines. It was his belief that as long as the augmented Army Air Force remained in the Philippines, Japanese action against the Philippines or towards the south would be a very hazardous operation. It was his belief that by the middle of December the Army Forces in the Philippines would be of impressive strength, and this in itself would have a deterrent effect on Japanese operations.

I would say that that generally is probably the sense of what I said at the meeting.

Senator FERGUSON. Now—

The information which he had received indicated that the Japanese authorities might be expected to decide upon the national policy by November 5.

What information had you and what did you anticipate would happen?

General MARSHALL. I don't recall, sir. I would have to go back through all the information given me from G-2 to find out what that was. I am not conscious now of the specific thing.

[3314] Senator FERGUSON. Did you know that on that date or shortly after they gave a deadline date of the 25th of November?

General MARSHALL. I recall most distinctly that they gave a deadline date of the 25th, which they later changed to the 29th.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Did you have intelligence information on the 5th that action was to be taken in relation to this deadline date of the 25th?

General MARSHALL. I would have to check up. I don't recall, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you check on that and let us have your best information. That would be material to this questioning.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, you also spoke again, and I wish you would read what you said. "General Marshall emphasized." I want to get your opinion there.

Just a moment, before you read that I will ask you a question in relation to the other paragraph.

Did we move along as fast as you had anticipated so that by the middle of December the Army Force in the Philippines would have impressive strength or did we fail to get the men there?

[3315] General MARSHALL. We were delayed materially in getting them in, but part of that delay was known at that particular time, I think, in November. The length of the delay on the west coast in flying the planes out we were not aware of at that time.

I think I was probably aware of the delay of the delivery of planes, referring to the Flying Fortresses, from the factory. I was aware of delay in obtaining certain shipping. I was not aware until some time later, as a matter of fact, I think after December 7, of the delay in arranging convoys from Hawaii to the Philippines.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you advise the State Department on those items of delay?

General MARSHALL. I assume that I mentioned these facts in the presence of Mr. Hull because they were very pertinent to our situation.

Senator FERGUSON. The next may refresh your memory. You spoke, apparently. "General Marshall emphasized the point." Do you want to read that?

General MARSHALL. What page?

Senator FERGUSON. Page 5.

General MARSHALL. Does it begin with the words "emphasized the point"?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. I thought you might want to look [3316] at what you had said.

General MARSHALL. I thought I had just read what I had said.

Senator FERGUSON. But down in the next paragraph you had something to say.

General MARSHALL (reading) :

General Marshall emphasized the point that Japan could hardly take the risk of military operations with a powerful air and submarine force directly on the flank of their supply lines, and that when United States power is sufficiently developed in the Philippines, we would then have something to back up our statements. Until powerful United States forces had been built up in the Far East, it would take some very clever diplomacy to save the situation. It appeared that the basis of U. S. policy should be to make certain minor concessions which the Japanese could use in saving face. These concessions might be a relaxation on oil restrictions or on similar trade restrictions.

Senator FERGUSON. Whose language, General, is this:

Until powerful United States forces had been built up in the Far East, it would take some very clever diplomacy to save the situation?

General MARSHALL. That is not a direct quotation of my language. That is the officer's notes of the meeting, the sense of my expression.

Senator FERGUSON. That was the sense of your expression?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3317] Senator FERGUSON. You were of the opinion at that time that that was true?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And so expressed yourself.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I notice that it doesn't say whether—was the State Department present at that meeting?

General MARSHALL. No.

Senator FERGUSON. They would not be present?

General MARSHALL. They would not ordinarily be present.

Senator FERGUSON. Would they get this information?

General MARSHALL. Not necessarily.

Senator FERGUSON. Then I notice (reading) :

War Plans Division of the War and Navy Departments would prepare a memorandum for the President, as a reply to the State Department's proposed policy in the Far Eastern situation. The memorandum would take the following lines: * * *

Now, did that only cover the Yunnan situation, the China situation, or the whole Far East?

General MARSHALL. I will have to glance through this to see. May I read what the items were?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL (reading) :

The memorandum would take the following lines :

[3318] Oppose the issuance of an ultimatum to Japan.

Oppose U. S. military action against Japan should she move into Yunnan.

Oppose the movement and employment of U. S. military forces in support of Chiang Kai-Shek.

Advocate State Department action to put off hostilities with Japan as long as possible.

Suggest agreements with Japan to tide the situation over for the next several months.

Point out the effect and cost a U. S.-Japanese war in the Far East would have on defense aid to Great Britain and other nations being aided by the U. S.

Emphasize the existing limitations on shipping and the inability of the U. S. to engage in a Far Eastern offensive operation without the transfer of major portion of shipping facilities from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

On the question of gas and oil for the Philippines' Army Air Forces, General Arnold explained that the military authorities were building up reserves and were investigating reports that the Dutch East Indies were capable of supplying all United States and British requirements.

Do you wish me to go ahead?

Senator FERGUSON. No.

So it was to be a general memorandum covering the Far East?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3319] Senator FERGUSON. Rather than just the particular movements in China?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; evidently brought to a head by the generalissimo and General Magruder's appeals.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, notwithstanding what happened at this meeting, do I understand that things did grow more tense and you, as Chief of Staff, knew it from that date on?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you account for why it grew more tense?

General MARSHALL. My recollection on that would be that the continued Japanese movements south in the direction of Malaysia, Indonesia, the general tone of their communications, the tone of the reports that appeared in magic, a large number of details of that nature, which taken all together, gave a very serious and forbidding aspect to the situation.

Senator FERGUSON. General, I want to take you to the November 27, 1941, memorandum for the President, subject Far Eastern Situation, because it relates to the same question. It starts out by saying:

If the current negotiations end without agreement, Japan may attack.

That would indicate that, going from the 5th to the 27th, [3320] that you saw a different situation, would it not; that it was more tense?

General MARSHALL. Well, as I just said, I thought it continued to grow tense.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate that you had expressed it there in writing—had you not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, in the first memo, I notice that the Hawaiian Command, or the Hawaiian Islands are not mentioned.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. How do you account for that?

General MARSHALL. We were discussing here offensive operations.

Senator FERGUSON. You stated "in five directions" and you didn't state any direct moving on Pearl Harbor or the Hawaiian Islands.

General MARSHALL. We were discussing general operations, a combination of naval and land aggressive moves, which would maintain themselves in the business of penetrating still further. The attack on Pearl Harbor was a slash, but not a proposed invasion at all. Similarly, we anticipated as I told you, Guam would be in trouble, and probably Wake Island. What we foresaw and what actually happened was [3321] a general offensive move south of the China Sea into Malaysia, Indonesia, and the New Guinea region, and possibly Australia.

The scope at Pearl Harbor was to lessen the possibility of our action against such a general movement. The direction of the campaign was as discussed by G-2 to the effect that the Japanese would not attack in Manchuria, but would strike south.

That is what they actually did.

Senator FERGUSON. General, there you mentioned one thing, that this attack on Pearl Harbor was an attack to avoid our fleet. In effect, that is what I took from what you said.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Avoid our fleet being used against their movement?

General MARSHALL. To the south.

Senator FERGUSON. To the south, which you were anticipating there?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. When did the General Staff first anticipate that such a move may be made?

General MARSHALL. That is, the move to the south?

Senator FERGUSON. No, to take our fleet off, so as to allow them to go to the south.

[3322] General MARSHALL. I don't know that the General Staff specifically at any moment, figured out a time when they would strike at the fleet. We did feel that if we put any of our vessels out at Singapore, aside from the difficulties of maintenance, that they would be under the hazard of Japanese air in that vicinity.

We had assumed that in Pearl Harbor we had a reasonably secure base for the fleet.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the occasion for writing the memorandum on the 27th?

General MARSHALL. I believe the record will probably show that there was a meeting on it with the President just preceding that. Does the record show that?

Mr. GESELL. On the 24th, I think.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether this memorandum was written after the message to General Short dated the 27th or before?

General MARSHALL. I would assume the record from War Plans Division will show, regarding which General Gerow will testify. It probably was written before because it takes a great deal of care in preparing such a memorandum.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not this November 27 memorandum for the President was a confirmation of an oral statement that you had given the President?

[3323] General MARSHALL. There is another memorandum from General Gerow to me dated November 27 which may answer the question, if you will give a minute.

In a memorandum to me on November 27, with the stamped notation November 28, when it was noted by the Chief of Staff and noted by the Deputy Chief of Staff, regarding the Far Eastern situation, this appears in the second paragraph, following a number of items relating to the alert messages—possibly I had better read the whole memorandum.

Senator FERGUSON. I want to ask you some questions in relation to that.

You believe then that the one of November 27 was brought about by the memorandum signed by General Gerow?

General MARSHALL. No. He is stating what happened here, and I am getting my hint from what he states.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

General MARSHALL (reading):

1. The Secretary of War sent for me about 9:30 a. m., November 27, 1941. General Bryden was present. The Secretary wanted to know what warning messages have been sent to General MacArthur and what were proposed. I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November 24.

I then showed him a copy of the draft message you discussed at the Joint Board meeting. He told me had telephoned [3324] both Mr. Hull and the President this morning. Mr. Hull stated the conversations had been terminated with the barest possibility of resumption. The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines. I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

2. Later in the morning I attended a conference with the Secretary of War, Secretary of Navy, and Admiral Stark. The various messages to the Army and Navy Commanders and to Mr. Sayre were discussed. A joint message for General MacArthur and Admiral Hart was approved; (copy attached). The Secretaries were informed of the proposed memorandum you and Admiral Stark directed be prepared for the President.

[3325] I am not reading from the memo now. That was the memorandum you questioned me with regard to, Senator [reading]:

The Secretary of War wanted to be sure that the memorandum would not be construed as a recommendation to the President that he request Japan to reopen the conversations. He was reassured on that point. It was agreed that the memorandum would be shown to both Secretaries before dispatch.

Both the message and the memorandum were shown to the Secretary of War. He suggested some minor changes in the memorandum. These were made (copy attached).

That is the memorandum of November 27 signed by Admiral Stark and myself. Just when I signed it I do not recall because I was not here on the 27th.

Senator FERGUSON. General, do I understand that this refreshes your memory so that exhibit 17, which is the memorandum for the President, dated November the 27th, is the same memorandum that is mentioned in the second paragraph of the letter that you have just read?

General MARSHALL. I think that is correct, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, I want to ask you some questions on that particular letter. On November the 27th, apparently, this memorandum was prepared, No. 17, was it not, because [3326] it is dated that day?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. The presumption is it was probably prepared on the 26th.

Senator FERGUSON. On the 26th?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. Apparently you had not seen that, your letter that you read from, until the 28th. It says:

November 28th: Noted: Chief of Staff.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That is when you would see it?

General MARSHALL. Presumably that is when I signed it.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not that was prepared by someone else for you?

General MARSHALL. It was drafted, I am quite certain, in the War Plans Division following the discussions at the meeting of the Joint Army and Navy Board on the morning of November 26. As I left at about 1 o'clock, left Washington and did not return until the late evening of the 27th, so the assumption would be, and General Gerow can give you direct testimony, that following our discussions, meaning mine and Admiral Stark's and the other officers, the Deputy Chief's of Staff, the Chief of the Air Corps, General Gerow, and other officers and their opposites on the Navy side, following those discussions General Gerow undertook the preparation of [3327] this memorandum and also at the same time he was preparing the drafts of the alert messages, all of those, presumably that afternoon and night of November 26 and maybe on the early morning of the 27th. As I was not in Washington on the 27th my assumption would be that I signed this message, this memorandum on the morning of the 28th.

Senator FERGUSON. So certain things were taken up when you returned and on the morning of the 28th these matters were taken up with you:

First, the Secretary of War at 9:30 on the 27th—that is the previous day—had called General Gerow. "He sent for me"—meaning he sent for Gerow.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, why would he send for General Gerow and not send for General Bryden? Had you left word as to who would have authority to act while you were away?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. That would be a matter of routine. When I am absent the Deputy Chief of Staff acts.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, had you known there was to be a memorandum prepared before you left?

General MARSHALL. My assumption would be that I knew that such a memorandum was to be prepared just as I had discussed the preparation of the alert messages before my departure.

[3328] Senator FERGUSON. Well, it says here that "The Secretary"—that is the Secretary of War—"wanted to know what warning messages had been sent to General MacArthur.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "And what were proposed."

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, there is no mention there about sending any to General Short?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. But the Secretary of War was questioning General Gerow, and your Deputy Chief of Staff, General Bryden, as to what messages were sent to MacArthur.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate that at that particular moment he did not know what had been sent to General MacArthur?

General MARSHALL. That would be correct, sir. Nothing had been sent, I do not think.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes [reading]:

I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November 24.

Now, let us get that message. It is in Exhibit 37, page 32. Now, wouldn't that indicate, General, that the message—

[3329] General MARSHALL. Just a moment, please, Senator.

Mr. GESELL. It is the same one.

General MARSHALL. It is the same one?

Mr. GESELL. It is the same message.

Senator FERGUSON. Wouldn't that indicate that at that particular time when they were conferring that the message of the 27th had not been sent yet, because he said:

I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November the 24th.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Wouldn't that indicate that?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Or he would have also presented the other message.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, let us read this message, We find first that the action and "action" there indicates who is to act on it; "information" means that it is at least for their information but not necessarily action by them, so it is the Chief of Naval Operations [reading]: "ACTION CINCAF"; that is Admiral Stark?

Mr. GESELL. Hart.

Senator FERGUSON. That is Admiral Hart, is it not? That is Admiral Hart, yes.

[3330] General MARSHALL. I think so.

Senator FERGUSON. That is Admiral Hart for action?

General MARSHALL. I think so.

Senator FERGUSON. "CINCPAC"; that is Admiral Kimmel for action?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "COM11." Where is 11?

General MARSHALL. I don't know, sir. Those are the various naval districts, 11, 12, 13, 15. I presume the naval district in the Philippines, the one in Hawaii, the one on the west coast, and the one in Alaska.

Senator FERGUSON. General, Hawaii is not in there.

General MARSHALL. Well, I—

Senator FERGUSON. Hawaii is 14. How do you account for—

The CHAIRMAN. Let the general answer. He did not finish his answer.

General MARSHALL. I was endeavoring to say what 11, 12, 13, and 15 meant.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

General MARSHALL. I mentioned Hawaii, and you say 14 is Hawaii?

Senator FERGUSON. I am so informed. I find that out from the record.

[3331] General MARSHALL. Probably you are right, sir. I have not got it memorized.

Senator FERGUSON. Counsel, would you help us on fourteen? Is that Hawaii?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Fourteenth Naval District is on Oahu, the Hawaiian Islands.

Senator FERGUSON. Not the Navy. I am talking about the Army.

Mr. MITCHELL. These are all Navy.

Senator FERGUSON. Oh, these are all Navy?

General MARSHALL. These are all Navy; yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Fourteen is on Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The "action" is Commander in Chief of the Pacific Fleet.

Senator FERGUSON. Later we get a notice from the Army to the Navy. Now, will you read the message?

General MARSHALL (reading) :

Chances of favorable outcome of negotiations with Japan very doubtful. This situation coupled with statements of Japanese Government and movements their naval and military forces indicate in our opinion that a surprise aggressive movement in any direction including attack on Philippines or Guam is a possibility. Chief [3332] of Staff has seen this dispatch concurs and requests action addressees to inform senior Army officers their area. Utmost secrecy necessary in order not to complicate an already tense situation or precipitate Japanese action. Guam will be informed separately.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, this "CINCPAC," that would be Admiral Kimmel?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That would indicate there that the Chief of Staff has seen this dispatch?

General MARSHALL. Yes.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be you?

General MARSHALL. That is correct.

Senator FERGUSON (reading) :

Concurs and requests action addressees to inform senior army officers their areas

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, that would indicate that Admiral Kimmel should have notified General Short of this message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And Admiral Hart should have notified General MacArthur of the message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

[3333] Senator FERGUSON. That means that it is action for all parties?

General MARSHALL. Within their spheres.

Senator FERGUSON. Within the limitation of action as outlined?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, would you know why information was sent to "SPENAVO," meaning the British?

General MARSHALL. Does "SPENAVO" mean the British or mean our representatives over there?

Mr. MITCHELL. The naval attaché, isn't it, in London?

Mr. GESELL. That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL. Our naval attaché in London.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that what it means?

Mr. MITCHELL. I so understand.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. What does "CINCLANT" mean, do you know?

General MARSHALL. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. General Mitchell, have you information on that?

Mr. MITCHELL. I guess it was the commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet, but I am not sure. Is that right?

General MARSHALL. That is probably right.

Senator FERGUSON. It sounds like that now when you get [3334] the words and the letters lined up with it.

So that would indicate now, reading that message, that a joint message had been sent to the Asiatic Fleet, to the Pacific Fleet, to notify the Army tops of those two places, which would mean the Philippines and Hawaii and that would indicate this was written before the twenty-seventh note, would it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, how do you account for the fact that they are talking about General MacArthur and what was proposed and no mention is made about General Short?

General MARSHALL. My reaction to that would be this, that they felt an attack on the Philippines was a very certain proposition and an attack on Guam was probably a certainty. They do not mention Wake, they do not mention Hawaii, they do not mention the Aleutions and they do not mention the West Coast of the United States.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, going back to the message that we read on page 32, Exhibit 37, the one that you had seen. Why was that message sent on the 24th?

General MARSHALL. Will you identify that for me again, please?

Senator FERGUSON. It is on page 32.

Mr. MITCHELL. The message appears in two books, General. You have the Army book; and the same message appears in the Navy. The Senator is giving you the Navy page. It is the same one you were looking at.

General MARSHALL. That is the same message you were referring to?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. What was the question, please, Senator?

Senator FERGUSON. I want to know what was the occasion for sending the message on the 24th? What happened? Why was there a message sent [reading:]

Chances of favorable outcome of negotiations with Japan very doubtful. This situation coupled with statements of Japanese Government and movements their naval and military forces indicate in our opinion that a surprise aggressive movement in any direction including—then he specifies two particular places, then he specifies two particular places, Philippines or Guam—is a possibility. Chief of Staff has seen this dispatch concurs and requests action addressees to inform senior Army officers their areas.

Now, what was there that caused you to alert the Army and Navy in the Philippines and not Hawaii, if we consider that an alert?

General MARSHALL. I will have to go back and refresh my memory from the records. I do not recall the meetings that [3336] had occurred on that day or the preceding day. I haven't the data right here.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, General, up to this particular time, on November 24, do you know of any alerts given to either the Philippines or Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Not since the preceding summer.

Senator FERGUSON. Not since 1940, when the alert was given to General Herron?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So is this an alert?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I would consider it such.

Senator FERGUSON. This is considered an alert?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, will you tell us what happened immediately preceding, or any time preceding, that caused you to alert the Far East, including Hawaii?

General MARSHALL. Well, I assume, Senator, that some information came in about that time and there may have been some meetings about that time and I do not recall that at this time. I will have to check it.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the Senator to yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. This is not done for the purpose of interrupting, but I want to help. [3337]

Senator FERGUSON. I want all the help I can get.

Mr. MURPHY. The deadline on page 100 was the 25th, that was the last day the Japanese would wait, and there is a message on page 99.

Senator FERGUSON. I am going to put those in later.

Mr. MURPHY. There is a message on page 90. That might be the answer.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, I will try to refresh the General's memory.

Was it because there had been a deadline set that you alerted these two places?

General MARSHALL. I could not say, sir. I will have to check that up.

Senator FERGUSON. Could you check it over the noon hour, General?

General MARSHALL. I will try to do that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now, we will develop next [reading]:

I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

No [reading further]:

The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines. I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

[3338] Was there ever an appropriate cablegram prepared to send a message, as wanted by the President, to the Philippines? If so, what is the message?

General MARSHALL. If the reference is to the message to the High Commissioner of the Philippines, there was one sent on the 26th of November, 1941, by the Navy, Admiral Stark's initials and name and presumably the signature is on it, for the High Commissioner of the Philippines reading as follows—

Senator FERGUSON. Before you read it. Were you familiar with the instrument sent on the 26th of November, being Exhibit 45, from the President to the High Commissioner? Did you know about that?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, sir, because I think that was sent—it may have been discussed at the meeting of the Joint Board that morning but it was sent after my departure.

Senator FERGUSON. I am just wondering about that sentence, how that sentence could refer to the High Commissioner's message which was sent on the 26th and this meeting has not taken place until the 27th:

I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

Would you say that Admiral Stark had anything to do with the—yes, he did. It says:

From OPNAV, H. R. [3339] Stark, November 26, 1941.

That appears at the top.

Now, to go ahead a little further with this:

I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

We know that on the twenty-sixth the message had gone from the President to the High Commissioner. How could that be the same paper?

Mr. GESELL. Do you have it?

General MARSHALL. I have it.

Senator FERGUSON. Have you anyone in your office that could aid you to make it clear, to sit here with you and to aid you on some of these things you are being asked?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I will get somebody.

Mr. MITCHELL. We can handle it, Senator, if we know specifically. We can give the General the right documents if we know the particular message you are referring to specifically.

Senator FERGUSON. I am trying to find out.

Mr. MITCHELL. Are you referring to the warning sent to MacArthur on the 27th?

Senator FERGUSON. No. I am trying to find this message.

Mr. MITCHELL. What message?

Senator FERGUSON. This memorandum dated November the [3340] 27th from Gerow to the Chief of Staff, at the end of the first paragraph, two sentences:

The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines. I—— meaning, I take it, Gerow—told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

Mr. GESELL. That must be the 27th.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the warning message of the 27th.

Mr. GESELL. That is the warning message of the 27th.

Senator FERGUSON. All right. I am trying to get it from the General, what he knows about it.

General MARSHALL. This message——

Senator FERGUSON. Will you give me where it is?

General MARSHALL. It is on page 9 of Exhibit 32.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. A telegraphic message between the War Department and Hawaii. It reads as follows:

PRIORITY NOVEMBER 27, 1941.

COMMANDING GENERAL, U. S. ARMY FORCES IN THE FAR EAST
MANILA, P. I.

Negotiations with Japan appear to be terminated to all practical purposes with only barest possibilities that Japanese Government might come back and offer to [3341] continue. Japanese future action unpredictable but hostile action possible at any moment. If hostilities cannot, repeat, cannot, be avoided the United States desires that Japan commit the first overt act. This policy should not, repeat not, be construed as restricting you to a course of action that might jeopardize the successful defense of the Philippines. Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to take such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary. Report measures taken. Should hostilities occur you will carry out the tasks assigned in revised Rainbow Five which was delivered to you by General Brereton. Chief of Naval Operations concurs and request you notify Hart.

(Signed) MARSHALL.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do I understand then, General, that you never saw that message before it went out?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir. I was engaged in the discussions regarding the preparation of it, I think, on the morning of the 26th before my departure.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now 12 o'clock and the committee will recess until 2.

[3342]

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. The committee will please be in order. The Chairman was detained for a moment or two.

Does counsel have anything at this time before General Marshall resumes his testimony?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Do you have anything before you resume your testimony, General?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. Senator Ferguson will continue his inquiry.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. GEORGE C. MARSHALL (Resumed)

Senator FERGUSON. General, if you will take the letter now before you, of November 27, from General Gerow to you, I want to ask you some questions about that letter.

I notice in the letter, as I asked this morning, Gerow speaking:

I gave him a copy of the Joint Army and Navy message sent November 24.

The next sentence:

I then showed him a copy of the draft message you discussed at the Joint Board meeting.

[3343] I will ask counsel, do we have a copy of that draft message?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have never been able to locate it.

Senator FERGUSON. The answer is, General, they say they have never been able to locate it.

General MARSHALL. It would presumably be in the files of the War Plans Division or the present Operations Division. General Gerow will have to testify in regard to that.

Senator FERGUSON. I will ask counsel, have we ever had the joint board meeting, and that may tell us what was in the message.

Mr. GESELL. Yes. We have the minutes right here, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Do we have those?

Mr. GESELL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. They have been distributed?

Mr. GESELL. They don't make any reference to this, so they weren't distributed.

(The paper referred to was handed to Senator Ferguson.)

Senator FERGUSON. General, do you have the paper before you?

Mr. MITCHELL. No; that is the only copy.

Senator FERGUSON. I mean the letter I am speaking of. Would you show him the letter dated November 27 from General [3344] Gerow.

General MARSHALL. I had it here this morning, Senator, but it seems to have disappeared.

Now, I have it.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

I then showed him a copy of the draft message you discussed at the Joint Board meeting.

Do you know when that meeting was held?

General MARSHALL. My recollection is that that meeting was held on the night of November 26, just prior to my departure from Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know what time you left here on the 26th?

General MARSHALL. I do not remember now, sir. I can obtain that data.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, what message was he speaking about there, "a copy of the draft message you discussed at the Joint Board meeting." What kind of a message was that?

General MARSHALL. My recollection of the matter is that at that Joint Board meeting we discussed the question of an alert message and that that is to what General Gerow is referring.

He should be able to state positively what it is he is talking about, because he committed himself in writing on the subject.

[3345] Senator FERGUSON. Normally, in peacetime, General Gerow would not have charge of this, would he?

General MARSHALL. What do you mean by "have charge"?

Senator FERGUSON. Charge of such a message of action.

General MARSHALL. He would have charge of the preparation of such a message.

Senator FERGUSON. In peacetime?

General MARSHALL. In peacetime.

Senator FERGUSON. What was the Operations Division?

General MARSHALL. The Operations Division of the General Staff, which I tried to explain the other day, labors in peacetime under a misnomer, and it does today also, I think. It is the division charged with the organizational factors in the Army and with matters that pertain to maneuvers, training operations in this country. But it had no direct connection whatsoever with matters of war and the overseas theaters.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you assign any of this work to your deputy?

General MARSHALL. Not specifically, sir. My deputy, General Bryden, attended the meetings of the joint board. He was a member of that by virtue of the fact that he was a deputy. He was kept conversant with the various sessions.

Senator FERGUSON. Did he have access to magic?

[3346] General MARSHALL. I don't know whether he received delivery of magic or not. That will have to be answered by General

Bryden himself. I know magic was discussed in the joint board meetings.

Senator FERGUSON. How could General Bryden operate in your absence if he didn't have access to magic?

General MARSHALL. General Bryden sat in the discussions of what should be done, or why it should be done, or what should not be done in the meetings of the joint board. He was, therefore, aware of those sessions.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, going on in this message:

Mr. Hull stated——

I don't want to leave out the next word——

Do you know why, if we have the minutes here of this meeting here, that no mention is made of this message?

General MARSHALL. I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It was an important matter?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. A very important matter.

[3347] Senator FERGUSON. Prior to that, on the 24th, an alert had gone out as an amendment, this joint alert?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So to discuss an amendment to that alert was a very important matter.

General MARSHALL. Very important.

Senator FERGUSON. You don't know why that would be left out of the minutes?

General MARSHALL. I don't know, sir, unless the Secretary didn't get it in. He takes longhand notes himself of what is going on. Why it should be omitted, if it was, I do not know.

Senator FERGUSON. An important matter like this, do you know how the minutes were ever approved later?

General MARSHALL. The minutes were approved at the next meeting of the Board, presumably. Whether or not these particular minutes were approved or not the record will show.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you say that the minutes are complete? Was that your understanding as you were operating along?

General MARSHALL. If you are referring to this particular set of minutes, and in the light of General Gerow's statement, and assuming that he states what he was referring to was the preparation of an alert message, I would say that those particular minutes were not complete.

[3348] Senator FERGUSON. Was there anything done that was kept off the record of the minutes?

General MARSHALL. Not to my recollection, sir. I know of no reason why our minutes should have kept things off the record unless it was a definite reference to magic.

Senator FERGUSON. If there was a reference to magic, that may account for it not being in the minutes of the Joint Board?

General MARSHALL. That might account for it, but I don't see why you couldn't refer to an alert message without necessarily commenting on magic.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know whether or not it could have been because magic was responsible for the alert that you were anticipating?

General MARSHALL. I don't know that.

Senator FERGUSON. That that would be left out?

General MARSHALL. I don't know that.

Senator FERGUSON. Reading on from the letter:

He told me he had telephoned both Mr. Hull and the President this morning.

That is speaking about the Secretary of War?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

Mr. Hull stated the conversations had been terminated with the barest possibility of resumption.

[3349] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

I told him I would consult Admiral Stark and prepare an appropriate cablegram.

Now, is it that sentence, about an appropriate cablegram, the message that went to MacArthur on the 27th?

General MARSHALL. I would assume it did. General Gerow is the best witness on that.

Senator FERGUSON. That would be in effect an amendment or supplement to the one of the 24th, because this reads:

I gave him a copy of the joint Army and Navy message sent November 24.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I am aware of that.

Senator FERGUSON. You indicated before that it was always dangerous—I don't think you used the word "dangerous"—

General MARSHALL. I think I did.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you? To send a supplement or amendment to a message.

General MARSHALL. I think I also said it was better to send an entirely new message.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know why this amendment was made, the one of the 27th, to the message of the 24th?

[3350] General MARSHALL. The only answer I could give was that the other was a naval message to be communicated to the Army opposite. This message that General Gerow is referring to is a direct Army message, which in its directions to General Short, particularly in Hawaii, had some special reference to which the Navy was not directly concerned.

Senator FERGUSON. Didn't they also alert Admiral Kimmel on the 27th?

General MARSHALL. By the action of General Short in apprising his naval opposite of the contents of the alert.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that the only reason why you know why there was a new alert sent on the 27th?

General MARSHALL. Is what the only reason?

Senator FERGUSON. The only reason why you felt it had been sent originally to the Navy, therefore this one on the 27th was going to the Army on the 27th?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. I think that the events following a meeting with the President dictated a detailed alert to the Army officials.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, later in the morning, going on, the second paragraph—

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator, may I have the record show that you are referring to Exhibit 45, dated November 27, the memorandum to the Chief of Staff by General Gerow; so the [3351] record will show.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that an exhibit?

Mr. MITCHELL. Exhibit 45. You spoke about a letter.

Senator FERGUSON. So from now on it will be referred to as Exhibit 45.

Later on in the morning—that is on the 27th, and this is Gerow speaking—"I attended a conference with the Secretary of War, Secretary of Navy, and Admiral Stark. The various messages to the Army and Navy commanders and to Mr. Sayre were discussed.

Now, I have the long letter as Exhibit 45. What is that?

Mr. HANNAFORD. It isn't an exhibit.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the Sayre message.

The VICE CHAIRMAN. If you will permit, Senator, that was read into the record and it wasn't made an exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

Now, speaking about the memorandum from the President to the High Commissioner, that is the message that they talk about there and Mr. Sayre was discussed?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, when is the first, General, that you knew that the message, the memorandum from the President to the High Commissioner of the Philippines, was discussed?

General MARSHALL. So far as I can tell at the present [3352] time, Senator, I first learned of that on the morning of November 28th.

Senator FERGUSON. When you saw General Gerow?

General MARSHALL. Well, I don't know whether that would be entirely correct, to say when I saw General Gerow. These documents, I think, were brought to my attention as soon as I arrived at the office and I undoubtedly talked to General Gerow then or later regarding them.

Senator FERGUSON. Take the message, the one of Sayre's and we will go over that for a moment. It says:

A copy of dispatches will be delivered to you by Admiral Hart, which, with my approval, the CSO and the SOS addressed to the Senior Army and Navy commanders in the Philippines.

What are they speaking about there, General? What dispatches would be delivered to the High Commissioner?

It says:

Copy of dispatches will be delivered to you by Admiral Hart, which, with my approval, the CSO and SOS—that is the Chief of Staff, isn't it?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

Addressed to the Senior Army and Navy commanders in the Philippines.

General MARSHALL. I assume that is the alert, Army alert message to General MacArthur.

[3353] Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, this is on the 26th. Is the President anticipating that a new alert message is going to be sent to General MacArthur?

General MARSHALL. When I announced that I thought this was the 27th. I see that it is the 26th.

Senator FERGUSON. This is the 26th.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Does this anticipate a new message to General MacArthur, because the Exhibit 45 says up there,

The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines.

General MARSHALL. Well, reading this paragraph again that you have just read to me and looking at the message of November 24, it is possible, though the date is 2 days earlier than the President's message, that he is referring to that particular message.

Senator FERGUSON. But doesn't it indicate in the Exhibit 45 that the President did not know about the message of the 24th, because it says this:

The President wanted a warning message sent to the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. General Gerow will have to explain that, or the Secretary of War, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What is your explanation of it? Do you know about it?

[3354] General MARSHALL. I don't know about it; no, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Then going on in that letter:

In addition, you are advised that the Japanese are strongly reinforcing their garrison, and so forth. Now, getting down to the fifth paragraph from the end:

I desire——

that is the President—— that after further informing yourself as to the situation and the general outline of naval and military plans through consultation with Admiral Hart and General MacArthur you shall in great confidence present my views to the President of the Philippine Commonwealth and inform him that as always I am relying upon the full cooperation of his government and his people. Please impress upon him the desirability of avoiding a public pronouncement or action since that might make the situation more difficult.

Now, that indicated that the President personally was asking the High Commissioner to confer with Admiral Hart and General MacArthur, is that correct?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And to get the picture from them and then to confer with the High Commissioner?

General MARSHALL. Then confer with——

Senator FERGUSON. With the President?

General MARSHALL. With the President.

[3355] Senator FERGUSON. Of the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. Of the Philippines.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, then, when you came back on the 28th you were familiar with that message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. What was its significance to you? How did it stand in this picture?

General MARSHALL. About all I can say at the present time, Senator, is that it was part and parcel of the general action of the War and the Navy Departments in regard to the situation in the Pacific.

Senator FERGUSON. And it was carrying out what the President felt should go to the High Commissioner and to the President of the Philippines?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, in particular, because the communications with the High Commissioner would be a matter on the Presidential level, and not on the War Department level.

Senator FERGUSON. But he was to confer with the War Department and the Navy Department through Hart and MacArthur?

General MARSHALL. He was to confer, as I understood it, with those two officials out there.

Senator FERGUSON. So that took them into the picture as well as the State Department?

[3356] General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. You see the background of this, as I read it at the moment, is that General MacArthur was endeavoring to bring into the best possible state of organization for mobilization and preparation for possible hostilities a Philippine army.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do you think that this would convey to Admiral Hart and General MacArthur that the matter was serious when the President was personally having the High Commissioner take this up with them?

General MARSHALL. I would say it did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. I didn't get you.

General MARSHALL. I would say it did.

Senator FERGUSON. It did. Now, take the next sentence:

"The Secretaries were informed"—that means of War and the Navy—"of the proposed memorandum you"—meaning the Chief of Staff—"and Admiral Stark directed be prepared for the President."

Now, I refer you to exhibit 17 and ask whether or not that is the instrument that was referred to in that sentence?

General MARSHALL. Is this the sentence, "The Secretaries were informed of the proposed memorandum"?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. That, I think, is the instrument referred to. [3357]

Senator FERGUSON. That is exhibit 17. Now, General, I will ask you this: Have you been over that recently or would you rather read it before I start to ask you questions about it?

General MARSHALL. No, I think you might start with your questions, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, it starts out (reading):

If the current negotiations end without agreement, Japan may attack: the Burma Road; Thailand; Malaya; the Netherlands East Indies; the Philippines; the Russian Maritime Provinces.

Hawaii is not mentioned. Do you know why?

General MARSHALL. Because we did not anticipate a general attack on Hawaii.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, are we talking only about general attacks here?

General MARSHALL. We are talking about, as I used the expression this morning I think, general operations.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, do I understand then that an attack such as was made on Pearl Harbor was not being considered as part of an attack if current negotiations were to end without agreement?

General MARSHALL. I think from my point of view, Sen- [3358] ator, I can probably explain it best this way: We had made our major commitment of troops and matériel to Hawaii to make it as safe against attack as we possibly could. We thought we had prepared that garrison so that its defensive strength was such that there was little likelihood that the Japanese would undertake the hazardous operation of attacking it.

We thought at the same time that there was every indication of a general campaign by the Japanese south through the China Sea, as I referred to it before, and which actually was the case. We thought that the Japanese would not go into Manchuria under the circumstances because it would be too hazardous for them under the conditions and so far as we were concerned would not be a direct threat against the United States or a serious threat against the British.

We felt that Hawaii, as I have just said, was organized, equipped and prepared for a reasonable defense against an attack. I am using the word "attack" there in the meaning of any overt act of destruction or enemy aggression. I am not meaning it in the terms of a general operation, which was the nature of the Japanese movements we anticipated and which actually did occur down through the China Sea.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, do I understand that we must read this word "attack" here to have a qualified meaning, one of general operation and not the ordinary attack? [3359] Is that what we must understand?

General MARSHALL. I would say yes, sir, because we anticipated the possibility of attack almost anywhere, in the Aleutians, on the West Coast, as I stated the other day, in Hawaii possibly, Guam, Wake, any of those islands, but that was not the Japanese campaign as we foresaw it. It did not mean, Senator, that if we kept on with our Hawaii we could remove that garrison from there because there was no danger there. The fact that it had a garrison, the fact that it had the equipment to use, would be the best guarantee against attack.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, do I understand then that we may use the word "may" there as "probable," where as Hawaii, West Coast, and so forth, were in a "possible" category?

General MARSHALL. That would be it, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You say that would be the—

General MARSHALL. I think that is a reasonable interpretation.

Senator FERGUSON. You say that would be a reasonable interpretation to do that, that the word "may" is "probable," whereas these were outside of the probable and in the possible?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I mean specifically that we did not mention Alaska and the Aleutians and yet we had a [3360] hazard there of air bases being established there for the threat of the northwest portion of the United States, but the fact that we did not find Japanese coming in there did not mean that there was not that possibility.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, now, did you have any discussions with the President that would allow him to interpret this as we now have interpreted it, that that meant general, over-all attack?

General MARSHALL. I think that would be the impression that we had given the President.

Senator FERGUSON. That is the impression you gave him, so that he would have this language and he would understand what you were talking about?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. As I recall at the time, there was a general unanimity as to what the Japanese principal intentions were.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the next that I want to call your attention to is the first large paragraph there:

Whether the offensive will be made against the Burma Road, Thailand, or the Philippines cannot now be forecast.

Just what was the purpose of this memorandum and when did you have a meeting with the President and discuss it with him that you were following up by this memorandum?

[3361] Well, first, I will strike out the question as double barreled.

When was the meeting with the President that you discussed this memorandum, that you were going to give the memorandum along this line and that he would understand the language above meant attack?

General MARSHALL. There was a meeting with the President at 12:15 p. m. on November 25 at which the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, General Marshall, and Admiral Stark attended.

Senator FERGUSON. November the 25th at noon?

General MARSHALL. 12:15 p. m.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know how long that meeting lasted?

General MARSHALL. No; I do not know, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know why it was called?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall at the moment, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And this was one of the things that was an outgrowth, that you were to write him a memorandum on certain problems, and the problems are discussed in the memorandum?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I am thinking while you were asking the question. I think it probably had to do— [3362] I think it was undoubtedly brought about by the information that we had received in the preceding 24 hours through magic and otherwise.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you know what that information was?

General MARSHALL. I will have to get the records.

Senator FERGUSON. What I am trying to get on the record, General Marshall, is the detail of that so that this record may be complete. There are many things mentioned in these instruments and unless we can interpret the instruments in the light of what was going on we are not going to have the complete history of what was known in Washington, and that is the reason for this detailed examination.

Do you know what that information was that caused the meeting at the White House on the 25th?

General MARSHALL. I think I could probably obtain what it was if I could see Mr. Stimson's testimony.

Senator FERGUSON. I am going to help you if I can.

General MARSHALL. Because he has a diary, which assists the memory 4 years back.

Senator FERGUSON. I will take you to the testimony of Mr. Stimson on November 25, 1941, and see whether this will refresh your memory, and so that you may have a copy of it, General, as we go along, it is page 4050, 35; that is, [3363] "Secret 35, Tuesday, September 26, 1944." Turning to the diary of the 25th I will read the sentence before (reading): "On November 24, 1941, I had a talk with General Olmsted"—this is the Secretary of War speaking, is it not?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

I had a talk with General Olmsted, whom I recently promoted to be the chief signal officer.

Did the Secretary of War do the promoting?

General MARSHALL. He signed the letters of nomination to the President.

Senator FERGUSON. I don't know what that had to do with the situation. Did it have anything to do with it?

General MARSHALL. I don't think it did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now:

That was important on the subject that I will tell you later of.

Were you having trouble with the signal officer that you were going to get a new one?

General MARSHALL. General Maughborne's term was about to expire. I think it had expired, and we were bringing in General Olmsted as his successor.

[3364] Senator FERGUSON. There is no definite term, is there, General?

General MARSHALL. Four-year details.

Senator FERGUSON. Is that definite?

General MARSHALL. Definite, and the man returns to his grade of colonel if he remains on the active list, from major general.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

in answer to a later question; the use of the air warning service, which, as you know, was a radar operation.

Now I will talk about November 25, 1941, and before I start I would like to ask what is the date, counsel, of the mimeographed copy of the Winant message, received here at 10:40 on the morning of December 6, 1941? Someone told me it was November instead of December, so that we should, maybe, correct this testimony. Do you know what the mimeographed copy shows?

Mr. GESELL. I think there is a misprint on the mimeographed copy but the exhibit in evidence is a photostat and shows December 7.

Senator FERGUSON. So that the record may be accurate, the Winant message in relation to the movement of ships is on the 6th of December 1941, and not the 6th of November.

Now, on November 25, 1941, he is talking, General, about what is in his diary and he says:

This is a long one—

And then from the diary—

"At 9:30 Knox and I met in Hull's office for our meeting of three. Hull showed us the proposal for a three months' truce which he was going to lay before the Japanese today or tomorrow."

I am not reading from the record. I will ask you a question. Was that the so-called modus vivendi?

General MARSHALL. I think it was, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So that I may get your knowledge on the record as to what Colonel Stimson is talking about, the Secretary of War (reading):

"It adequately safeguarded all our interests, I thought, as we read it, but I don't think that there is any chance of the Japanese accepting it because it was so drastic."

Now, he is talking about the modus vivendi, is he not?

General MARSHALL. I think so, sir.

Senator FERGUSON (reading):

Then we had a long talk over the general situation there, which I remember.

"We were an hour and a half with Hull, and then I went back to the Department—

He is reading from his [3366] dairy—and I got hold of Marshall. Then at twelve o'clock I went to the White House where we were until nearly half past one."

Now, the "we" in that sentence includes you, does it not, General?

General MARSHALL. Yes; I am following you. I can check that here. Are you able to follow me?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Will you check that and see whether or not the "we" there included you for that hour and a half—nearly half past one—almost an hour and a half?

General MARSHALL. It does include me.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

General MARSHALL. It includes the Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Stark, and the Secretary of State.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, an hour and a half. (Reading:)

That's an hour and a half.

"At the meeting were Hull, Knox, Marshall, Stark, and myself. There the President brought up the relations with the Japanese. He brought up the event that we were likely to be attacked perhaps as soon as—perhaps next Monday."

Do you know what day of the week that was that you were at the White House, that the President had brought up the attack as being perhaps next Monday?

[3367] General MARSHALL. I think Monday was the—

Senator FERGUSON. It would be December 1, wouldn't it? The 7th was on a Sunday.

Senator LUCAS. It was not the 7th.

Senator FERGUSON. No; it was not. It would be November 25 that the meeting was.

Senator Lucas wants to know whether it was the 7th of December. It couldn't be, could it, if it as next Monday and he was speaking on the 25th?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. If you will just wait a second, we will get the date.

Senator FERGUSON. All right.

General MARSHALL. This one thing, I think, is a fact.

Mr. GESELL. I figure it to be Thursday.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, we have got a calendar now.

General MARSHALL. I have a calendar here of the month of November. The meeting that the Secretary of War is talking about was on November 25?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. November 25, 1941, was a Tuesday.

Senator FERGUSON. Was on a Tuesday; yes.

General MARSHALL. Monday was November 24.

[3368] Senator FERGUSON. Then it would be by the next Monday.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "Perhaps next Monday," he said, "for the Japs are notorious"—what date was Monday? The 1st?

General MARSHALL. November 30.

Mr. GESELL. The 30th is Sunday, isn't it? Monday is the 1st.

Senator FERGUSON. Monday would be the 1st, would it not?

General MARSHALL. That is correct; December 1.

Senator FERGUSON. Reading on, "for the Japs are notorious for making an attack without warning. The question was what we should do."

This is the President talking, as I understand it. Is that correct?

General MARSHALL. I assume that "we" refers to the President's statement. That is not quite clear from this.

Senator FERGUSON. Does that refresh your memory, General, as to what took place in that meeting of November 25 at the White House?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And would you say that was accurate as to what took place?

General MARSHALL. I have no recollection to the contrary; [3369] I will put it that way, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. Reading on:

"When I got back to the Department, I found news from G-2 that a Japanese expedition had started."

This is all out of his diary. Do you know what that news was?

General MARSHALL. Out of his diary, I see here, "five divisions had come down from Shantung and Shansi to Shanghai, and there they had embarked on ships, 30, 40, or 50 ships, and had been sighted south of Formosa."

Senator FERGUSON. Does counsel have that particular information of G-2?

Mr. GESELL. Yes. That is item 24 of Exhibit 33, I believe.

Senator FERGUSON. General, would you look at that and identify it?

General MARSHALL. This is a memorandum for the Chief of Staff, dated November 25, 1941, and signed by Sherman Miles, Brigadier General, Acting Assistant Chief of Staff, G-2. Shall I read it?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a part of an exhibit.

Senator FERGUSON. It is part of an exhibit. I just want to get it identified in relation to this testimony.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; I identify the document.

[3370] Senator FERGUSON. Would you say, General, that that was the information that they are speaking about here in G-2? See whether you can find anything there about the five divisions.

General MARSHALL. That is what I am looking for. I do not find a direct reference to five divisions.

Senator FERGUSON. Could there be another message? Do you find any place there anything about Shantung or Shanghai or Shansi?

General MARSHALL. He does not use the expression "five divisions," he refers to the number of transports and their character of loading.

Senator FERGUSON. Do you find anything in there about the 30, 40, or 50 ships in the G-2 message?

General MARSHALL. No; I do not.

Senator FERGUSON. Then, could it be that there is another message that we do not have?

General MARSHALL. I do not know, sir. That may be.

Senator FERGUSON. That could be a very important message, because it may indicate they are going to cross this line that we had talked about this morning?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. So it would be an important message, would it not, General?

[3371] General MARSHALL. It would, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. This one only shows in the back "Distribution: Secretary of War, War Plans Division GHQ."

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; and of course the recipient, the Chief of Staff.

Senator FERGUSON. Could the reason we did not get all these in this book be that it was an Admiralty message, from the British Admiralty to the Navy, going to G-2?

General MARSHALL. I do not know about that, sir. I think General Miles could testify undoubtedly in regard to it, and possible General Gerow.

Senator FERGUSON. I will ask counsel to see whether they can locate another message that may be the one I am talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL. Those in exhibit 33 are not messages at all. They are estimates.

Senator FERGUSON. This does not appear to be an estimate.

Mr. MITCHELL. What are you referring to?

Senator FERGUSON. I am talking about this:

"When I got back to the Department, I found news from G-2 that a Japanese expedition had started."

This is the Secretary of War speaking.

Five divisions had come down from Shantung, Shansi to Shanghai, and there they had embarked on ships, 30, 40, or 50 ships, and had been sighted south of Formosa. I at [3372] once called up Hull and told him about it, and sent copies to him and to the President of the message.

Now he is speaking about a message and not an estimate. Would not you say that is correct, General?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. It would not be an estimate. He is speaking about a message.

General MARSHALL. There is a message of some sort somewhere.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now, he goes on, "of this message that I am speaking of from G-2 that is the end of the note on November 25."

Now, would you say, General, that that refreshes your memory, that you were at the White House with the President and the two Secretaries, and it was at that time that you were to prepare a memorandum, and that memorandum is exhibit 17, which is dated November 27, 1941?

General MARSHALL. I would think that is the probability, sir, and I would think also as the result of that conference, we probably became involved in the discussion at the meeting of the Joint Board on November 26, on that morning, following this meeting with the President.

Senator FERGUSON. Then we could go on on the 26th to see whether there was anything that happened there that [3373] would be put in this message?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, we will talk about Secretary Stimson—I ask counsel if he will try to locate that message there.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. The message of November 25 refers to Naval intelligence. It was based upon that. That is at the top of the sheet there.

Senator FERGUSON. It says "From G-2." That is the only thing.

Mr. MURPHY. It says:

The following are extracts from cables received in the office of Naval Intelligence together with G-2 comment thereon.

Senator FERGUSON. Does that explain it to you, General? He is talking about an estimate, and you and I, as I understood you, are talking about a message.

General MARSHALL. The Secretary of War is referring to a message here, I think. We have been discussing what was the basis of the preparations of the estimate.

Senator FERGUSON. Yes. Now let us go on to Secretary Stimson's diary of the 26th.

[3374] The following day, November 26—quoting from his diary—Hull told me over the telephone this morning that he had about made up his mind not to make the proposition that Knox and I passed on the other day.

Now, he would be talking there about the modus vivendi that you were discussing on the 25th at the White House?

General MARSHALL. That would be my assumption, sir.

[3375] Senator FERGUSON. Going further, "That means yesterday," the way the Colonel puts it, which would mean on the 25th, the day we talked about. Now, quoting from the diary—to the Japanese, but to kick the whole thing over and to tell them that he had no other proposition at all. A few minutes later I talked to the President over the telephone and I asked him whether he had received the paper which I had sent him over last night, about the Japanese having started a new expedition from Shanghai down toward Indochina.

Now that refers back to that G-2 message, does it not?

General MARSHALL. I think it does, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. "He told me," that is the President speaking, "that he had not yet seen it. I told him that it was a fact that had come to me through G-2, and I at once got another copy of the paper which I had sent him last night and sent it over to him by special messenger. That was on the 26th."

Now that would indicate that on the 26th he had sent to the President this G-2 message, isn't that correct?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; the same one that he had sent the previous afternoon or evening.

Senator FERGUSON. Now does that refresh your memory as to what took place on the morning of the 26th before you went to one of the Carolinas?

[3376] General MARSHALL. It refreshes my memory to the extent that I connected up the meeting of the Joint Board on the morning of the 26th and the probable basis of the discussion that took place there which led, as I understand it and as I believe, to the drafting by General Gerow of the necessary alert messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Now I show you the minutes again of the morning of the 26th and see whether or not—you have a copy of it there, I believe.

General MARSHALL. No.

Senator FERGUSON. Take this one.

(The document was handed to General Marshall.)

Senator FERGUSON. See whether or not you find anything about that in the minutes of the meeting.

Do you want to identify that as an exhibit and give it an exhibit number, so we will know what we are talking about on the record?

Mr. MITCHELL. Would you like to have it marked as an exhibit?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will call it Exhibit 62, and it is the Minutes of the Joint Board Meeting of November 26th.

(The document referred to was marked "Exhibit No. 62.")

[3377] General MARSHALL. Minutes of the Meeting of November 26, 1941, of the Joint Board, Washington. There is no mention in the minutes of the meeting of November 26 of the Joint Board of the instructions to General Gerow for the preparation of a draft of an alert message.

Senator FERGUSON. Can you account for that being left out, if it was taken up?

General MARSHALL. No, sir; I cannot.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, is it a fair statement then that as early as the 25th, and on the 26th, from the G-2 message that was mentioned on page 4051 of the record and being mentioned in Secretary Stimson's diary, that there was a possibility of a movement that would take the Japs across the line that had been designated in your previous testimony?

General MARSHALL. Towards the Gulf of Siam?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes.

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir, there was.

Senator FERGUSON. This would be evidence that as early as this date there was a movement on that would cross those lines?

General MARSHALL. That might cross those lines.

Senator FERGUSON. That might cross those lines.

[3378] Now, reading from the testimony of Colonel Stimson:

November 27. As you know, this was a very important day.

Do you know why he described in his language as being a very important day?

General MARSHALL. I presume it was because of the dispatch of the alert messages.

Senator FERGUSON. Then quoting from his diary:

November 27, 1941. News is coming in of a concentration and movement south by the Japanese of a large expeditionary force leaving south from Shanghai, evidently headed toward Indochina, with a possibility of going to the Philippines or to Burma, or the Burma Road, or the Dutch East Indies, but probably a concentration to move over into Thailand and to hold a position from which they can attack Singapore when the moment arrives.

Was that a fair estimate?

General MARSHALL. I think so.

Senator FERGUSON. Of what was coming in?

General MARSHALL. I think so.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, the next sentence:

The first thing in the morning I called up Hull to find out what is the finale.

General MARSHALL. He corrects that later.

[3379] Senator FERGUSON. (reading):

what is the finale, I put it here but I meant it was his final decision.

He explains what he meant by the "finale"; isn't that correct?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. You would take it from that that the Secretary of War had gotten from the Secretary of State his final decision?

General MARSHALL. Not quite that, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, what does it say?

General MARSHALL. You used the past tense. He says he called up to find out what it was. He may say later, I don't know, that he did find out.

Senator FERGUSON. It says, "I put it here, but I meant it was his final decision," quoting from his diary, "what his final decision had been with the Japanese, whether he had handed them the new proposal which we passed on 2 or 3 days ago, or whether, as he suggested yesterday, he had broken the whole matter off."

Now, the "2 or 3 days ago" was the modus vivendi, wasn't it?

General MARSHALL. That was my recollection.

Senator FERGUSON. Had you ever gone over with the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the President, [3380] or anybody else this modus vivendi?

General MARSHALL. My recollection in regard to that is it was first brought to the attention of the War Department, in General Gerow's presence, at a meeting in Mr. Hull's office where General Gerow and Admiral Stark were present, and were called upon to express an opinion.

As I recall—and this is purely hearsay—they stated it appeared to be all right, but they wished time to think it over.

Then they each prepared a statement in which the general propositions of the modus vivendi were stated by them, not to involve any objectionable military conditions, except that General Gerow said—I do not believe he wrote it—that the reference in Admiral Stark's memorandum which would imply that we would do nothing to further build up the defenses of the Philippines was not an acceptable proposition, from the Army point of view.

Now, my next recollection is—and it is rather vague—that this same document was at least a partial basis of the discussion with the President at the meeting on November 25.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, do I understand then that you had approved this memorandum that General Gerow drew up in relation to the modus vivendi?

[3381] General MARSHALL. I had not expressed a formal approval of it, but I concurred with him in what he wrote, with the condition that he expressed orally to Admiral Stark, that the naval reply should not imply that we would be barred from the further development of the defenses in the Philippine Islands.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, if you had the right to further fortify or, let us say, implement the Army in the Philippines, the modus vivendi as drawn was perfectly all right to you?

General MARSHALL. That is correct, sir; it was perfectly all right to me.

[3382] Senator FERGUSON. Now, quoting again from the diary (reading from the diary):

He told me now he had broken the whole matter off. As he put it, "I wash my hands of and it is now in the hands of you and Knox, the Army and Navy."

That is the end of his quote from his diary.

I will ask you, General Marshall, when that information came to your knowledge, the first time?

General MARSHALL. You mean by "that information" Mr. Hull's statement, "I wash my hands of and it is now in the hands of you and Knox, the Army and Navy"?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, sir.

General MARSHALL. I would assume that that information came to me for the first time on the morning of November 28, on my return to Washington.

Senator FERGUSON. On the morning of November 28. Do you know who gave it to you?

General MARSHALL. No, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you talk to Secretary Stimson?

General MARSHALL. I assume that I did.

Senator FERGUSON. And you assume then that you got it from him?

General MARSHALL. I assume he told me. He kept me pretty well informed of everything that was going on.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, where did that place [3383] the Army, that information? What did it mean to you?

General MARSHALL. It meant to me, certainly now, and I presume then—

Senator FERGUSON. I think it is only fair to try to consider it history, if you might consider it history, in the past rather than in the future, now.

General MARSHALL. That is what I am trying to do, Mr. Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. That is what I would like you to be able to do.

General MARSHALL. I assume it conveyed to me at that time the necessity for a general alert in the Pacific.

Senator FERGUSON. That would, on the morning of the twenty-eighth, make you feel that a general alert in the Pacific was required?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. And on the morning of the twenty-eighth I was informed, by seeing the documents, that a general alert had been given.

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, did you leave town the evening of the twenty-eighth again?

General MARSHALL. I do not think I did, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. Did you go twice to the maneuvers?

General MARSHALL. I will have to check that.

Senator FERGUSON. Would you have that checked to see [3384] whether you left on the night of the twenty-eighth?

General MARSHALL. I will.

Senator FERGUSON. Going to the next question, No. 30, on page 4053, so that we will get the continuity (reading):

Mr. Secretary, I do not like to disturb you but I have become a little confused on dates about this telephone call. Was that on the 26th?

Mr. STIMSON. That was on the 27th.

General RUSSELL. Twenty-seventh, the day after the 26th.

Mr. STIMSON. Was the day he told me he was in doubt whether he would go on with it?

General RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. STIMSON. Or whether he would break it off, and on the morning of the 27th by telephone he told me that he had decided to break it off.

That makes the record very clear that the conversation between Secretary Stimson and the Secretary of State was on the morning of the 27th.

Would not you say that is clear now, from that?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. And is that your understanding?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. To refresh your memory, General, on whether or not you left town on the night, or the afternoon [3385] of the twenty-eighth, the same testimony, taken August 7, 1944, before the Pearl Harbor Board, question No. 50:

General RUSSELL. Do you recall giving instructions for the preparation of that message, or participate in its preparation?

General MARSHALL. I was away on the 27th. I left here on the afternoon of the 26th. I went down to maneuvers in North Carolina and did not return until the night of the 27th. Incidentally, I think I left immediately after that on the 28th and went back again, and I have a rather distinct recollection of comparing the effects of this statement.

Does that in any way refresh your memory?

General MARSHALL. No, sir. I will have to try to check up and find out. Incidentally, when I appeared in that hearing I only had about 45 minutes to prepare myself, so I did not have my data.

Senator FERGUSON. Then taking question No. 33:

Mr. STIMSON. Or whether he would break it off; and on the morning of the 27th, by telephone, he told me that he decided to break it off.

Quoting from his diary:

"I then called up the President and talked with him about it. General Arnold came in—

"This is to my office.

[3386] "General Arnold came in to present the orders for the movement of two of our biggest planes out from San Francisco and across the Mandated Islands to Manila. There is a concentration going on by the Japanese in the Mandated Islands, and these planes can fly high over them and beyond the reach of their pursuit planes, and take photographs."

Now I ask you to turn to page No. 6 of Exhibit 32.

General MARSHALL. You wish me to read this?

Senator FERGUSON. Yes, I want you to read that message into the record, and then I will talk to you about it.

ADAMS

Senator FERGUSON. Now, General, is that the message they are talking about here in the diary?

General MARSHALL. I presume that is the message, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. That was sent out on the 26th of [3388] November 1941?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Senator FERGUSON. When is the first that you knew such a message had been sent out?

General MARSHALL. I could not say as to that, sir. I was familiar with what they were going to do, and the directions were being given about it.

Senator FERGUSON. In other words, you knew before you left on the 26th that such a mission was contemplated and going to be advised?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir. I had authorized the procedure.

Senator FERGUSON. You had authorized the procedure. Now was that discussed at the meeting of the 25th at the White House?

General MARSHALL. I do not recall, sir. It probably was mentioned.

Senator FERGUSON. Probably mentioned. Well, it was a very important mission, was it not, General?

General MARSHALL. Yes, sir; it was important. Or, rather, I would say it was a rather delicate mission, because that was taking us directly over the Japanese islands and we had to consider whether or not they would grasp at that as a hostile threat.

[3389] Senator FERGUSON. All right. Now I want to ask you in relation to the use of the telephone as an overt act to Hawaii, compared to this action, as to how you would compare it.

General MARSHALL. I would say the use of a telephone depended on what was being said on the telephone.

Senator FERGUSON. Well, to alert the Hawaiians.

General MARSHALL. That is a matter of judgment, Senator.

Senator FERGUSON. I just want your explanation of it.

General MARSHALL. I will go into this first, the question of the air flight. General Arnold discussed that with the Secretary of War, because we regarded it as a very delicate proposition. We could not figure any other way how to obtain this information. We thought it was very important that we should know. We thought it possible that by flying at a high altitude we might get by with the thing without more than a Japanese objection to our coming into their mandated area. However, we had to accept the possibility that they would seize upon this as an overt act.
